OFFICIAL REPORT

OF THE

DEBATES AND PROCEEDINGS

OF THE

CONVENTION OF 1853.

VOLUME II.

THE MILITIA, &c.—EAMES—HALL—THOMPSON—CUSHMAN—OLIVER.

MONDAY, June 27, 1853.

The Convention assembled pursuant to adjournment, and was called to order by the President, at ten o'clock, A. M.

Prayer by the Chaplain.

The Journal of Saturday was read.

Presentation of a Petition.

Mr. EAMES, of Washington, presented the petition of Josiah Francis and one hundred and ten others, citizens of Pittsfield, in favor of the system of town representation, which was referred to a Committee of the Whole, and ordered to be printed.

Limitation of Term of Office.

Mr. HALL, of Haverhill, submitted the following Report from a Committee:—

COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS.

In Convention, June 27th, 1853.

The Committee on so much of the Constitution as relates to secretary, treasurer, &c., to whom was referred an order of June 11th, 1853, have considered the same, and report the following resolution.

For the Committee,

CHARLES B. HALL.

Resolved, That it is inexpedient so to amend the Constitution as to require that "every person holding an office in or under the State government, shall retire therefrom at the expiration of six years' service."

The Report was referred to a Committee of the Whole, and ordered to be printed.

Further time granted to a Committee to Report.

Mr. HALL, of Haverhill, from the Committee on the subject of the secretary, treasurer, &c., asked further time for the consideration of the subject of electing justices of the peace by the people.

Further time was granted.

Plan of Representation.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Charlestown. Accompanying the plan which I had the honor to submit to the Convention on Saturday last, on the subject of the House of Representatives, was a table showing the result to be produced by the basis proposed in that plan. Since that time, however, I have examined the subject more carefully and critically, and I find that there is an error in a statement, arising from the fact that five small towns, incorporated since the year 1850, were separated from the rest, and placed by themselves in the table, when they should properly have been allowed to remain with the towns from which they were taken. I have also, since that period, worked out a table showing the results of my plan, and the basis of representation under it in the several counties, together with the number of representatives to which each county will be entitled, from the smallest fraction as well as the largest number. My object in rising, is to ask that the table be printed as a part of the plan which I submitted on Saturday, and that the old table be dispensed with.

The PRESIDENT. The table will be substituted in the place of the one proposed by the gentleman, on Saturday, and printed, as he desires.

Compensation of Officers of the Convention.

Mr. CUSHMAN, of Bernardston, submitted the following order:—

Ordered, That the Committee on the Pay Roll be requested to report a resolve for the payment of the Chaplain and other officers of the Convention.

Mr. LIVERMORE, of Cambridge. I think that the order should be made to state the compensation which is to be allowed the various officers of the Convention.

Mr. CUSHMAN. It is true that the order makes no provision for the amount of compensation to be allowed, but I thought it would be better to leave it to the Committee to decide the amount that shall be right and proper.

The question being taken on the adoption of the order, it was decided in the affirmative. So the order was adopted.

Orders of the Day.

Mr. LIVERMORE, of Cambridge, moved that the Convention proceed to the consideration of the Orders of the Day.

The motion was agreed to.

The Convention accordingly proceeded to the consideration of the first item upon the calendar, in the Orders of the Day, it being the motion of Mr. BEACH, of Springfield, to discharge the Committee of the Whole from the further consideration of the subject of the House of Representatives, and that the same be referred to a select committee of the Convention, pending which question a motion had been made and superseded by the adjournment, to lay the proposition upon the table.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Charlestown. As I had the honor to submit the motion to lay the proposition of the gentleman from Springfield upon the table, I will state, that the same reasons exist at present which existed when I made that motion. I therefore hope that the motion of the gentleman from Springfield may be laid upon the table for the present.

The latter motion prevailed and the motion of the gentleman from Springfield was laid upon the table.

Upon motion, by Mr. HALL, of Haverhill, the Convention resolved itself into

COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE,

Mr. Huntington, of Northampton, in the Chair, for the consideration of the Report of the Committee on the subject of

The Militia,

That it is inexpedient to act upon the subject of an order of June 15th, providing for the registration of citizens as a police force.

Mr. OLIVER, of Lawrence. The order which induced that Report was submitted to the Committee without any details whatever on the part of the gentleman who presented it. And it will be perceived at once, I think, if gentlemen will look at it, that its adoption would devolve a great amount of labor upon somebody,—not upon the Committee, indeed, who have reported upon the subject,—but upon those who would have the labor of carrying its provisions into effect if it were incorporated in the Constitution. It would, in my opinion, also involve a very considerable amount of legislation, perhaps more than would be expended upon the subject of a limited militia itself. It will be perceived that the order provides for the organization of “all able-bodied citizens between the ages of twenty-one and fifty, as a standing police of the Commonwealth,” to render such assistance as may at any time be necessary for the preservation of the peace and the faithful and efficient execution of the laws of the Commonwealth. It is, however, a covert attack on the militia. Let us, for a moment, look at the number of persons between these two ages. By the reports of the adjutant-general upon the subject of the militia, we find that the number of persons between the ages of eighteen and forty-five, formerly only about ninety thousand, has been greatly increased—whether from greater accuracy on the part of the officers who perform the duties of registration, or from an actual increase of population, I am unable to say. It now amounts to nearly one hundred and twenty thousand. This may be considered as about the number of persons between the ages proposed in the order,—for the numbers between eighteen and forty-five, given in the report of the adjutant-general, cannot differ widely from the numbers between twenty-one and fifty,—and the proposition is that these one hundred and twenty thousand citizens shall be enrolled, and rendered fit for duty as a standing police force.

Let us consider, for a moment, the objections to this proposition. The first difficulty is that of enrolment. To accomplish this end no system is proposed, though one must certainly be devised. I can see but a single method, and that is by imposing upon some officer or officers, recognized by the laws of the Commonwealth—say assessors or selectmen—the duty of going through the various cities and towns of the State, and performing the laborious process of taking the names of all these able-bodied citizens. Certain documents must then be drawn up to show who these persons are, and then follows the necessity of organizing the force into sub-divisions—say of companies, battalions, and brigades—for this course is necessary in order to ensure systematic order and action in so large a body of persons.

Then comes the business of arming this great police force, because they must be armed in some way, that they may be in a condition to meet whatever emergencies of danger may arise in the community. And here the question occurs, what sort of arms is most appropriate for such a body; whether it be the arms with which nature has already supplied them, their fists and their feet; or whether it is best they should have clubs or batons, such as are usually furnished to our present police force, or the more deadly and certain musket and rifle. After all this has been settled, and arms are supplied, this huge body must be fitted for duty, drilled and regulated in order to render it serviceable, for it is perfectly apparent that unless they should be instructed to work in concert, to act together, and as one man, when called upon in case of any outbreak, they would be of but little use, and I submit that it would be no small labor to teach them to do this.

Besides this, and what is a very essential point, I think it safe to say that a large amount of money would probably be expended to keep this immense force in readiness for instant action and to pay for any actual service. No doubt, many persons—as for instance my friend from Walpole—would be quite willing and ready to serve without pay; but when you attempt permanently to establish a force of this character, but few will be found willing to act without being remunerated in some degree for their services. It would also be perfectly natural to expect, if a broken head or a broken leg were the result, or perchance, if a life should be lost in some skirmish, that the State would make provision for the widow and fatherless children, and that a hospital would be provided for the wounded and disabled. If, for instance, they should have a mob in the town of Walpole—

Mr. BIRD, of Walpole. I would like to inform the gentleman from Lawrence, that we do not have mobs in our town.

Mr. OLIVER. I am very glad to hear the gentleman make that remark, for I think it offers a great inducement to settle down in some pleasant homestead there, and to live among the tuneless birds that flourish and sing their matin songs in the trees of that neighborhood. Seriously, however, I submit, whether we have not already—say even in two forms, our engine men and our militia—what the gentleman who introduced that order calls for, and in a far less cumbersome system. I submit whether our present engine organizations might not answer the very purpose contemplated by the order, or if anything could be more desirable for the suppression of a mob, than a vigorous operation of their machines? What more effectual way can there be devised to disperse a mob, than to squirt it out of existence by a well directed stream of water, unless it be a stream of fire? But, really, Mr. Chairman, to be serious, I am of the opinion, that our present military organization is large enough, and is well enough and sufficient for all this purpose, and is what we want, rather than any general system of police, such as is contemplated on so magnificent a scale, by the gentleman who introduced the order. And here let me incidentally add, that very frequent allusions have been here made to the early fathers of the country, and much has been said about the wisdom of our ancestors in regard to the several measures adopted by them in all matters pertaining to government. With permission of the Committee, I should like to read an extract or two, taken from the ancient records of the colonies, going to show what their prudent judgment and forecast deemed necessary for their preservation against “foes from within, and foes from without.”

In 1628, (February 26,) it was ordered that “arms for one hundred men should be prepared forthwith, and that every town within the patent should take special care that every person, as well servants as others, within the town should be furnished with good and sufficient arms allowable by the captain.”

It was at this time that “musket bullets were a currency of circulation, one bullet being equivalent to one farthing,” and I submit that this currency would be a most useful circulating medium in the management of a mob.

In 1636, it was ordered “that all military men in the jurisdiction should be ranked into three regiments,” two comprising those in Boston and its vicinity, of which John Winthrop and John Haynes were the respective colonels, and one comprising those in Salem and its vicinity, of which John Endicott was the colonel, and each of these three regiments under these three Johns, was to be trained by a muster-master, who was to have a yearly maintenance from the treasury. In 1638, the Ancient and Honorable Artillery was formed and comprised the leading men of the colony.

In 1643, I find it recorded, that “the regiments and military affairs were to be so ordered, that upon any sudden exigent or assault upon any place, there may be lawful authority to make resistance,”—and now mark what follows,—“for as piety cannot be maintained without church ordinance, nor officers of justice without laws and magistracy, no more can our safety and peace be preserved without military orders and officers.”

From that time down to the present, the military force has always been relied upon, not only in the exigencies of war, but in the emergencies which have arisen from insurrections and riots among the people. It was the opinion of the Committee that our present militia force was amply sufficient for all the purposes contemplated by this order, and that as the matter was already provided for, it was unnecessary to take any further action in regard to it. These are the reasons in brief, which induced their Report, and I only add, that I believe, that in all time of danger you may rely both upon their promptness to rally and their firmness and courage to act. It is true policy to avoid all necessity of a standing army, by keeping up a knowledge of the military art among the people. Unite the soldier and the citizen in one and the same person, seeing to it that the citizen predominates over the soldier—to-day in arms, to-morrow pursuing the vocations of peaceful business. By so doing, you are safe against the peril of a standing army growing up among us, to eat out our substance and to endanger our liberties. Be sure that you resist every semblance of a standing army, distinct from the citizens, and with interests wholly separate from them.

In that day of slow approach, but of earnest desire, when the pruning-hook and the ploughshare shall be found where violent men and the sword hold bloody sway, when the promise of the prophet shall be crowned in fulfilment, then—and I very much fear, Mr. President, not till then—all forceful appliances will be unnecessary, and all knowledge of that dreadful art which teaches perfect methods of slaying and destroying, will be wholly useless. God speed the good time!

Mr. WHITNEY, of Boylston. I should like to say a word upon this subject before the question upon concurring in the Report of the Committee is taken. I think, with the chairman of the Committee, that the subject has been already acted upon by the adoption of the Reports upon the subject of the militia, but I desire to express my views as to the manner in which I conceive this matter can be most easily settled. I offered the order as an indication of the course I wished should be pursued in an absolute peace government; and I think, that if all the legal voters between the ages of twenty-one and fifty years were allowed to execute their own laws through the ballot-box, they would be able to do it without the aid either of muskets, cannon, or the other implements of war. If it were necessary, however, for the State to arm a police force, I believe it could be done in a very short time, and without incurring a great expense. Every town might be compelled to furnish the State with a list of the legal voters within its limits, and the necessary arms and munitions could be sent them in accordance with this statement. Thus the whole difficulty, as regards this point, could be settled with but little trouble.

The gentleman from Lawrence has alluded to the laws of our forefathers, but I may be permitted to say, without intending any unjust reflection upon their memory, that I do not think the spirit which they manifested, and the inclination which they seemed to possess of exterminating from their dominions the poor savage, is a very commendable quality. Had they followed the noble example set them by William Penn in their sister colony, they would have been wiser law-givers than they showed themselves to be; and we should do well, ourselves, to follow the precept and precedent which was set by that good man, not of carrying on a government by appealing to the life-taking power, but of governing mankind without the use of fire and the sword. Without prolonging these remarks, I hope the Report of the Committee will be adopted, as the subject has been already acted upon by the Committee on another occasion.

Mr. HALL, of Haverhill, moved that the Committee rise and report to the Convention, that the Report of the Standing Committee on Militia ought to be adopted.

The motion was agreed to.

The Committee accordingly rose, and by their Chairman, Mr. Huntington, reported to

THE CONVENTION,

That they had had under consideration the Report of the Standing Committee on the subject of enrolling the citizens as a police force, and that they had concurred therein, and recommended that the Report be adopted by the Convention.

The question was taken, and the Report was accordingly adopted.

On motion of Mr. WILSON, of Natick, the Convention resolved itself into

COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE,

Mr. Griswold, for Erving, in the Chair, upon the Report from the Committee on

Qualifications of Voters,

That it is inexpedient to act upon the subject requiring that voters shall have the ability to read and write.

The Report was read by the Secretary as follows:—

The Committee on Qualifications of Voters, to whom was referred the Order of the 30th May, in relation to the expediency of providing that "ability to read and write shall be an indispensable requisite for the exercise of the elective franchise;" and also another Order of same date, in relation to a forfeiture of the right to vote in case of voluntary neglect to exercise that right, have duly considered the subjects set forth in said Orders, and report that it is inexpedient for this Convention to take any action in regard to the same.

Mr. LOTHROP. The Orders upon which the Committee have made this Report were introduced into this Convention by myself, and I regret that the Committee have not found it expedient, in their judgment, to report in favor of the adoption of at least one of them. I would therefore move to amend the Report of the Committee by striking out all after the word "resolve," and insert in lieu thereof the following words:—

That in every election, every voter born in this Commonwealth shall be able to read the printed ballots out of which he selects one to deposit as his vote.

I do not propose to make any extended remarks in favor of the amendment. The general principles upon which it is based must be obvious to the mind of every gentleman present. Intelligence and general education throughout the whole people is the basis of republican government, and its only security. We know there are a great many men who, from their intercourse with the world, acquire a very large degree of general intelligence, and are men of sense and judgment, and perfectly competent to exercise the elective franchise judiciously and wisely, and yet it is perfectly obvious, that these men, when they go the polls, not being able to read, are entirely at the mercy of everybody who chooses to impose upon them, and may be made to vote, they know not for whom or for what. Much might be said upon the importance of education and intellectual culture, to the interests, security, and prosperity of a republican government. But I will not enlarge upon that subject.

My original order would undoubtedly have cut off a great many of our foreign citizens who come to this country and become naturalized, and invested with all the rights which belong to citizenship; and it has been suggested to me by some members of the Convention that it would be impossible to carry through this body, a resolution or principle which should operate to cut off so many of this class of persons. I have therefore altered my resolution and confined its operation to citizens born within the limits of this Commonwealth. It seems to me, if we provide a general system of education in every town, city, and district of the Commonwealth, by which every child, before he arrives at the age of manhood, can, free of all expense to himself, learn to read, we are justified in requiring that every such child, when he becomes a citizen and claims a right to vote, shall so far have availed himself of those privileges of education, as to be able to read, especially as the ability to read is the only security for the intelligent exercise of that right and trust.

I look to the prospective influence of this principle, rather than to its present operation. Gentlemen say it will be impossible to carry it out. They ask who is to judge, ascertain, and determine whether a man can read. There would be no great difficulty in arranging that matter. But I believe, if the principle is incorporated into the Constitution, but very few years would elapse before we should arrive at such a state of things that no case would occur of a person arriving at the age of majority without becoming able to read. Now, a great many of our native-born citizens are not able to read and write.

Since I offered the original resolution upon which the Committee have reported, I have made it an object to institute inquiries upon the subject, and have sought information from citizens in every class of life, and I have found within this city fourteen native born citizens of this Commonwealth, who are very respectable, useful, and intelligent men, but who are not able to read or write. Those men, as will be said, from their intelligence, and their intercourse with the world, have a great deal of knowledge, and can form a sound judgment upon most public matters. That may be true, and yet, when they come to the polls they are at the mercy of the men who give them their votes. Now those persons have the opportunity, at the present day, in this city, and throughout the large towns of the Commonwealth, of learning to read and write. We have in this city, every winter, four or five adult evening schools, where hundreds are taught these branches of education. Therefore these men, though deprived for the present of the right to vote, could soon qualify themselves so as to be entitled to the privilege. If, in this country, we recognize any qualification for voters, it seems to me that the highest and most important is that of being able to read, in order that a man may vote understandingly, and not be at the mercy of others. I hope, Sir, that the amendment will prevail, though I confess I have not much hope that it will.

Mr. MARVIN, of Winchendon. I desire that we may defer the consideration of this matter for the present. There has been an order, referred to a Committee, which is similar in its nature with that which we are now considering. That Committee has not yet reported, and it is not known what they will report. The order which is referred to them, is to inquire into the expediency of requiring of voters, after the year 1856, that they shall be able to read the Constitution of the Commonwealth, printed in the English language. I hope, therefore, that the consideration of this matter will be put off, so that it will not be necessary to take up the time of the Convention in the consideration of the same thing, at two different times, upon two several reports. I move that the Committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. CHURCHILL. If the gentleman will withdraw his motion, I should like to move a slight amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Boston.

Mr. MARVIN. I have no objection to that course, and I withdraw the motion.

Mr. CHURCHILL. I move to amend the amendment, so that it shall read as follows:—

That in every election every voter born in this Commonwealth after the adoption of this Constitution, shall be able to read the printed ballots out of which he selects one to deposit as his vote.

Mr. LOTHROP. I accept the amendment.

Mr. MARVIN. I now move that the Committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

The motion was disagreed to, and the Committee refused to rise.

Mr. PHELPS, of Monroe. I hope that the amendment will not prevail. The gentleman from Boston says, that because persons cannot read they should not have the right to vote. Now I cannot agree with him in that opinion. I know a very intelligent gentleman who is not able to read, and yet he constantly exercises the privilege of voting, and does it with as much discretion as any one. He could neither read or write, except his name, and although he found some trouble in picking out his vote, I am not aware that he was ever made, through his own mistake, or through the dishonesty of others, to vote contrary to his opinions and wishes. And there are many similar cases.

GENERAL LAWS FOR CORPORATIONS. — STETSON — WHITNEY — FRENCH — COLE.

I think the effect of this amendment would be bad. How are we to determine who can read? Shall we, when a voter comes to the polls, ask him whether he can read, and if he answers in the affirmative allow him to vote, although it may be the fact that he cannot either read or write? There is much difficulty in carrying such a provision into effect. The gentleman is willing, in forming the basis of representation, that these persons shall be counted in to swell up the number, but when they come to vote he would say to them—"You cannot read, and you shall not vote." I think the principle is wrong, and therefore hope the amendment will not prevail.

Mr. MARVIN. I have some things to say upon this subject, but I shall not present my views until we have the Report of the other Committee to which I have before referred. I hope that gentlemen will not look upon this as an unimportant matter, because I think it is a subject which deserves serious consideration.

The question was then taken upon the adoption of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Boston, (Mr. Lothrop,) and it was decided in the negative.

The Report of the Committee was then adopted.

Mr. WILSON moved that the Committee rise and report the resolve to the Convention, with a recommendation that it be adopted.

The motion was agreed to, and the Committee accordingly rose.

IN CONVENTION.

The chairman of the Committee, (Mr. Griswold, for Erving,) reported that the Committee had had under consideration the resolve referred to them, and had instructed him to report it to the Convention with a recommendation that it be adopted.

The Convention concurred with the Committee of the Whole, and the resolve was then ordered to a second reading.

On motion of Mr. WILSON, of Natick, the Convention resolved itself into

COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE,

Upon the Report from the Committee on

The Qualification of Voters,

To whom was referred an order relating to "a voting list, or registry."

The resolve reported by the Committee was read by the Secretary, as follows:—

Resolved, That the Constitution be so amended as to require a Voting List, or Registry, and to protect presiding officers in adhering thereto.

Mr. ADAMS, of Lowell, moved that the Committee rise, and report the resolve to the Convention, with a recommendation that it do pass.

The motion was agreed to, and the Committee accordingly rose, and the chairman of the Committee, (Mr. Stetson, of Braintree,) reported to

THE CONVENTION,

That the Committee had had under consideration the resolve referred to it, and had instructed him to report the same to the Convention, with a recommendation that it do pass.

The Report was accepted, and the resolve was ordered to a second reading.

General Laws for Corporations.

On motion of Mr. CUSHMAN, of Bernards-ton, the Convention resolved itself into

COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE,

Mr. Keyes, for Abington, in the Chair, upon the Report of the Committee appointed to consider the expediency of making a constitutional provision requiring that corporations shall not be created by special act, except for municipal purposes, and in cases where the object cannot be attained under general laws, to which Report an amendment had been offered by the gentleman from Braintree, (Mr. Stetson,) and an amendment to that amendment offered by the gentleman from Cheshire, (Mr. Cole).

The CHAIRMAN announced the question to be upon the adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from Braintree, (Mr. Stetson,) which was as follows:—

Strike out of the resolve the words, "banking or" so that, as amended, it would read as follows:—

Resolved, That it is expedient to incorporate into the Constitution a provision, that Corporations may be formed under general laws, but shall not be created by special act, except for municipal purposes, or where the object of the incorporation shall not be attainable under general laws.

Mr. STETSON, of Braintree. This Report was laid over the other day by the consent of the Convention, on account of a Report which was expected from the Committee which had under consideration the subject of Banking Corporations. That Report has not, to my knowledge, yet been made, although I suppose probably it may be made sometime in the course of the day.

My opinion is, that if any action is to be taken upon the Report upon the subject of banking corporations, this Report should not be acted upon until we have that Report before us, unless this provision, which makes the resolution specially except banking corporations, be stricken out. If the Report, which may come in hereafter, shall provide—as I understand from the chairman of that Committee, it may provide—for placing the banks under general laws, then it will be unnecessary to make any exception in this Report. At any rate, that Report will open the whole discussion again in relation to banks. I am not, therefore, prepared at this time to go into the discussion of this matter, when in the course of a few days we shall have to go over the whole ground again in the consideration of another Report. My impression is, that to save time and to save discussion, these two questions being blended so intimately together as they are, had better both be considered at the same time, and that we had better now rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again. I now make that motion.

Mr. WHITNEY, of Conway. I ask the gentleman to withdraw his motion for a single moment.

Mr. STETSON. I will withdraw the motion, if the gentleman desires to speak upon the subject.

Mr. WHITNEY. I wish to say a single word. There seems to be a lack of business upon which the Convention feel disposed to act at this time, and I see no reason, myself, why we should not proceed to dispose of the resolution before us. If the gentleman from Braintree (Mr. Stetson), will withdraw his amendment, I think the resolution will give rise to little or no discussion, and I presume the principles of this resolution will not conflict with the principles to be reported by the Committee on Banking. And, again, it is possible that this resolution, containing this provision, might pass the Convention when a similar resolution, reported by the Committee on Banking, relating exclusively to that subject, might not pass. I think, therefore, there is propriety in considering this subject now, and if the gentleman from Braintree would withdraw his amendment, so that the whole question of banking should not become involved in it, I think, as I said before, that the resolution might pass without much discussion. If the gentleman does not see fit to withdraw his amendment, I hope the Committee will vote it down, and proceed to dispose of the resolution at this time. I hope, therefore, that the Committee will not rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again, upon this subject.

The question was taken, and the amendment of the gentleman from Braintree, (Mr. Stetson,) was disagreed to.

The question then recurred upon the amendment of the gentleman from Cheshire, (Mr. Cole,) to strike out the following words, "or where the object of the incorporation shall not be attainable under general laws," so that, as amended, the resolution would read as follows:—

Resolved, That it is expedient to incorporate into the Constitution a provision, that corporations may be formed under general laws, but shall not be created by special act, except for banking or municipal purposes.

Mr. FRENCH, of Berkley. I wish somebody would tell us why "banking and municipal purposes" should be made exceptions to the provisions of this resolution. I do not see why they cannot be incorporated under general laws as well as any other corporations. It seems to me the Report is a little contradictory. It provides that "it is expedient to incorporate into the Constitution a provision that corporations may be formed under general laws, but shall not be created by special act." That is all very proper, and very easily understood; but why should banking or municipal corporations be exempted from this rule? I wish some gentleman would tell us why it is not possible or practicable that the objects of these corporations, as well as those of any others, may not be attainable under general laws.

Mr. COLE, of Cheshire. I had but one object in view in moving the amendment under consideration, and I will state that object. I believe there are many in our community who are opposed to passing any general laws for purposes of incorporation. They believe that there are many corporations which can never be reached by general laws. It occurred to me, that this class of persons would come up to the legislature every session, with petitions for acts of incorporation, and claim a hearing under the latter clause of this provision, upon the ground that their objects could not be attained by general laws. I think this provision is not clearly enough defined, to become a constitutional provision. I think every constitutional provision should be clearly defined, so that there can be but one meaning with regard to it. Now, if I am correct in saying that there are a great many talented and influential men who are opposed to general laws for objects of incorporation, that class of men will claim all they can possibly get under this latter clause. I think it will lead to a great deal of difficulty and misunderstanding in the legislature, and for that reason I move to strike out this latter clause.

The question naturally arises, who would be the judge in any particular case of application for incorporation, whether the objects of that corporation could be attainable under general law, or whether it would require a special act of the legislature. That is a question which, of course, must be decided by the legislature itself. Again, it may so happen that hereafter we may have a legislature a majority of which shall be opposed to these general acts for incorporation, and under this latter clause they may then proceed to pass as many special acts as they do now.

These are all the remarks which I have to make, and they are the reasons which induced me to move the amendment.

Mr. HUNTINGTON, of Northampton. If nobody else makes any answer to the remarks of the gentleman from Cheshire, (Mr. Cole,) I feel bound to say a word upon that subject. It seems to me, that the amendment proposed by that gentleman will accomplish too much. It seems to me, that there are a species of corporations which ought not to be cut off from the benefit of special acts. I allude to corporations for charitable, literary, and educational purposes. Many of the objects of these corporations cannot be attained by general laws, and I can see no objection to their being made the subjects of special acts. I would suggest, therefore, to the gentleman from Cheshire whether it would not operate injuriously upon institutions of this character unless they were made exceptions in his amendment. I have in my mind a corporation in my own county, which goes by the name of the "Smith Charities," involving hundreds of thousands of dollars, which are disposed of by will. The donor authorized, in his will, the trustees to obtain a general act for the purpose of carrying into effect the objects for which the property was left. The trustees very soon found it necessary, in the management of the property, to obtain such an act. They applied to the general court for it, and they were very willing to grant a special act for the management of these funds. There are many cases of that sort upon which the amendment of my friend from Cheshire would operate injuriously. I shall therefore vote against that amendment, believing the resolution better as it now stands.

In regard to the other class of exceptions for banking and municipal purposes, I agree that the Report should not be adopted as it now stands, without some explanation from the chairman of that Committee; for, without some such explanation, it will not be generally understood, and will be liable to misconception. As it now stands, any one would be led to suppose that the object of the Committee was to place banking and municipal corporations under general laws.

But I understand that such is not the intention, at least, as far as the banking institutions are concerned. I understand the object of this exception to be, merely to place the subject of banking corporations where it can be considered under a separate resolution hereafter. This is the reason, if I am not mistaken, for making these exceptions.

With regard to the amendment of the gentleman from Cheshire, (Mr. Cole,) I shall be compelled to vote against it for the reasons I have stated, unless some modification can be made, excepting these literary and charitable corporations. I am in favor of placing our general business corporations, however, under general law.

Mr. COLE, of Cheshire. I will then so modify my amendment as to except these literary and charitable institutions. The resolution as modified, would then read:—

Resolved, That it is expedient to incorporate into the Constitution a provision, that corporations may be formed under general laws, but shall not be created by special act, except for banking or municipal purposes, or where the object of the incorporations shall be for literary or charitable purposes.

My only object in moving this amendment was, so that business corporations should not be made subject to special acts, and I think the modification I have now made will meet the argument of the gentleman from Northampton, (Mr. Huntington).

Mr. FROTHINGHAM, of Charlestown. I rather regret that this subject has come before the Convention at this time, for the reason that the Report of the Committee who have the subject of banking in charge has been agreed upon in substance but not in form. The Report will be presented to the Convention in a short time, and this subject being connected in the manner in which it is with the other proposition, I think it would be more proper to consider the subjects together. In the next place, sometime ago an order was offered for obtaining certain information in relation to this whole matter of corporations. That information has been obtained, and it has long been in the hands of the printer, and it is expected every day that it will be printed and circulated among the members; but as yet the Convention have not had it in their possession. Under these circumstances, it seems to me that it might be better for us, to say the least, to consider this subject at once. Then again, there is before the Convention the great subject of representation. This matter in relation to general laws for corporations, and more particularly in relation to the great question of the currency, is a matter certainly of great importance. Is it well for the Convention to have so many great and important subjects under consideration at the same time? For one, I am in favor rather of taking up subjects one at a time, working our way through them, and settling them the best way we can. In that way, it seems to me, that we shall come to a more satisfactory conclusion than we shall by having so many subjects before us at one and the same time.

I am opposed to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Cheshire, (Mr. Cole,) because it is necessary to give the legislature that latitude in relation to the creation of incorporations which has been alluded to by the gentleman from Northampton, (Mr. Huntington). In this matter it may be well, perhaps, to resort to experience. There is in the New York Constitution the same restriction as to the creation of special acts of incorporation, and there the article reads:—

"Corporations may be formed under general laws, but shall not be created by special act except for municipal purposes, and in cases where, in the judgment of the legislature, the objects of the corporation cannot be obtained under general laws. All general laws and special acts passed pursuant to this section, may be altered from time to time or repealed."

It may excite some surprise to learn the extent to which this general system of legislation has been carried in New York. There, anybody can have a bank, but those that want facilities of this kind must comply with certain rules. Take the case of railroads. Any town or village in the great State of New York can have a railroad by applying for it. But those who want railroads must comply with certain severe rules and conditions as to taking land. I am informed by gentlemen who are competent to pass judgment in relation to that matter, and who have had occasion to examine the legislation of New York in reference to railroads, that the system adopted there in relation to that matter, both as it respects the great public, as it respects individual rights, and as it respects stockholders in corporations, is safer, and more generally satisfactory than that which has prevailed in Massachusetts. Still, there may be cases where it may not be practicable to accomplish the object desired without the aid of special charters, and therefore it is that I am opposed to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Cheshire, (Mr. Cole). Still, I did not rise for the purpose of discussing this matter of general legislation at length, and I hope now, that the subject may be allowed to rest until the information in relation to banks, which is already in the hands of the printer, shall be laid before the Convention.

Mr. STETSON, of Braintree. It strikes me that the Committee are not now prepared to enter upon a discussion of the general subject of incorporation, and as I said before, I think it would be better for the Committee to agree that discussion shall be had upon both these matters at the same time, and take up our regular business at this time. I therefore move that the Committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

The question was taken upon Mr. Stetson's motion, and a count being had, there were—ayes, 20; noes, 81.

Mr. BRADFORD, of Essex. It seems to me, that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Cheshire does not quite cover the whole ground. It may be necessary to make some exceptions where a general law should not apply. For instance, there may be some cases created by the administration of special trusts, which are not strictly literary and charitable, and for which it may be necessary to make provision. The expression made use of here in this Report is used in many other States where such a provision is adopted. Wisconsin was the first State that adopted a provision of this kind, and this was in 1846. The provision reads as follows:—

"Corporations, without banking powers or privileges, may be formed under general laws, but shall not be created by special act, except for municipal purposes, and in cases where, in the judgment of the legislature, the objects of the corporation cannot be attained under general laws. All general laws or special acts enacted under the provisions of this section, may be altered or repealed by the legislature at any time after their passage."

A similar provision is adopted in New York, Maryland, and several other States, and the exception is made in the same form of words.

Mr. WHITNEY, of Conway. I apprehend that the gentleman from Northampton, (Mr. Huntington,) and the gentleman from Cheshire, (Mr. Cole,) have not reflected with their usual deliberation upon the amendments which they have severally offered. The gentleman from Northampton instances corporations for charitable purposes. I cannot see any reason, if a man should bequeath a large property upon certain conditions, why a general law may not be as easily, as readily and fairly made for such a case as a special law. If gentlemen will reflect but a moment, they will see that there is no necessity in limiting the application to an act in relation to charities, even in that particular case. I am afraid that gentlemen have not reflected sufficiently upon this subject. If they will but bring their minds to bear upon this matter, they will see every principle of equality and justice demands that in every such case, the law should be a general and not a special one. You may make your general law and insert in it a clause, that citizens all over the Commonwealth, under like circumstances, may be incorporated with like privileges, and you do not injure to any body. The amendments offered here I believe to be altogether unnecessary, and I think that the gentlemen who have offered them will come to that conclusion. To my mind this matter appears so plain, that I do not deem it important or necessary to discuss the question. While I am up, I might say a word in relation to another matter. I suppose, if the provision in relation to banking and currency should become a part of the Constitution, that your Committee on Engrossment might incorporate the two resolutions into one. I see no loss of time or loss of principle in striking out the matter relating to banking, inasmuch as it was not in the hands of this Committee. I advocate a general law in relation to the subject of banking. If that is adopted then your Committee on Engrossment will take the two resolutions and embody them in a proper constitutional form, and therefore I think the matter now before us may be considered without prejudice to the other.

Mr. HUNTINGTON, of Northampton. I perceive that the gentleman from Conway, (Mr. Whitney,) did not understand me at all, when I had the floor before, or he would not have said that I had not given the subject sufficient reflection. I had given the subject sufficient reflection to be perfectly satisfied with his Report and resolve. I did not make a motion to strike out any part of it. The member from Cheshire, (Mr. Cole,) proposed to strike out a part of it, and I suggested to him, if he was intending to follow up his amendment, that he ought to improve it. I take it it is perfectly legitimate when an amendment is offered, to improve it, and then vote against it afterwards, if you choose to do so. I wish to say, that I do not intend to vote for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Cheshire, as I am inclined to believe the matter stands well enough as it is now. I think that some wisdom will survive this body, and that the general court hereafter will be better able to determine what subjects come within general laws and what subjects only come within special laws. I am willing to leave it to the wisdom of legislative bodies hereafter to settle this question, and I therefore shall support the resolution as it stands.

Mr. BARTLETT, of Boston. I am afraid that this topic requires a little more deliberation, than it is likely to receive. Applied to manufacturing and trading corporations, it is possible that a system of general laws may work advantageously. When applied to other corporations, I should have some doubt of the advantage of such a system. I will take a single class of corporations, and I will ask members of this Committee if they are willing that they shall be regulated by general law. Take the railroad corporations of this Commonwealth. What are the powers necessarily conceded to that class of corporations? They have a right of exercising the eminent domain of the State, and take any man's property at their will, and pay him a compensation, to be fixed by the county commissioners. How does the law guard that matter as it now stands? It provides for a special method of notice, for profiles and plans, and everything which can guard the rights of the private individual with the utmost care and scrutiny. Where is that power to be placed hereafter? Are gentlemen of this Convention willing that that power should be placed, under a general law, in the power of any body of men who choose to organize themselves for laying out railroads, traversing every portion of the Commonwealth, and taking private property for their use?

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask, whether all this matter of plans and profiles is not settled now by general law?

Mr. BARTLETT. I wish that it were. It stands upon general law, but the general law is waived at each session of the legislature, in each particular case, and the law is modified to meet the case.

Mr. BUTLER. Could not the legislature do it, if we put this clause in the Constitution?

Mr. BARTLETT. What I object to is putting the power into the hands of private speculators. I should feel safer to have the power with the legislature than with private persons. I fear to confide to a general law a power of that description, for I know not what cases it may reach. I hope the subject will be postponed, or disposed of in some way so as to receive further consideration.

Mr. BIRD, of Walpole. I understand the chairman of the Committee to take the ground, that even institutions for charitable or educational purposes may be organized under a general law.

Mr. WHITNEY. They can.

Mr. BIRD. If they can, then what is the necessity for that last clause of the resolution, "or where the object shall not be attainable under general laws?" This is a permission to the legislature to grant incorporations for special purposes, which, in their judgment, are required, and it opens a door for the whole question, and gives the legislature precisely the same power to grant special acts which they have now.

The legislature of the State of New York, now in session, has granted an act of incorporation to a private company for mere purposes of speculation, a ferry or a dry dock company, or something of the kind. The democratic papers in New York, argue that it is a violation of the Constitution, but a majority of the papers say, that they consider that the object could not be accomplished by a general law, and inasmuch as it is left for the legislature to determine, the charter is a good one. Here the clause is: "in cases where the objects of the corporation cannot be obtained under general laws." It is true the Committee have not put in the words, "in the judgment of the legislature;" but they are to decide whether the objects are obtainable under a general law. I think it is proper that this subject should be considered when the subject of banking is considered, and I hope that, at some time or other, the last clause will be struck out, for it leaves it in the power of the legislature to grant charters to whom they please.

One word as to railroad charters under general laws. Has there been a charter for a railroad asked for, which has been refused, for the last five years, when there was anything like a respectable case made out, unless a strong opposition has come from some rival company, who were afraid their own profits would be interfered with? I undertake to say, then, that for the last five years there has not been a case where there has been a bona fide subscription to the amount of fifty per cent. made, where the charter has been refused, unless there was strong opposition by some other corporation whose interests were likely to be interfered with. So it will be hereafter. It appears to me there is no more injury to result from extending it to railroads than to other corporations.

There is an idea that land is more sacred than any other description of property. I do not know why it is any more so than other property. The general law is framed with regard to private property; and I do not know why land is any more sacred than money, which represents land, or which will always buy it. But with regard to this last clause, I hope the gentleman, the chairman of the Committee, will give some reason for opening that loop-hole, through which the legislature will surely escape, and make as many charters as they please, for special purposes.

Mr. WHITNEY. The gentleman calls upon me for information. In my opening remarks to the Convention, I gave the reasons why the Committee inserted this resolution. I cannot do better than to adopt the language of the gentleman from Northampton, (Mr. Huntington). The Committee did not believe that all wisdom was to depart from this Commonwealth when this Convention was dissolved. I do not believe the legislature of Massachusetts are ever to create a corporation by a special act, where the objects are attainable under a general law. But if they should, the courts may pronounce the law unconstitutional. The gentleman says the legislature of New York have recently passed a special act. If he will go farther back into the legislation of New York, he will find that the New York legislature have passed three several acts at the same time, and that the courts have pronounced each of them unconstitutional. So the same thing has taken place in Ohio, and so it will be in this State. Our Constitution is finally to be interpreted by the Supreme Court. Our statutes are to be interpreted by that tribunal; and if the legislature should presume to go against the spirit and intention of that provision of the Constitution, or should proceed to incorporate a company where the objects are attainable by a general law, I have no doubt that the supreme court would pronounce it a violation of the Constitution and send it back to the legislature, and the objects would be reached by a general law. There can be no doubt about that.

GENERAL LAWS FOR CORPORATIONS. — WILSON — WHITNEY.

I do not think there is any danger from the insertion of this clause. I think if it was stricken out there would be no danger, and that we could reach all the objects necessary to be reached for incorporating companies by a general law. I think there should be a provision by which all citizens under like circumstances may enjoy like privileges. These are the reasons, in brief, which operated upon the Committee. I could go further into the argument, but it appears to me it is evident to every man who reflects, that no future legislature will depart from the general spirit and tone, or even the letter of the Constitution. If I thought otherwise, I would make the restriction more close than this resolve will do it.

Mr. WILSON, of Natick. I rise, Mr. Chairman, for the purpose of throwing out a very few suggestions in relation to this proposition. I will say, in the first place, to the friends of constitutional reform, that, in my judgment, this is a delicate question to deal with. We have more than four hundred millions of incorporated wealth in Massachusetts, and whatever we may think to the contrary, it has its influence in this hall and out of it. A great many men who control these corporations think "their hand feeds us," and a great many in this State admit that "their hand feeds us." Now, Sir, I am in favor of this proposition as reported by the Committee, with the single exception that I would not include railway companies. I am opposed to the amendment proposed by my friend from Cheshire, (Mr. Cole,) I think that all he and I wish to see accomplished, can be accomplished by the resolution, as reported by the chairman of the Committee; and that it will be safe to trust to future legislatures to create corporations, whenever, in the judgment of those legislatures, the object cannot be attained by general laws. Now, Sir, I agree with the gentleman from Boston, (Mr. Bartlett,) who has thrown out a suggestion in relation to railway corporations. With some forty or fifty millions of railway capital incorporated in this State, I am rather inclined to the opinion, that a great many persons who control these corporations, and a great many stockholders in them, would be alarmed by placing a provision of this kind into the Constitution. We give to railway corporations the power of eminent domain, and it will be in the power of any man, or of any set of men, if they choose to do so, to traverse this Commonwealth, and say to the farmers that this amended Constitution has a provision in it authorizing mammoth corporations to take their land, their homesteads, their dwellings, their castles, and to run their railroads through them, and they have no remedy whatever.

Mr. WHITNEY. If the gentleman will give way for a moment, I would suggest that that depends entirely upon the law. If a general law is made, the legislature will not give the right of eminent domain unless they choose. They will provide as they have done in New Hampshire, that the property of no individual shall be taken until it is settled for by an agreement. We do not settle the details in this matter; that depends upon general law. The railway law does not necessarily give the right of eminent domain.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Chairman, I will say to my friend from Conway, it is competent for the legislature to pass a general law now, without any alteration in the Constitution. If in the legislature, I should be willing to vote for a law to prevent any railway corporation from taking a foot of land until they had settled for it. But what I object to is, that this being placed in the Constitution may be used to prejudice a portion of the people against the amended Constitution. Now, Sir, I think it would be so, I may be mistaken; that gentleman may understand the public sentiment better than I understand it.

Then we are told they have a general railway law in New York. I am aware of it and I think it works well. The gentleman from Conway says, that when the Constitution is amended the legislature can, under the Constitution, make the right kind of a general railway law, I admit it, but what security has he that the legislature will do so? That is the question. I think, Sir, we have no security whatever. When we can carry such a law through the legislature, I think we can stand upon it before the people. But if you put into the Constitution a provision of this character, which simply provides that we shall have general laws upon the subject of railways, and trust to future legislatures, I think that it will array against the Constitution a strong opposition. If, Sir, you can go and show the people that you have protected their rights, then they will be satisfied.

I remember that after that accident on the railway in Connecticut, which shocked the whole country, of hearing an eminent merchant in Boston say, that he had $100,000 in railroad corporations, but that he was in favor of a law which would compel every such corporation to pay a fine of $25,000 for every passenger killed, and that as a stockholder he would vote for it. I remember, also, telling that gentleman on that occasion, that if men like him would go before the legislature, we might possibly get such a law. But according to my experience there has been no time in the last eight years when it was in the power of the legislature to pass a law of such a character. A proposition was instantly introduced after the accident I have referred to, into the House of Representatives by a gentleman from Boston, and the House started off in hot haste, but the whole thing broke down and exploded, just as every man knew it would. A gentleman near me suggests that it broke down in consequence of the railway influence. I do not believe there has been a legislature during the last six years, aye, ten years, through which we could carry any proposition against the railway influence and power. When a law is proposed that will put all railway corporations under general laws, and protect and secure the people against all harm thereby, I will go for it; but I am not willing to put a proposition of this character into the Constitution of this State, and then trust to future legislation to guard and protect the rights of the people.

I shall move, before I sit down, to insert the word "railway," so that it will read, "except for railway, banking and municipal purposes."

Now, in relation to business corporations, for religious and literary purposes, and for insurance corporations, I have no doubt that general laws should be passed, and that these laws can be made to accomplish all the purposes that special acts now accomplish.

The last legislature incorporated, or increased, the capital of corporations to the amount of $25,500,000. One hundred and fifty-eight special corporation acts were passed by the last legislature. I am told that business corporations, formed under the general law, introduced by my friend from Conway (Mr. Whitney), in 1851, came here at the last session of the legislature, and obtained special acts of incorporation.

Now, Sir, all this should be provided for by general acts of legislation. I would provide for it for another purpose. We have already provided that our legislative sessions shall close at the expiration of one hundred days; and therefore we must take away, if we can, by general acts, the special legislative questions, which have, during the past ten years, consumed at least one-third of the time of our legislatures.

There is another reason, and the greatest of all reasons, indeed; and that is, that it will preserve the purity of the legislature of this Commonwealth to have general acts of legislation for corporations. We talk a great deal about the purity of a large House of Representatives, but I have witnessed scenes here in this State House, which show the influence of this system of special legislation. We have annually here around the State House, while the legislature is in session, numbers of men who come here as the agents of these corporations, either to accomplish something for themselves, or to defeat somebody else. I have seen sitting in that Senate chamber, nine legal gentlemen, engaged in one case, all endeavoring to obtain special privileges; and there are gentlemen now within the hearing of my voice, who have received one, two or three thousand dollars here, for their services in advocating the granting of these special acts.

Mr. BIRD, (in his seat). I would like to inquire of the gentleman if all these special acts were not for railway purposes?

Mr. WILSON. Not all of them. I have seen some there who were agents to procure the passage of acts for other purposes besides railways,—for banking, insurance, and business purposes. I have been here more or less for twelve years, and a great part of these acts during that time, I admit, were for railroads. I will say here that I am in favor of a general railroad act, but I am not in favor of putting that act into our Constitution. I want some security, if we can get it; but I do not believe that it is in the power of the legislature to pass such an act as we need. I think if any legislation was ever demanded, legislation is demanded to protect the people of this Commonwealth who travel upon our railroads; but I do not believe that it is in the power of any body of men assembled here, to pass such laws against the combined power and influence of the fifty millions of dollars of railway capital. I hope, therefore, that my friend from Conway, (Mr. Whitney,) will consent to this amendment, that we shall leave out railway and banking corporations, and let those come up by themselves. My friend from Charlestown, (Mr. Frothingham,) the author of the banking law of 1851, and a gentleman who stood by it through good report and through evil report—through victory and defeat—has the banking question under his care, and I think that my friend from Cheshire, (Mr. Cole,) will not press his amendment. I think we had better leave something to the judgment of the legislature; and besides all that, I candidly believe, that if this is not stricken out, if we undertake to pass these through as they are, it will bring against this amended Constitution more power and strength than any other amendment which has been proposed. I think we have from four to five hundred millions of dollars of incorporated wealth in this State. I would not insert anything unnecessarily into the Constitution that might excite that influence into combined hostility against it. I think we shall have to labor hard enough, especially unless we settle the question with regard to the House of Representatives satisfactorily all around, to carry the Constitution, without doing anything that is not essential. Under the present Constitution we can pass general banking laws, general railroad laws, general insurance laws, and general laws relating to all business corporations, as well as to those for literary and charitable purposes. I am inclined to think, therefore, that we had better not include railway corporations in this proposition.

GENERAL LAWS FOR CORPORATIONS.—LORD.

MR. LORD, of Salem. Bing so nearly in agreement with the gentleman from Natick, I am very strongly tempted by that circumstance to take the floor, in order to express that agreement. I agree with him, that if you desire to defeat everything which has been done by this Convention, or what they may do, the best way to do that will be to array every individual's interest against it. To say that all men are equal, and that every man in this Commonwealth has a right to run a locomotive over his neighbor's farm, and take his land away, is a pretty certain way to lose a good many votes for your amended Constitution. I agree with the gentleman from Boston, that this great exigency, which must arrive before any private property ought to be taken for the public use, should be determined by the legislature, and not by any other tribunal. I agree with the gentleman from Natick, that the railroad interest is now too strong for even the legislature; and when it gets to be too strong for the legislature, everything else is as a mere rope of sand. A law was enacted here a few years ago that no railroad track should cross a travelled road upon the same grade with such road; but we put in another section, by the force and influence of the railroad interest, against my wish, and against my protest, that when the exigency of the case should require it, the county commissioners of the respective counties might permit a crossing upon the same grade. Well, Sir, in the great number of railroad crossings that have been made since that time, they have gone on in entire disregard of that law, and made their plans, surveys, and profiles, and actually begun the construction upon the same grade with the travelled road; and after that they have gone to the county commissioners, "Just see what a disadvantage and inconvenience it will be to us not to go upon the same grade; here are thousands, and perhaps hundreds of thousands of dollars already expended, and contracted to be expended, a great part of which will be lost if you do not permit us to go upon the same grade. We have already started upon this plan, and it will be the entire destruction of all that we have done, and a defeat of the road, unless we are allowed to cross at grades." What is the result of it? There has never been an instance, to my knowledge—and I have known fifty at least, and a hundred, I should think—where the railroad has been permitted to cross upon the same grade with the travelled road, notwithstanding the prohibition, and I have never known an independent crossing to be made by reason of that law. There is no power except legislation that can cope at all with the railroad interest. Perhaps that cannot, but at any rate I will try a little while longer before I give up that it cannot. Now, if you undertake to say that we shall give all men equal rights—that any man may start a railroad at any point he pleases, without any restriction as to how many companies shall go upon the same track, or whether they shall go half a mile apart or a mile apart, will there be any tribunal to determine how this shall be regulated? I understand that you are going to leave nobody to determine these things, but it is all to be done under general laws. But if you do not put this into the hands of somebody to determine who shall go and who shall not go, how long can railroad enterprises be prosecuted? After one corporation has constructed a road, should another corporation have a right to locate their road, if not over the same rails, at any rate, closely parallel to them? How long would people go into railroad enterprises under regulations of that kind?

But that is not the only kind of corporations that I object to being formed under a general law. I can conceive it possible that a corporation should be made for land purposes. I have been a member of the legislature for a number of years, but it never was my fortune to become acquainted with any case in which it was proper. A corporation of that kind I have always opposed with all my ability; but the legislature has not unfrequently in its wisdom incorporated them. There have been such, and it is probable that we should have plenty of them if you make a general law. Will you consent, Sir, to make a law by which all shall be equal, if it gives everybody the privilege of making land corporations, and converting all the lands in the large towns—everything except the agricultural districts—into personal estate, to be hawked about the market in shares, depriving all real estate of the right of dower, and making it nothing but a mere personal commodity? Why, Sir, I understand that the object is, to make everybody equal with everybody else, and to give no special privileges at all; but you say that any association of men may form whatever corporation they please for the purpose of trading in land; and in this way you will have not "Fifty Associates," holding almost real estate enough to control its value in the market in a city like this, but you will have fifty times fifty associates. Monopolies of trading in real estate will be at once springing up, and instead of being regulated by the legislature as they ought to be, they will be regulated only by the interests of speculators.

The gentleman from Northampton, (Mr. Huntington,) in alluding to a class of corporations fit for special legislation, did not specify any considerable part of those corporations which might properly be enumerated as within the principle. But his remarks suggested to me the idea of a great many others. There is a large class of corporations in this Commonwealth which I think ought to be kept within the grasp of the legislature; and I am unwilling to say in the Constitution that it shall be the duty of the legislature to facilitate the forming of these corporations. I do not say that there should not be corporations, but I want their rights and their duties strictly defined, in each instance, by the legislature, and especially would I have the necessity for the corporation always determined by the legislature. I do not want to leave the matter open for every individual to determine for himself. I have not unfrequently found myself in the legislature standing almost alone in opposing corporations. I go for holding corporations to a very strict accountability, because, Sir, we give them great power under the general policy of the Commonwealth; and in every instance I think it proper that the legislature should pass upon the necessity of their creation. I have had an application, not a great while ago, professionally, to advise a mode in which a corporation could be formed under general law in this Commonwealth, to commence a prosecution of a piratical enterprise, against an existing and adjudicated patent right, to be carried on in such a manner that the proprietors could not be held to an individual responsibility under it. Before corporations are created, I want to know their purpose. I want to know their necessity, and I think it important that there should be some proper tribunal to determine these things, and to refuse corporate powers unless in the particular case, they are shown to be necessary.

I am opposed to the entire resolution for the reasons which I have stated, and for the further reason that it does not seem to me to be a proper subject to introduce into the fundamental law; and having already more than once expressed my views upon that subject, I refrain from any exposition of them now. I am opposed to this resolution in its present form; for, in my judgment, the latter clause renders the whole nugatory. It says that these corporations shall not be created by special act, except for banking or municipal purposes, or where the object of the incorporation shall not be attainable under general laws. Suppose there be difference of opinion whether the object of the incorporation be attainable under general laws or not, what is the legislature to do in that case? Who is to decide this question? I believe that the chairman of the Committee designs to have it understood that the supreme court is to be the judge whether it is attainable under general laws or not. I do not so understand it. I am dealing with a constitutional provision. The constitutional provision is; where these purposes are not attainable under general laws. Who is to determine that proposition? I think we must all agree that the legislature is to determine that. Now, Sir, suppose I am a member of the legislature,—which I trust I never shall be again till I am in a condition to be so with less personal sacrifice than it has heretofore cost me,—suppose I should be, I believe that the true objects of railway corporations cannot be attained by general laws, and I act upon that conviction. I believe the same thing with regard to many of the other objects of corporations, for which gentlemen want to pass general laws. I must vote for special laws, and perhaps the majority of the legislature are of my opinion, and special legislation is had. Perhaps, however, the very next year there is a legislature that accedes to this general proposition, and makes general laws upon all subjects upon which corporations can be formed; but before the session is through, or perhaps not until the next session, when the next legislature comes together, it is decided at once that these particular objects cannot be accomplished by general laws, and these persons are incorporated. Here, then, you have, upon precisely the same subject matter, one set of corporations going on under general laws, while another is going on under special laws, just exactly as they go on now, though I believe now corporations are pretty much under special law; for those who were organized under general laws to a considerable extent last winter, came to the legislature and obtained authority under special laws.

GENERAL LAWS FOR CORPORATIONS, &c. — COLE — STETSON — NAYSON.

I am very happy to receive the concurrence of my friend from Boston, near me, (Mr. Bartlett,) who suggests to me again, the opinion, that the discretion is to be exercised by the legislature—it is for them to decide whether the object is attainable under general laws, or whether a special act is required; and they are accountable to no other branch for the mode in which they exercise that discretion. Entertaining these general views upon this subject, I think it will be unwise to undertake to make any provision at all with regard to the matter; or if we do make any provision in relation to the subject, I would simply say, that trading corporations, excepting such as deal in land, might be incorporated under general laws and not by special laws. I would have it go no further, because it seems to me, that for everything excepting merely trading corporations, the legislature should always intervene before a charter is granted. It is not a conclusive argument to tell me that the legislature has not always acted wisely. Public sentiment will control them. I think if the legislature has not acted wisely, that is no reason for putting this power into the hands of a tribunal that is not so likely to act wisely as the legislature is. It is one of the imperfections incident to human government, that the legislature shall sometimes act unwisely; but I think it is the safest tribunal with which to intrust a power of such vast magnitude as this with regard to the regulation of corporations.

Mr. COLE, of Cheshire. I would ask the gentleman from Natick, (Mr. Wilson,) whether he intended to be understood as saying, that he did not believe that the objects of railroad corporations could be obtained under general laws.

Mr. WILSON. I said I believed they could be.

Mr. COLE. I think by this time, and after listening to the discussion which has taken place, and to the arguments which have thus far been advanced, the Committee cannot fail to be deeply impressed with the impropriety of adopting the last clause of this resolve. I refer to that part of it which provides that special corporations may be granted "in cases where the objects of incorporation cannot be obtained under general laws."

It occurred to me in the first instance, that men acting upon the honest convictions of their minds, might differ in their opinions as to the possibility of the objects of a particular corporation being attainable under general laws. And, after hearing what has been the operation of a provision, similar to this, in the Constitution of another State, where the legislature, acting under the power conferred upon them by that provision, granted certain acts of incorporation, and the supreme court, subsequently decided those acts to be unconstitutional, and thus raised a conflict between the legislative and judicial authorities, I am more entirely satisfied of the impropriety of adopting such a provision. It proves to my mind, that, in forming a constitutional provision, we ought to define particularly its operation, so that there can be no ground for a difference of opinion, no ground to lead to such results as have occurred in a neighboring State. I think in the first place, the resolve ought to define the very objects which should be embraced in the general laws, and leave the rest of the ground wholly undisturbed; or if the exceptions are made, they ought to be made so definitely that there can be no misunderstanding about them.

Now, the resolution goes upon the principle of restricting legislative action in relation to granting charters of incorporation. It begins by making exceptions, and defines some of the exceptions, for instance, corporations for banking, and for municipal purposes. And now, if I understand the motion of the gentleman from Natick, (Mr. Wilson,) it is to include another definite exception, that of railroad corporations. Then, in addition to these three specified exceptions, we bring in another clause of exception, quite general in its nature, and which covers the whole ground, and leaves future legislatures to decide what it includes. We know they will decide according to the honest convictions of their minds; but there is a class of men who do not believe that the objects of corporations can, under any circumstances, be obtained under general laws. To my mind it is perfectly evident, that in a few years, even under this provision, acts of incorporation will be passed by the legislature for almost any object. If that shall be the result, as I believe it will, this resolve ceases to be a restriction, and the object of it fails entirely.

Now I am not very particular, but I feel desirous that every provision which we incorporate into the organic, fundamental law of the Commonwealth shall be well defined, and so clear and definite as not to be susceptible of doubt as to its meaning, and they should be made definite either by defining particularly the subjects which should come under the operation of general laws, or by specifying the exceptions with equal definiteness.

Mr. STETSON, of Braintree. I intend to trouble the Committee with but a few remarks. I do not see any reason why this resolve should not stand as worded in the original Report, except that I should be in favor of the amendment spoken of by the gentleman from Natick, (Mr. Wilson). In that respect I think the resolve does not go far enough, for if there is to be any exception to the operation of the rule of general laws for corporations, the case of railroad corporations should be one of them; and the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Natick, will, if adopted, accomplish that end.

I do not agree with the gentleman who last addressed the Committee, (Mr. Cole,) in the opinion that the latter part of the resolve should be stricken out, for I do not think that we can specify, in any resolve, all the objects for which corporations may be necessary, or which the people of the Commonwealth may desire; nor can we foresee that all corporations which may be desired by the people, can be attained under general laws, and therefore there seems to be a necessity of such a general clause of exception. There can be no danger that corporations for manufacturing purposes, and others of a similar character, will be so misunderstood as to bring them under the operation of such a clause. Therefore, I trust the Convention will adopt, if it is offered, the amendment alluded to by the gentleman from Natick, (Mr. Wilson,) and then that the resolve as it now stands, with that amendment, will be adopted.

Mr. NAYSON, of Amesbury. I take it for granted that the primary object of the Committee which reported the resolve, was to confer upon the legislature the power and authority to enact general laws in regard to the incorporations of companies. That, I suppose, is the principle object to be effected by the resolve, and if that be so, then, as a member of this Committee of the Whole, I desire to be able to give my vote understandingly, and also to vote consistently with the principles which I entertain upon this subject.

The resolve, as it now stands reported from the Committee, proposes to except from the operation of general laws corporations for banking, and for municipal purposes. Now, it appears to me, that if we are called upon to vote for the resolve precisely as submitted to the Convention by the Committee, it involves, to at least a portion of the Committee, a question of consistency to a considerable degree. It is known that we have upon the statute book, at the present time, a general banking law, and if I mistake not, the chairman of the Committee which reported this resolve, (Mr. Whitney, of Conway,) advocated before the legislature, and voted for that general banking law. Now, it became my duty, as a member of the legislature which terminated its session a few weeks since, to vote upon this very question of repealing or sustaining that law, and I voted to maintain it. Therein, the resolve involves an inconsistency, so far as my own act, and that of others, is concerned, in so far as we are called upon to exempt from the operation of this, or some other general law, the banking corporations of this Commonwealth. Such being the case, if I understand the matter correctly, as an advocate of a general banking law, I cannot give my vote for the resolve now under consideration. I desire to vote understandingly, and at the same time in entire consistency with my previous course.

I would suggest, therefore, with great deference, to the Committee which reported the resolve, that, if the main purpose be to confer upon the legislature the power of passing general laws for the incorporation of such institutions as may be needed, why is it necessary to make any limitation whatever? If the mere declaration of a principle, is all that is intended or desired, why not so express it, without any limitation or restriction, leaving to the legislature the right to apply, practically, those principles as may be deemed most expedient? Such being my view, in order to effect that object, I propose to amend the resolve, and I hope it will concur with the view of the chairman of the Committee. I propose to strike out all after the words "general laws" where it first occurs, and insert in lieu thereof the words, "in all cases where the object of such corporation is attainable under the same, and where provision is thus made by general laws that no corporation shall be formed by special act"—so that the resolve shall read:—

Resolved, That it is expedient to incorporate into the Constitution, a provision that corporations may be formed under general laws in all cases where the object of such corporation is attainable under the same; and where provision is thus made by general laws, no corporation shall be formed by special act.

It seems to me, taking for granted what I sup-

GENERAL LAWS FOR CORPORATIONS.—WHITNEY—LORD—ALLEY—DAVIS.

pose to be the object sought to be attained here, viz.: a mere declaration of principle, that the legislature shall have general power in these cases, by adopting that amendment we shall do all that is desirable. I think it would be more safe to stop here, after making that declaration, than it would to undertake to make constitutional restrictions which time and experience might declare to be unnecessary and inexpedient. I therefore move to strike out all after the words, "general laws" and insert in lieu thereof, the words which I have read.

Mr. WHITNEY, of Conway. My friend from Amesbury, (Mr. Nayson,) is right in supposing that the resolve is designed to confer upon the legislature power to create corporations. But it goes further, and says they shall not be incorporated by special act, and therein lies the whole virtue of the resolution. If my friend had included that part of the resolution in his amendment, I would have agreed with him, for, to the exceptions in the original resolution, I have no particular attachment. The remarks of the gentleman from Salem, (Mr. Lord,) will suggest to my friend from Amesbury, (Mr. Nayson,) the necessity of the provision that these corporations should not be created by special act. Why? He says to you truly, that we have an act allowing parties to self-incorporate themselves for manufacturing purposes. It was an act prepared by the wisdom of the whole legislature, assembled from all parts of the Commonwealth, and therefore carefully prepared—an act which every member of the legislature felt would bear directly upon his own constituency, and therefore, they were careful in the preparation and passage of that act, as will be the case in reference to the passage of all general laws, where you bring to bear upon it the mind of every member of the legislature. It was a guarded law, and provided that stockholders should be liable for all labor performed within a certain period of time named, and for other things, and that the names of the stockholders should be recorded in the town clerk's book where the corporation was located, in order that every person might know who they were, whether they were sound or rotten men. It is a safe and a well guarded law, as any general law always will be. But how is it with special laws? Parties come into the legislature and ask for the passage of special laws, and why? That they may be able to avoid the provisions which the assembled wisdom of the legislature of the Commonwealth had incorporated into the general law. And how do they do it? They will send up interested parties to the legislature; they will procure a good lawyer, who can drive a shrewd bargain with the legislature, and when they come here they find one hundred or more, other men, upon the same errand of procuring from the legislature acts of a local and private nature, bestowing special privileges to advance their own private interests. Now, the application for the creation of a private corporation out in Washington might not particularly affect the constituents of the member from Cape Cod. It is a hundred and fifty miles away from him, and he pays little attention to it. Or perhaps Cape Cod wants a charter of special privileges, and that representative says: You vote for my proposition, and I will vote for yours. In this manner are these special and unequal privileges granted to the inhabitants of different parts of the Commonwealth. Honest men will not seek these advantages over their fellow men. Men who are willing to stand upon an equal footing with their fellow citizens in all the relations of life, and depend upon their own energy and enterprise for success, will never come here for a charter under a special law, securing special and unequal privileges.

I did not design to go fully into the question, but I rose simply to say, that my friend is right in his supposition, inasmuch as this provision provides for the creation of corporations, but it also provides that they shall not be created by special act.

The gentleman from Salem, (Mr. Lord,) says: are you to go to the farmers of this Commonwealth, and tell them that corporations are to run railroads through any lands which they choose? Do you suppose that the farmers are so void of common sense as to believe that there is more danger when they send up their farmers here to make laws which affect equally every property holder, than when men come here to lobby through their special acts, in which all the people are not interested, and which are not founded upon the general sense and general interest of the Commonwealth? No, Sir; the danger all lies in special legislation, here, and safety is on the side of general laws.

Mr. LORD, of Salem. Does not the gentleman violate his general theory? He started with the proposition, that every man should have the same right that his neighbor has, and if one has a right to build a railroad between two points, another should have the same right. Does not he destroy that right in saying what he has?

Mr. WHITNEY. The gentleman is right in part and wrong in part. The law which says that a man may marry, is a general law, but that law does not say he may marry another man's wife. So, a law which says you may make a railroad, does not say that you may construct it over another railroad. There is no danger here that a law will be framed to authorize one railroad to be laid upon the top of another.

The gentleman has well said that the railroad corporations in this State constitute a power greater than any other in the State, and that power will be represented here with an influence which will ever prevent your legislative body from making too liberal a railroad law. The interests of the old corporations will be protected here. There will be no trouble about that. The trouble will be that your railroad laws will not be liberal enough, and you may provide that the stock shall all be paid in before the company shall go into operation, or some such restrictive provisions will be attempted. You will meet here all the influence of the existing corporations, the sixty-eight millions of capital now upon the statute book. There is no danger from general laws, for every man's interest is intermixed with every other man's interest, and they will be framed with all the care and deliberation which men use when they know that they must answer to the people of the Commonwealth for their actions, which affect the interests of all parties and all business.

Mr. ALLEY, of Lynn. I wish to say a word in explanation of my vote upon this question. I shall vote for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Cheshire, (Mr. Cole,) believing, that if the amendment should prevail, it will be more likely to secure the defeat of the whole resolve than if it should be allowed to stand as it now is; and I hope the Report of the Committee will not be adopted, for the reason, not that I am opposed to general laws in reference to nearly all these questions, for as a member of the legislature I should vote in favor of general laws, but that I am entirely opposed to this resolve, because I believe that if it should be adopted it would endanger the Constitution before the people. I believe that if we array the whole railroad interest against the Constitution—and that would be the case if such a resolve as this should be passed—together with the whole farming interest of the Commonwealth; if, as has been remarked, you allow the people of the Commonwealth, or any corporation or company to exercise the right of eminent domain, and take any man's land and homestead when they pleased, it would raise such an opposition against the Constitution that it would be voted down by a large majority. Upon that ground, therefore, I should be opposed to the Constitution.

Another thing: if there is to be any exception in favor of any corporation, it does seem to me that railroad corporations, of all others, should be excepted. But as the resolution stands, there is one class of corporations which has already been provided for by general laws, and which is to be excepted, and it does seem to me that if any class of corporations in this Commonwealth should not be excepted it is that of banking corporations. But as that amendment, offered by the gentleman from Braintree, has been voted down, I for one, cannot give my vote for the resolution.

The question was taken upon the adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from Cheshire, (Mr. Cole,) and it was decided in the negative.

So the amendment was not adopted.

Mr. WILSON, of Natick, moved to insert after the word "municipal" the words "or railway."

The amendment was, upon a division—ayes, 91; noes, 32—adopted.

Mr. BIRD, of Walpole, moved to amend by inserting after the word "municipal" the word "manufacturing."

If this amendment were adopted, he said, the resolve, he thought, would be perfect.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. NAYSON, of Amesbury, moved to amend, by striking out all after the word "laws," and inserting the following: "In all cases where the object of such corporations is attainable under the same, and where provision is thus made by general laws, no corporation shall be formed by special act."

Mr. DAVIS, of Worcester, offered the following as a substitute for the resolve reported by the Committee.

Resolved, That it is expedient to incorporate into the Constitution a provision, that corporations shall not be created by special act, when the object of the incorporation can be attained under general laws.

This, he remarked, was making no exception, but leaving it to the legislature to determine when the case comes up, if it can be done by a general law, to make a general law for it. If it cannot, then to pass a special act.

The CHAIRMAN ruled that the proposed substitute was not now in order, there being an amendment pending, with the view of perfecting the original resolve. The question being on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Amesbury,

Mr. BUTLER, of Lowell. I move, Sir, as the hour is now so near when we have to adjourn, in obedience to a standing order of this Convention, that the Committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

The motion was agreed to, and the Committee accordingly rose, and the President having resumed the Chair of

THE CONVENTION,

The chairman of the Committee of the Whole reported progress, and leave was granted to the Committee to sit again.

On motion by Mr. WHITNEY, of Conway, the Convention adjourned until 3 o'clock, P. M.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The Convention re-assembled at three o'clock.

Mr. ALLEN, of Worcester, from the Committee on the Frame of Government, submitted the following Reports, which were severally referred to the Committee of the Whole and ordered to be printed. First, in relation to

The Right of Married Women to hold Real Estate.

COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS.

In Convention, June 27, 1853.

The Committee on so much of the Constitution as relates to the Frame of Government, &c., to whom was referred an order of June 3d, instructing them to consider the expediency of securing to women, by constitutional provision, their property, acquired by devise, inheritance, or otherwise, and an order of May 20th, on the same subject, report; that, in the opinion of the Committee, greater security than is now afforded by law, ought to be provided for the preservation to married women of the property acquired by them, through the kindness of parents and friends, or by their own industry and prudence. The Committee have seen, with much satisfaction, that, of late years, the course of legislation, and the decisions of enlightened judicial tribunals, have tended towards the alleviation of hardship and injustice resulting from the absolute control which the husband and his creditors have had over most of the property of the wife. Evils still exist which may be diminished or removed by legal enactment. But the Committee believe that the remedy can be most safely and beneficially applied by the action of the legislature, adjusting, in detail, the somewhat complicated relations which result from the marriage contract. They, therefore, report that it is inexpedient for the Convention to act thereon.

Remedy at Law.

Mr. MORTON, of Taunton, submitted the following Report from the Committee on the Judiciary, and, upon his motion, it was referred to the Committee of the Whole and ordered to be printed.

COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS.

In Convention, June 27, 1853.

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred an Order of June 6th, relating to granting the subject "a certain remedy in law, prompt and without delay," and an Order of June 6, relating to the codification of the laws, have considered the same, and report that it is inexpedient to take further action upon the same.

MARCUS MORTON, Chairman.

Further time granted to a Committee to Report.

The Committee on the Frame of Government, upon motion by Mr. ALLEN, of Worcester, was granted further time to consider, and report upon the remaining subjects submitted to them.

On motion by Mr. BUTLER, of Lowell, the Convention resolved itself into

COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE,

Mr. Wilson, of Natick, in the Chair, upon the subject of

The Basis of Representation.

The CHAIRMAN stated the pending question to be, upon the adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from Lowell, (Mr. Butler,) as modified by himself, and as amended by the Committee.

Mr. BOUTWELL, for Berlin. I am not disposed to trouble the Committee with any observations at this time, yet I am inclined to interfere now, rather than that the vote should be taken at this time upon the proposition now before the Committee, because it seems to me, that two things being settled, one by the Convention that the district system ought not to be adopted, and the other by the friends of the Majority Report, that some concession shall be made to the friends of the district system, and, inasmuch as the proposition of the gentleman from Lowell, (Mr. Butler,) is, after all, very near the result to which this Committee and the Convention will finally come. I am, therefore, disposed to favor a course of proceeding which shall allow each member of the Committee, having a proposition of his own, to submit it, and have it fairly considered before the Committee, with an opportunity to present his own views upon it, before the question is taken upon the amendment now under consideration. Each one of these propositions, as I understand them, is in the nature of a compromise, as is the proposition of the gentleman from Lowell, now before us. Therefore, believing as I do, that the proposition to which you, Mr. Chairman, just now directed the attention of the Committee, to contain many of the provisions which will ultimately be adopted by the Convention, I am of opinion that it will be preferable that the others shall be presented and disposed of first. If, then, there are gentlemen who have propositions, which they desire to bring before the Committee this afternoon, I think it will be well to consider them now, but if not, and if no one is disposed to continue the discussion, I think the Committee had better rise and ask leave to sit again.

I did not rise for the purpose of entering into this discussion this afternoon, but simply for the purpose, if gentlemen are not prepared now to go on with the discussion, to move that the Committee do now rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again. If any gentleman, however, wishes

Mr. NAYSON. In offering that amendment, my object was, as I stated this morning, merely to embody, in a concise form, the declaration of principle which I supposed the Committee were desirous of engrafting upon the Constitution, a principle conferring upon the legislature general power to enact laws for the regulation of corporations. That is the object, as I understand, of the resolve in question, and such I understand to be the explanation of the chairman of the Committee who reported that resolve. In offering that amendment, I supposed I was doing what would receive the approbation of the chairman of the Committee. If I am mistaken in that supposition, and if the chairman of the Committee is desirous of obtaining a vote upon the resolve as it came from the Committee, I should feel it my duty to withdraw the amendment I have proposed.

GENERAL LAWS FOR CORPORATIONS. — UPTON — DAVIS — NAYSON — LORD.

Mr. WHITNEY, of Conway. I should like to have the sense of the Committee upon the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. UPTON, of Boston. I did not think of saying a word upon this question before I came in here, and now shall trouble the Committee but a moment. It seems to me, if we adopt any provision upon this subject, it must be the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Amesbury, (Mr. Nayson). I confess I was astonished, this morning, to hear the remarks of gentlemen upon this subject who are familiar with legislation and the manner in which legislation is effected. It is proposed by the Report of the Committee that you shall have special laws, and special laws only, excepting for certain cases, and those cases to be specified. Suppose you put upon your statute books these special laws. I ask gentlemen of this Committee if they intend to apply the provision of this Report to the special legislation which has already taken place in Massachusetts in certain cases, and put these cases under general laws; because if you do, you not only array against them the whole of these corporations but every other corporation hereafter to be created; provided those laws are not liberal enough. It does seem to me, therefore, as a matter of safety, as they began under acts of incorporation, it is better to leave them as they are than to undertake to put a provision in your Constitution specifying and defining the acts which shall come under some general act. If we were about to commence de novo, it would be a very different question. Take, for instance, the railroad interest in this Commonwealth. You have established, and have already a number of special railroad acts incorporating private railroad companies. If you undertake to change the system of legislation in regard to them, of course you array all these companies against any good legislation. This rule will apply to the legislation which has taken place, and I think that there was wisdom and sagacity in the remark of the gentleman from Natick, (Mr. Wilson,) when he stated this morning, that this would be one of the most difficult questions to be considered by the people. As, for instance, in the case of the railroad act, if any existing arrangement with regard to railroads already established should be disturbed, it would produce very great difficulty indeed. We have railroads running from this city to Salem, to Lowell, and various other points. Do gentlemen propose to have any general act by which another railroad shall be established between this city and Lowell, or this city and Salem? All of these various questions may and will come up in a way in which you cannot meet them easily. If you insert in the Constitution a general provision, that no special act shall be granted where general acts do not apply, I confess, the question, to my mind, will go to the people of the Commonwealth in about as unsatisfactory shape as any question can be presented. I should say, that where general acts of incorporation would apply, that there should be no special acts, and if I understood the amendment of the gentleman from Amesbury, (Mr. Nayson,) it provides that there shall be no special acts where the legislature has made provision for meeting the case by the passage of a general act. I hope, therefore, that the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Amesbury, as it is an important one, may meet the views of the Committee and be adopted.

The question was then taken on Mr. Nayson's amendment, and a count being had, there were—ayes, 96; noes, 27.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORTON, of Quincy. I move that the Committee rise and report to the Convention that the resolution ought not to pass.

The question was taken on Mr. Morton's motion and it was not agreed to—ayes, 61; noes, 119.

Mr. DAVIS, of Worcester. I do not understand precisely the condition of the question at this time. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Cheshire, (Mr. Cole,) being rejected by the Committee, I immediately arose, and, in my place, made a motion to substitute a new resolve in its place. That substitute was stated to the Committee of the Whole, but for some reason, another proposition is substituted in its place. I rise to ascertain how this matter stands.

The CHAIRMAN. All the various propositions offered have been considered in the light of independent propositions and not as amendments. The design was, to take the question upon each one in the order in which it was proposed. There was one failure to preserve that order. The gentleman from Walpole, (Mr. Bird,) introduced an amendment that the word "manufacturers" should be introduced in the proposition, and the question, by mistake, was taken upon it at the time, but in all other respects, the Chair, in taking the question, has followed the order in which the amendments were introduced. The gentleman from Cheshire, (Mr. Cole,) introduced the first amendment, which was rejected. The gentleman from Natick, (Mr. Wilson,) introduced the second, which was adopted. Then, before the gentleman from Worcester, (Mr. Davis,) presented this proposition, the gentleman from Amesbury, (Mr. Nayson,) introduced his amendment, and the question has now been taken upon it. Had that been rejected, then the proposition of the gentleman from Worcester, (Mr. Davis,) would have been considered. If the gentleman from Worcester wishes to offer his amendment as a substitute for that just adopted, he has opportunity now of doing so.

The resolve, as amended, is as follows:—

Resolved, That it is expedient to incorporate into the Constitution the provision, that corporations may be formed under general laws, in all cases, where the object of such corporations is obtainable under the same; and where provision is thus made by general laws no incorporation shall be formed by special act.

That is the form in which the resolution now stands before the Committee.

Mr. DAVIS, of Worcester, I would rather prefer to have the phraseology a little altered, but carrying out precisely the same principle. I do not know that, inasmuch as it is simply a proposition to go to the Engrossing Committee, it would be worth while to propose any change.

Mr. NAYSON. I have no manner of objection that the gentleman from Worcester should have an opportunity to introduce his proposition, so that it may have the action of the Committee. Deferring to the superior judgment of the gentleman from Worcester, I am not tenacious at all about having my proposition retained; and for the purpose of affording him an opportunity to introduce his, I will, if the gentleman desires it, move a reconsideration of the vote adopting my amendment. I think, however, they are very nearly precisely alike.

Mr. DAVIS. I do not desire to have the gentleman make the motion he proposes.

The question was then taken on the adoption of the resolve, as amended, and it was decided in the affirmative.

On motion by Mr. WILSON, the Committee then rose, reported the resolve, as amended, to

THE CONVENTION,

With a recommendation that it do pass.

The question on concurring in the amendment made in Committee, was decided in the affirmative.

The question then recurred on ordering the resolve to a second reading.

Mr. BUTLER. On that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

There being a division, on the question of granting the yeas and nays on the question of ordering the resolve to a second reading, there were—ayes, 46; noes, 152.

So the yeas and nays were ordered, there being one-fifth voting in the affirmative.

Mr. LORD, of Salem. I do not precisely understand the phraseology of the amendment, whether the mover intended that if there should have been a general law passed, no special act shall be passed upon the subject. If that is not not what it means, then when there is a majority in favor of passing any special act, they must first repeal the general act. It does not seem to be worth while to put such a clause in the Constitution. That seems to me to be the whole of the proposition; that the same power that desires to create a special act shall not do it till they have repealed the general act. I do not know that I understand it.

Mr. NAYSON. I am not surprised that the gentleman from Salem does not understand the proposition, for those who know his course with regard to the general law on the subject of banking last winter, know that he is not in favor of such a law. But I suppose the gentleman will give me credit for understanding the amendment which I had the honor to submit to the Committee. As an illustration, take the general banking law of this State, and which the gentleman from Salem has had occasion to pass his opinion upon. We have had that law on our statute book for some time; and until it is repealed, if this provision is put into the Constitution, it will not be competent for the legislature to grant any special act so long as that general banking law is retained. That principle may apply with regard to many corporations. I take it that the gentleman from Salem understands that principle so well that he will not consider me so stupid as not to know what this Committee have accepted and adopted. It seems to me to be a very plain matter, and the banking law is a good illustration in point; and I presume that the gentleman from Salem will admit that to be the operation of the principle generally.

Mr. LORD. I have learned from the gentleman just what I desired, simply to know what was his understanding of the proposition. Now the gentleman did not quite do me justice when he said I had repeatedly expressed an opinion against the banking law. I was a member of the legislature last winter, and I expressed no opinion against it at that time, for I had no such opinion that I desired to express, and I found no occasion when I felt called upon to express any opinion on the subject. And let me tell him, that I do not think that that banking law could have stood with that legislature or any other legislature against any determination they might have had to make a special act; no, Sir, not for an hour. Therefore, you put into the Constitution a provision which the legislature could repeal at any moment. I think it is hardly worth while. Last year petitions came in for special acts in relation to banks, and the legislature were willing to grant them; but inasmuch as many desired the general law to stand, they were content that it should remain, in order that if any persons desired to avail themselves of its provisions they might do so. But suppose this provision had been in the Constitution, what must the legislature have done? They must first have repealed the general banking law, before they could have incorporated any bank under a special charter. Now, when we have adopted this provision in the Constitution, there will be nothing to prevent the legislature from passing as many special charters as they choose. If the legislature desires to pass a special act they will use the means necessary to accomplish their purpose; and if it be necessary, in order to do so, to repeal a general law, then that general law will, of course, be repealed. I am very happy to understand the designed operation of this amendment. I supposed that the gentleman must have meant, that whenever the legislature shall once have exercised the authority and made the law, that that law should be irrevocable by the legislature for the purpose of granting special charters; but that not being his purpose, it seems to me, it only requires the legislature, if the amendment be adopted, to do circuitously what they might otherwise do directly.

Mr. WHITNEY. I find that some gentlemen around me do not understand the resolution, as amended. We have ordered the yeas and nays on that resolution as amended, and as a friend of that resolution, I fear that many gentlemen will not vote understandingly upon it at present. I therefore would move, as it is now on its second reading, that we reconsider the vote ordering the yeas and nays, and order the resolve to be printed, so that when the question is taken, we may act understandingly. It seems to me, that there is an alteration of the language, which I must confess, that I do not fully comprehend myself. I would like to examine it in its printed form.

Mr. BUTLER. I would like to suggest in some form, that the object sought to be obtained by the gentleman from Conway, can be obtained if he will withdraw his motion.

Mr. WHITNEY. I will withdraw it.

Mr. BUTLER. My object is, that when the question shall be taken upon this resolution, it may be taken by yeas and nays. Now, as I understand, the resolve may be amended, altered or postponed; but that upon its final passage, when it is put into the form in which the Convention are desirous of having the question taken, then the yeas and nays are to be had. Therefore, the gentleman from Conway can obtain his object by moving to postpone the taking of the question till to-morrow. With his consent, I will make that motion, that it be postponed till to-morrow and that it be printed as amended.

Mr. DAVIS. Is it in order for me to offer an amendment.

The PRESIDENT. Not unless the pending motion is withdrawn.

Mr. BUTLER. I will withdraw it to accommodate the gentleman.

Mr. DAVIS. I then move the following substitute for the resolve.

Resolved, That it is expedient to incorporate into the Constitution a provision, that corporations shall not be created by special act, when the object of the corporation shall be attainable under general laws.

The question being then taken on the motion to postpone until to-morrow, it was agreed to.

Qualifications of Voters.

Mr. WILSON, of Natick, moved that the Convention resolve itself into Committee of the Whole, upon the resolves in relation to the loss of residence in consequence of absence on the business of the State or of the United States, and also respecting idiots, insane persons, and persons convicted of infamous crimes, which had been reported by the Committee on the Qualifications of Voters.

The motion was agreed to.

The Convention accordingly resolved itself into

COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE.

Mr. Frothingham, of Charlestown, in the Chair, and proceeded to consider the said resolves. They were read as follows:—

Resolved, That the Constitution be so amended, as to provide that no person shall be deemed to have lost his residence in this Commonwealth by reason of his absence while on the business of this State or of the United States.

Resolved, That no idiot or insane person, or person convicted of a felony, unless pardoned and restored to the right of suffrage, shall be entitled to vote in any election.

Mr. HOOPER, of Fall River. I wish to inquire of the Committee who reported these resolves, what effect this special provision, that persons shall not lose their residence by reason of their absence on the business of the State or of the United States, will have upon other cases of absence. I believe that the general practice is now, that persons absent from the State upon their own business do not lose their residence. There are citizens in the section from which I come, comprising quite a large class, who follow the sea, and they are gone for years sometimes on fishing voyages. I wish to understand from the Committee who reported this resolve, whether this special provision, in regard to absence on public business, is intended to exclude those who may have been absent upon their own business, contrary to what has been the practice heretofore.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Barre. As I see that the chairman of this Committee is not present, and no other member of the Committee being disposed to answer the inquiry of the gentleman from Fall River, I will state what my views in regard to this matter are. I think the resolve is entirely unnecessary; for I suppose, that under the law as it now stands, a man would not lose his residence by absence from the Commonwealth on business for the State or, for the United States, any more than if he were absent on his own business. I suppose it would be determined whether he would or would not lose his residence by finding out what the intention was at the time of leaving his residence—whether he went away with the intention of returning or not. If he goes away, no matter what may be his business, with the intention of returning, I presume he would not lose his residence. It seems to me, that the incorporation into the Constitution of a provision, that if a man was absent from the Commonwealth upon business of the State or of the United States, he should not be deemed to have lost his residence, might leave some doubt whether it was not to be inferred that he should so lose his residence in case of absence upon other business; but I suppose, as it now stands, it is perfectly clear.

Mr. MORTON, of Andover, moved that the Committee rise and report to the Convention that the resolves ought not to pass.

Mr. DURGIN, of Wilmington. Before the question is taken on the motion of my friend from Andover, I would like to offer an amendment by adding a resolve, if this be the proper time and place to do it, in the following words:—

Resolved, That no individual shall be deprived of the privilege of voting for State or United States officers in consequence of having changed his residence to any other portion of the State, or shall lose his residence for the above purpose in one place until he shall gain it in another.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion is in order. It takes precedence of the motion that the Committee rise.

Mr. BATES, of Plymouth. I rise for the purpose of making an inquiry. It is my impression that a resolve embodying the same idea, or substantially the same, with that of the one now offered by the gentleman from Wilmington, has been before submitted and disposed of, and is now either in the hands of the Convention or the Committee of the Whole. I wish to inquire if this be not the case, for if so, there is no necessity for acting upon the same subject again.

Mr. ALDRICH. I will state, for the information of the gentlemen, that if they will turn to document No. 55, they will find the resolve to which the gentleman from Plymouth alludes, in the following words:—

Resolved, That no person removing his domicile from one town or city within this Commonwealth to another, shall, by reason of such removal, be deemed to have lost his residence in the former for the purpose of voting for national and State officers, until six months after his removal.

Mr. DURGIN. I was not aware that the substance of my resolve had been acted upon, and I was anxious that it should be put into the Constitution somewhere. As the matter has been already disposed of, I withdraw the amendment.

The question being then taken on the motion of Mr. Morton, it was agreed to. The Committee accordingly rose, and the President having resumed the Chair of

THE CONVENTION,

The Chairman, Mr. Frothingham, of Charlestown, reported to the Convention that the resolves ought not to pass.

Mr. HOOPER asked that the question might be taken separately upon the two resolves; and the question being taken on the first resolve, it was rejected.

The question then recurred upon the second resolve.

Mr. HASKELL, of Ipswich. There is one provision in the second resolve that I hope will be adopted, for it is not covered by existing laws,

Monday,

QUALIFICATION OF VOTERS.—HATHAWAY—BATES—HOOD—KEYES—MORTON.

as I understand the subject. That is, that no person convicted of a felony, unless pardoned and restored to the right of suffrage, shall be permitted to vote in any election. It appears desirable that there should be some such penalty annexed to the commission of crime; and I hope that this, at least, will not be rejected.

Mr. HATHAWAY, of Freetown. I move to amend the second resolve by striking out the words "idiot or insane person," and inserting, instead thereof, the words "pauper, or person under guardianship." My difficulty in reference to this resolve is, that the only criterion that I know of, or that any one can know of, by which to settle this question of insanity or idocy, is the judgment of a tribunal that is fit to pass upon that matter. I would not, by any means, be willing to leave it to the selectmen, when the day for voting comes, to pass upon the question whether I was idiotic or insane. I should think that was a miserable tribunal to judge of this question, as regards myself, to say nothing about any other gentleman in reference to this matter; and hence, I would adopt the other provision which is contained in the third article of the amendments to the Constitution, and then I hope that the resolve will be agreed to, retaining, to suit the views of the gentleman from Ipswich, the provision in reference to persons convicted of felony, and who had not been restored to the right of suffrage by virtue of pardon.

Mr. BATES, of Plymouth. I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Freetown in what manner the restoration to the right of suffrage may be supposed to be obtained. By the laws of Massachusetts, a man who has been convicted of felony, and who has been punished in the State Prison, when he comes out of the State Prison, is a voter. When his time of imprisonment has expired, there is no provision of law that prevents him from being a voter. Now it is proposed to say in this resolve, that he shall not vote unless he is restored to the right of suffrage; and my inquiry is, in what manner is it proposed to restore him to the right of suffrage?

Mr. HATHAWAY. I cannot, of course, be expected to know what were the views of the Committee who reported this resolve; I am not responsible for it, not having been a member of that Committee. I suppose, however, that the Committee had in view certain persons who had been, or who might be hereafter convicted of felony, and who had not been restored to their civil rights by pardon. Now, a remission of the penalty or the judgment of the Court, as I understand it, is a very distinct matter from the restoration to civil rights; and I suppose that the Committee had in view the pardon of an individual and his restoration to his civil rights, no matter where he should stay. I suppose it was their intention, that a pardon should be necessary for a restoration to civil rights after the termination of the sentence which has been inflicted upon a person for the commission of felony. That is my idea with regard to the matter, although I have no authority to speak for the Committee.

Mr. BATES. With that understanding, and that explanation on behalf of the Committee, or rather, in the absence of the Committee, I certainly hope this resolve will not pass. The object of the resolve appears to be simply this: that when a man has been convicted of felony, and has been sentenced to the State Prison, and his friends apply for pardon to the governor and council, they can grant a pardon and restore all his rights to the individual except his civil rights. By the laws of Massachusetts, hitherto, he has been entitled to vote, and I have never learned that any inconvenience has yet resulted from that vote; and now it is proposed to deprive that man of his right of suffrage until some future time when his civil rights shall be restored.

Mr. HOOD, of Lynn. I hope the resolution will not pass, and that we shall not incorporate into the Constitution a clause containing a provision that a man who has been convicted of a State prison offence, shall never be a voter, but that we shall leave the law as it now is in that respect. A man who is in the State Prison and comes out, does not forfeit his civil rights as a citizen, and I hope we shall not throw any obstacle in the way of the reformation of men who have been so unfortunate as to serve a term in the State Prison. There are many of them upon whose characters the punishment has had the effect which should be the end of all punishment—reformation; and many of them are just as well qualified to vote as the body of citizens with whom they live.

I object to this provision for another reason. This question must arise in town-meeting, and it will be a difficult matter to settle, to determine there whether a man has been convicted of a felony, and should thereby not be permitted to vote; or if convicted of a felony, whether he has been pardoned and restored to the right of citizenship. How is it to be decided there? It places the officers in an embarrassing situation. It is hardly to be expected that any one will be there prepared to produce the record to prove that a man has been convicted of a felony. And still, if the provision is to have any effect, the officers must receive the individual's vote, or else somebody must produce the record of conviction, as the only satisfactory evidence of the commission of the crime. They would not be justified in taking hearsay evidence, which, besides its unreliable nature, would open the door to great difficulties in the discharge of their duties. I hope we shall not adopt the resolve.

Mr. KEYES, for Abington. It seems to me, that the passage of this amendment would be somewhat inconsistent with votes already passed by the Convention. In the first place, in regard to the matter of the punishment of felony, it strikes me, that the purpose and intention of the courts, is to make it severe enough to meet the nature of the crime with which the criminal is charged, and therefore it appears to be rather out of place for this Convention, or for the people, in any other form, to add to the penalty already prescribed for the commission of crime. The judges are not backward, as far as my observation extends, in dealing out, within the limit of the statute, as great a penalty in each case as the crime deserves. Therefore, I oppose that part.

Then, in regard to that other part about paupers. It was said the other day, and the question was decided on that ground, that the right to vote was a natural and inalienable right. Now, I take it that we are too democratic to take away the inalienable rights of men because they happen to be poor. I did not expect to see such a proposition coming from such a quarter. The ground, that the right to vote is a natural and inalienable one, is not my faith, but it is the faith of this Convention as expressed by their votes, a few days since. There we held out a temptation for persons to become public paupers in some respects, and now we propose to insert a provision, that if they do become paupers, they shall not vote.

It was maintained, that a man owes no particular duty to society in order to be entitled to claim the privilege of voting. That is a right which, it was argued, is forced upon man because he lives in society, and while he lives in society, it is not expected that he will forfeit his rights, because he fails to perform his duties. It was decided, also, that no man should be deprived, while he is permitted to live in society, of any of the rights and privileges which belong to all others. It seemed to me that it was settled in Convention, on that occasion, that a man's property was not the criterion of his rights, or the measure by which they were to be apportioned; and if that principle is correct, I do not know why we should not extend the right of voting to all paupers, because they have, I was going to say, more interest in the laws, and in the conduct of the administration of affairs, than any other class of persons, inasmuch as they are the children of the government, and affected in their food and their raiment by the laws which are passed, and therefore, of all people, they have the highest interest in voting.

They are not views which I entertain which make these amendments improper in my estimation, especially the one in reference to State paupers, but it is because of the votes already given by the Convention that I think it would be improper to adopt them. I agree with the gentleman from Monroe, (Mr. Phelps,) that no difficulty on this matter has arisen heretofore. It has generally been believed, and such has been the practice, that when a man has been sent to the State Prison he must come back to the governor and council and be pardoned, and undergo the formality of being restored to his civil rights in order to become a voter. But I understand there is no necessity for that, as a man is entitled to vote the very next day after he comes out of prison, if he chooses to exercise the privilege.

Mr. MORTON, of Andover. I simply wish to say, that it seems to me to be entirely useless to insert the provision in this resolution, inasmuch as it already exists in our present Constitution. Article Third of the amendment says: "Every male citizen of twenty-one years of age and upwards, (excepting paupers and persons under guardianship, &c.,) shall have the right to vote, &c," and I have yet to hear that there is any proposition before this Convention to alter or amend that portion of the Constitution. Therefore I submit that the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Freetown, (Mr. Hathaway,) is entirely useless.

Mr. HATHAWAY, of Freetown. I do not wish to be placed in an improper or false position, in reference to the amendment which I proposed, for be it known and understood that I am opposed to the resolution, even if the amendment shall be adopted. But I am disposed to make the original resolution as perfect as I can, and the gentleman over the way, (Mr. Haskell,) having expressed the wish to retain in it the class of persons who might be convicted of the crime of felony, I did not move to strike that out. But the Committee had reported that "insane persons" should not vote,

QUALIFICATION OF VOTERS.—HATHAWAY—BUTLER—MORTON—HASKELL—ALDRICH.

and the reason why I wished to substitute for that "persons under guardianship" was, because I would not deprive any person of the right to vote upon the judgment of the selectmen, and because they might believe a person to be idiotic or insane who was not so, and the only evidence that they should consider as sufficient to deprive any voter of his rights was a solemn adjudication, by a competent tribunal of law or probate, that the person was so, and that he was incompetent to vote.

In reference to paupers, I know there is a provision in regard to them in the Constitution at the present time. And I do not know but that the Committee intended and meant to introduce the provision that persons who are paupers should have the right to vote. If such was the intention of the Committee, I differ entirely with them, and also with the gentleman from Abington, (Mr. Keyes,) in reference to the proposition that every individual has the natural, essential, and inalienable right to vote. If that gentleman intends that proposition as broadly as he stated it, then I inquire why any individual should be naturalized before he has the right to vote? I regard that matter in a very different light from what he does. Let me say, in reference to that matter, that foreign persons who come here, under our laws, if we choose so to provide by law, would have the right to vote the very day after they came here. I do not regard that proposition as he does.

Mr. KEYES. I wish the gentleman would state my views upon the subject.

Mr. HATHAWAY. I stated simply what the gentleman said, and if he says his opinions are different from what his words warrant, I do not understand them.

Mr. KEYES. I intended to say that I did not believe in the doctrine which I presumed the Convention sanctioned the other day, that everybody had a natural and inalienable right to vote.

Mr. HATHAWAY. Very well, I am happy to know that the gentleman and myself then agree upon that matter. The reason, then, why I moved to amend, was to make the resolution, in case it did pass, as perfect as I could, so that it should not be quite as bad as it was originally; but I intend to vote against the whole resolution, even if the amendment is adopted.

Mr. BUTLER, of Lowell. Here are some resolves reported by a Committee, the chairman of which, and I believe most of its other members are absent. They are now about to be passed finally upon, for if, as it seems to me to be the intention of the Convention, they reject them, that is a final disposition of them. I would inquire—without expression any opinion upon the resolves one way or the other—if some such courtesy is not due to the chairman of the Committee, by which at least we should postpone final action upon the matter, until he can be present here to explain to the Convention the reasons which induced them, a very laborious Committee of the Convention,—without intending to pay a compliment where it is not needed,—to report the resolves? I hope the Convention will give some time, and if it is in order, I would move to postpone the further consideration and action upon this subject until to-morrow.

Mr. MORTON, of Quincy. I hope the consideration of this matter will not be postponed, but that we shall proceed with it now, and reject it. If we continue to postpone matter after matter, day after day, as we have done, we shall not get through our labors until winter. I hope the Convention will pass upon the matter now.

Mr. HATHAWAY. Will the gentleman from Lowell withdraw his motion for a moment?

Mr. BUTLER. I will.

Mr. HATHAWAY. I perceive that the Convention prefers to take the question upon the naked resolution as reported, and I therefore withdraw the amendment.

Mr. BUTLER. I now renew my motion to postpone.

The question was taken, and the motion was not agreed to.

The question then recurred upon rejecting the second resolve.

Mr. HASKELL, of Ipswich. I desire to say a word or two upon this subject. I think the question raised by the gentleman from Plymouth, admits of another answer than that given by the gentleman from Freetown. He asks what the second resolution can mean, by requiring, that a person convicted of a felony, should be restored to his right of suffrage before he can vote. I do not know what was the intention of the Committee, or of its chairman, in the preparation of this resolve, but I suppose and understand it to be this, that a party convicted of a felony shall be deprived of the right of suffrage. That is the import and effect of the resolution, as reported. As I understand it, the resolution simply provides, that such a party, thus deprived of his right of suffrage, by the commission of a felony, shall not vote until he is restored to that right by a pardon. It refers to the deprivation which a person is to suffer by his own act, and that he shall not be restored to that condition he was formerly in, until he has received a pardon. Such I apprehend to be the meaning of the resolution, and it is perfectly proper to declare that fact.

One word in reference to the suggestions of the gentleman from Lynn, (Mr. Hood). None of the difficulties to which he alludes, can possibly arise. I infer, from the gentleman's connection with a town, that he must have observed the manner in which the voting list is prepared. It is not prepared in town-meeting. The question of one's qualifications to vote almost always arises in the preliminary meeting of the selectmen, which takes place before the town meeting. It is there that the subject of qualification is canvassed, and there that the right of the party to vote is denied, if denied at all, and determined by the consultation and decision of the selectmen.

There is, too, a mode of proof, in reference to the commissions of felony, than which nothing can be more certain. The selectmen are not to become the tryers of that fact, and I apprehend that there can be no uncertainty about ascertaining the conviction. The record is open at all times, to the inspection of every one, and accessible to all, and it is only necessary, in order to prevent a person from voting, who has been convicted of a felony, to obtain a copy of the record and lay it before the selectmen. There are abundant means of ascertaining by the record, whether or not a party is disqualified to vote from such cause. If this provision is adopted, that any person convicted of a felony, unless pardoned and restored to the right of suffrage, shall not be entitled to vote in any election, the party whose vote is questioned on that ground, can produce his papers, showing that he has been restored to that right.

This question has arisen quite unexpectedly to me, but I think much might be said, properly and justly, of the reasonableness and propriety of including a disqualification to vote, as one of the punishments for the commission of a criminal offence. Does it look reasonable, that a man who has violated the law of his country, by the commission of a felony, will take that interest in placing the execution of those laws into the hands of competent and proper persons, that all voters should take? We know that many men are restored to society, at the expiration of their term of confinement, without any more moral merits or qualifications, and with no more interest in the welfare of society, than they had at the time of their conviction for the offence, and yet you will let him exercise all the functions of an independent freeman, knowing that he is no more moral, and has no more interest in the welfare of that society whose laws he has violated, and whose interests he has sacrificed by the commission of a criminal offence. It is well deserving of serious consideration by the Convention, whether it would not be reasonable and just to provide, as an additional punishment for the commission of crime, the forfeiture of the elective franchise. Of course such a provision would be made applicable only to offences committed after the adoption of the principle. It seems to me, to be neither just or right, to permit a person who has violated one of the most important and fundamental laws of society, to come out of his confinement, and do, by his vote, perhaps as great a wrong as he has before done by violence, or in some other way.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Barre. I am glad to be able to state to the Convention that, although I could not concur with the Committee which reported these resolutions, in many respects, yet it was not the intention of that Committee—it certainly was not my intention as a member of that Committee—that the disqualification of a felon to vote, should be considered a part of his punishment. That is, in my judgment, entirely an erroneous view of this subject. We have no right to punish a man for a crime after he has suffered the punishment which a court of justice, upon a full hearing of his case, has inflicted upon him. My idea of the reason for making such a provision in relation to the disqualification of a felon, is this. When a man has committed felony and has been convicted of the crime, he may be considered so perfectly reckless—so utterly regardless of the best interests of society, as to render himself entirely unworthy to take any part in the administration of its affairs. We deprive an insane person of the right of voting, not as a punishment, but because he is unfit to take part in the affairs of government. He is intellectually disqualified. And the Committee propose to deprive the felon of the right of suffrage for the reason that he is morally disqualified, and not as a part of the punishment due to his crime. Mr. Chairman, it has just been said, by some member, who saw that the chairman of the Committee that reported these resolves is absent, that the Committee is absent. Nor is this the first time that such a declaration has been made with relation to this and other Committees.

Now, I beg leave to inform gentlemen, that, at least upon this Committee, there are some members besides the chairman who have an opinion of their own, and who are not afraid of expressing it. But I am not disposed to enter into the discussion of this matter, at all, at present, for I do not feel any particular responsibility in connection with the resolution under consideration, and quite indifferent as to the fate of it. I will remark, however, that a provision similar to this is to be found in the Constitutions of several of the leading States of the Union. It has been urged as an objection to the resolution, that it will be difficult in some cases for the presiding officers at elections to determine who are felons. Well, it will often be found equally difficult to ascertain who are insane persons, paupers, or idiots; and yet these several classes of persons are usually excluded, the difficulty of determination, not being regarded as a sufficient reason for making no disqualifying provision respecting them. The distinction or difference between an idiot and a person with just enough of intellect to render him a responsible being and capable of exercising the civil rights of a citizen, is very slight. The dividing limit is an extremely narrow one. It is very difficult to tell exactly where daylight ends and where night and darkness begin. But all this furnishes no reason why an idiot should be allowed the important and responsible right of suffrage. Nor should insane persons be permitted to exercise this right, because it is not always easy to ascertain whether a person be of a sane or insane mind. Well, Sir, there are those who deem it equally clear, that that man who has shown himself, in a sense, morally insane by the commission of flagrant crimes, ought also to be disfranchised. But as I said in the outset, I have no intention of entering into the discussion of this subject, and shall close, with an expression of my own opinion, that the several classes of persons named in this resolution should be excluded from the right of suffrage, but whether a provision to that effect should be incorporated into the Constitution, I leave for others to decide.

Mr. WEEKS, of Harwich. I think it will be useless to discuss these resolutions any longer. If they will not answer it will be cheaper to make new ones. I move the previous question.

The question was taken, and the main question ordered to be put.

The second resolution was then rejected by the Convention.

Plurality and Majority Rule.

Mr. BUTLER, of Lowell, submitted the following Report from a Committee:—

COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS.

In Convention, June 27, 1853.

The Special Committee, to whom was referred the several Orders of the Convention concerning the rules by which the number of votes necessary to the election of the various officers of the Commonwealth may be ascertained; and also a Report of a Committee of the Convention upon the same subject, having considered the various matters sent to them, pray leave to submit the accompanying Report and Resolves:—

Your Committee were not unaware or unmindful of the difference of opinion in the Convention, upon the matters submitted.

They believed, however, that all will agree that a majority rule of election was most consonant with the spirit of our institutions.

They have acknowledged the force of the objections of inconvenience and expense to the people, of too frequent elections, the evils of non-representation, and elections of local officers by the legislature, thereby passing the government into the hands of the minority, which have heretofore followed a too strict adherence to a majority rule in all elections.

Your Committee, therefore, have endeavored so to combine both rules, that the good effects of the majority system might be enjoyed, with the speedy and convenient results of a plurality election.

To that end, they have provided for the officers who represent the whole people, an election by a majority; or, failing in that, an election by a concurrent vote of both branches of the legislature, from the persons having the highest number of votes. The voice of the people would thus be obtained upon whatever basis these departments of the government are placed; and, as the Convention have already nearly unanimously determined to base the Senate on population, the governor and other higher officers of State will be ultimately selected by the immediate delegates of the whole people.

To guard against the election of officers who shall represent localities, such as senators and councillors, by the legislature, for them a plurality rule has been established.

To prevent a too frequent recurrence of elections, and the necessity of trials on subsequent days, when bodies as large as counties and districts fail to elect, for all county and district officers, a plurality rule is provided. From a desire that the government may be in fact, what it is in theory, a government of a majority, and to give opportunity for the exercise of the "sober second thought" by the electors, that rule is proposed upon the first ballot in the election of representatives to the general court: still, that differences of political or other opinions may not operate either to hinder a full representation, or to protract town-meetings to such an extent as to subject them to extraneous influences, a plurality is permitted to elect on the second ballot.

Like reasons have produced like rules in the elections of city and town officers, who are the government of municipalities, and where, from the narrow limits of the constituency, no great inconvenience can be felt in a second balloting.

The annexed provisions are therefore submitted by your Committee, as a just compromise of opinion upon this perplexing subject, with an earnest hope that these results of their deliberations are not too great a departure from that rule of majority election under which the Commonwealth has hitherto so wondrously prospered.

BENJ. F. BUTLER, Chairman.

Resolved, That it is expedient to provide in the Constitution, that a majority of all the votes given shall be necessary to the election of a governor, lieutenant-governor, secretary, treasurer, auditor, and attorney-general of the Commonwealth: provided, that if at any election of either of the above-named officers, no person shall have a majority of the votes given, the House of Representatives shall, by a majority of viva voce votes, elect two out of three persons who had the highest, if so many shall have been voted for, and return the persons so elected to the Senate, from which the Senate shall, by viva voce vote, elect one who shall be governor.

Resolved, That in all the elections of senators and councillors, the person having the highest number of votes shall be elected.

Resolved, That in the election of representatives to the general court a majority of all the votes given in shall be necessary to the election at the first ballot: provided, that in case of a failure of election on such ballot, the person having the highest number of votes at the second or any subsequent ballot, shall be elected.

Resolved, That in the election of all city and town officers, the same rule shall govern as in case of representatives to general court.

Resolved, That in the election of all county and district officers, the person having the highest number of votes shall be elected.

Resolved, That in all elections where the person having the highest number of votes may be elected, and there is a failure of election because two persons have an equal number of votes, subsequent trials may be had at such times as may be prescribed by the legislature.

The Report was referred to the Committee of the Whole, and ordered to be printed.

Miscellaneous Subjects.

The same gentleman, from the same Committee submitted the following Report:—

COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS.

In Convention, June 27, 1853.

The Committee to whom was referred so much of the Constitution as is contained in the first eight articles of the sixth chapter thereof, exclusive of the provisions concerning the writ of Habeas Corpus; and also an order of the Convention relating to the exemption of certain property from attachment on mesne process; and also an order concerning the propriety of permitting certain persons, conscientiously scrupulous of taking human life as a punishment for crime or in self-defence, to act under the Constitution without taking the oath or affirmation ordinarily required; and also an order to provide that no bank officer shall be eligible to certain offices under the Constitution, —having fully considered said several subjects, pray leave to report, in addition to their former Report, the following Resolves.

All which is submitted by the Committee,

B. F. BUTLER, Chairman.

1. Resolved, That the first article of the sixth chapter be amended in the last paragraph thereof, by the insertion of the words "or before a Judge of the Supreme Court", after the word "Assembly," and by the insertion of the same words after the word "being," so that the paragraph as amended shall read as follows:—

And the said oaths, or affirmations, shall be taken and subscribed by the governor, lieutenant-governor, and councillors, before the president of the Senate, in presence of the two Houses of Assembly, or before a Judge of the Supreme Court, and by the senators and representatives before the Governor and Council for the time being, or before a Judge of the Supreme Court: and by the officers aforesaid before such persons, and in such manner, as shall from time to time be prescribed by the legislature.

2. Resolved, That the first paragraph of said article ought to be amended, by inserting after the word "Court," in the second line, "or Court of Common Pleas," and by adding after the last word of said paragraph, the following: "except that they may be appointed to take depositions or acknowledgments of deeds, or other legal instruments, by the authority of any other State or country;" so that the same amended shall read as follows, to wit:—

LOAN OF STATE CREDIT, &c. — NAYSON — COLE.

[June 27th.]

No governor, lieutenant-governor, or judge of the Supreme Judicial Court, or Court of Common Pleas, shall hold any other office or place, under the authority of this Commonwealth, except such as by this Constitution they are admitted to hold, saving that the judges of the said courts may hold the offices of justices of the peace through the State; nor shall they hold any other place or office, or receive any pension or salary from any other State, or government, or power whatever; except that they may be appointed to take depositions, or acknowledgments of deeds, or other legal instruments, by the authority of any other State or country.

Also, that the second, third, and fourth paragraphs, and article eight of the amendments of said article, be stricken out and the following inserted:—

No person shall hold or exercise at the same time more than one of the following offices, to wit: the office of governor, lieutenant-governor, senator, representative, judge of the Supreme Judicial Court, or Court of Common Pleas, secretary of the Commonwealth, attorney-general, treasurer, or receiver-general, auditor, councillor, judge of probate, register of probate, register of deeds, sheriff, or his deputy, clerk of the Supreme Judicial Court, or Court of Common Pleas, clerk of the Senate or House of Representatives; and any person holding either of the above offices, shall be deemed to have vacated the same by accepting a seat in the congress of the United States, or any office under the authority of the United States, the office of postmaster excepted. And no person shall be capable of holding at the same time more than two offices which are held by appointment of the governor or Governor and Council, or the Senate, or the House of Representatives; military officers, and the offices of justices of the peace, justices of the peace and quorum, and notaries public, excepted.

And whenever there shall be a vacancy any of the above offices, the office of governor and lieutenant-governor excepted, the same may be filled.

That the fifth paragraph of said article ought to be retained without alteration or amendment.

3. Resolved, That the eighth article of the sixth chapter be amended by striking out the words, "Senate and House of Representatives in," and the words "assembled" and by authority of the same," and by adding the words "of Massachusetts," so that the article as amended shall read,

ARTICLE VIII. The enacting style in making and passing all acts, statutes, and laws, shall be: Be it enacted by the General Court of Massachusetts.

4. Resolved, That it is inexpedient to make any constitutional provision relative to the subject of the order exempting a certain amount of property from attachment on mesne process.

5. Resolved, That it is inexpedient to provide that any persons may act under the Constitution in an official capacity, without at least an affirmation that they "will discharge and perform all the duties incumbent upon them in such capacity, according to the best of their abilities and understanding, agreeably to the rules and regulations of the Constitution and the laws of the Commonwealth."

6. Resolved, That it is not expedient, by a provision of the Constitution, to render any officer of a banking company incapable of holding any office to which he may be duly chosen by the votes of the people, or any portion thereof.

The Report was referred to the Committee of the Whole, and ordered to be printed.

Amendments to the Constitution.

MR. NAYSON, of Amesbury, submitted the following, from a Committee:—

COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS.

In Convention, June 27, 1853.

The Committee on so much of the Constitution as relates to amendments and enrolments, and to whom was also referred various orders relating thereto, have considered the same and report:—

That it is the opinion of said Committee, that provision should be made for calling future Conventions for revising and amending the Constitution, as well at stated periods, as also at such other times as the legislature might prescribe. The present Constitution is entirely deficient in this respect; and it is only in reference to single or specific amendments, that any method is designated whereby that instrument can be changed. The Committee believe that this power of revision, existing, as is universally acknowledged, in and with the people, should, at all times be available for that purpose; and to this end it is proposed to supply the present omission by a provision furnishing to the people the opportunity to pass upon all propositions for calling future Conventions, whenever and however made. And, in the resolves herewith submitted, the Committee would express the belief that this important right will be fully secured with scarcely the possibility of failure.

In the matter of specific amendments which may hereafter be suggested by the legislature, the Committee propose the substitution of the third resolve in lieu of article 9th of the Amendments to the Constitution, having reference to that subject.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

For the Committee,

JONATHAN NAYSON, Chairman.

1. Resolved, That it is expedient to provide in the Constitution that, at the general election to be held in the year eighteen hundred and seventy-three, and in each twentieth year thereafter, and also, at such other times preceding or succeeding the above-named year, as the legislature may by law prescribe, the question—"Shall there be a Convention to revise the Constitution, and amend the same?"—shall be submitted to the qualified voters in State elections; and, in case a majority of the same thus voting, shall decide in favor of a convention for such purpose, the legislature, at its next session, shall prescribe by law for the election of delegates to such Convention.

2. Resolved, That it is expedient further to provide in the Constitution, that, whenever the legislature shall fail to submit to the people, at the periods designated in the foregoing resolve, the question of calling a Convention for the purposes indicated therein, the qualified voters in State elections, in the several cities and towns, may, at the next general election thereafter, and upon notice of such failure by the Secretary of the Commonwealth, whose duty it shall be to issue such notice, proceed to vote upon said question as though it had been propounded by the legislature; and if, upon a return to the governor and council, of the vote so given, it shall appear that a majority have voted in favor of the proposition, the governor shall forthwith issue his proclamation, calling upon the voters of said cities and towns, at meetings legally warned for that purpose, to elect delegates to such Convention; the time and place for holding its session, being expressed therein.

3. Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Constitution by striking out thereof article 9th of amendments, and inserting the following:—

Any amendment or amendments to this Constitution may be proposed by the Senate or House of Representatives; and if the same shall be agreed to by a majority of the whole number of senators and representatives elected, such amendments shall be entered upon their respective journals, with the yeas and nays taken thereon, and shall then be referred to the next general court. And if the proposed amendment or amendments shall be agreed to by a majority of the members of the Senate and House of Representatives voting thereon, the same shall thereupon be submitted to the voters qualified to vote in State elections; and if a majority of the same, thus voting, shall ratify said amendment or amendments, the same shall be deemed a part of the Constitution.

The report was referred to the Committee of Whole and ordered to be printed.

On motion of Mr. WILSON, of Natick, the Convention then resolved itself into

COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE,

Mr. Boutwell, for Berlin, in the Chair, and proceeded to the consideration of the Report of the Committee on the subject of Loanng the State Credit.

The question pending, being upon a motion of the gentleman from Braintree, (Mr. Stetson,) to strike out the resolve of the Committee and to substitute therefor the following:—

Resolved, That it is expedient so to amend the Constitution, as to provide that no loan of the State credit shall be granted to any private corporation.

MR. COLE, of Cheshire. As the Chairman of the Committee who made this report is absent, and the gentleman who offered the amendment is also absent, I think it would be better to postpone the consideration of it till some time when those gentlemen are present. However, if no one else makes a motion that the Committee rise I will not.

But, Mr. Chairman, if the Convention are desirous to bring this question to a vote this afternoon, I propose to make a few remarks upon the subject before us. It has been remarked by many of the gentlemen who have addressed the Convention that the subjects upon which they were speaking was one of great importance. Sir, the subject now under consideration in this Committee is one, which in my judgment, is by no means of minor importance. The question involved is, "shall the past policy of the State in regard to the loaning of the State credit to private associations and corporations continue to be carried out as the general policy of the State?" I know the sentiment has been advanced by many persons, and persons of intelligence, too, that a national debt is a national blessing, and what is true with regard to a nation in this respect, may also be true of a State. But, Sir, I entertain a different opinion in relation to this subject. I look upon the granting of the loan on the State credit as a very different matter from making a direct appropriation to a private corporation or association. Were there surplus funds at the command of the Treasury of the State, I think that state of things would obviate many of the objections to assisting these private associations by the State. But it is well known that many of the corporations to which the credit of the State is granted make bad investments, and that they are unable to pay the capital borrowed to carry out these objects. Under these circumstances the State incurs all the risk and the corporation derives all the benefit, if any benefit is derived, for certainly, if the corporation never realized any profit from its investment, it would never be able to pay this money, and of course the burthen must fall upon the Treasury of the State, and ultimately upon the tax-paying people of the State.

LOAN OF STATE CREDIT.—COLE.

[June 27th.

But there are various reasons why I, as an individual, should be opposed to granting the loan of the credit of the State to private companies or corporations, and some of these reasons I propose to present to the Committee.

In the first place, where the credit of the State is loaned it must be done by an act of the legislature, and that is a subject which, for the very best of reasons, ought not to be submitted to the legislature. It was remarked in the Convention this morning that the amount of capital already invested in the railroads of this Commonwealth was too strong for the legislature; that the influence which these railroad companies exercised over the legislature was too powerful for the safety of the State; and it is well known that the influence brought by those associations to bear upon the legislature are exceedingly powerful and almost irresistible. This is one of the reasons why this question ought to be settled by the Constitution.

I am aware that in presenting these remarks to this Committee I am taking the unpopular side of the question. But, Sir, I think we ought to approach a subject of this nature upon its merits. I think that the representatives of the people, assembled as we are for the purpose of revising the organic law of the land, ought to consider and determine a question of this kind entirely independent of all outside influences whatever. I think that we shall be stepping aside from the high confidence reposed in us by our constituents if we were to allow our votes or opinions upon the question now before the Committee to be biased in the slightest degree by considerations of a local character. Sir, principles are to be settled by the members of this Convention. Our duties are of a very different nature, in that respect, from the duties of a legislature. And the principles which we are called upon to consider and to settle are those which are universal in their character, and ought to be for the benefit of the whole people of the Commonwealth; and in the settlement of those principles we are to regard the interests of the whole people of the Commonwealth, and not those of any particular portion. We are to consider ourselves as the representatives of the whole State, in all its length and breadth. Local considerations may exist at the present time, in particular portions of the State, which may have a material bearing upon this question; but I think it is unwise, injudicious and unbecoming in the members of this Convention to allow ourselves to be governed, in any degree, by such considerations, in determining what are to be the principles of the organic law of the Commonwealth. I can hardly believe that gentlemen will shrink from the task of proclaiming what they all acknowledge to be just and wise principles for the government of the future policy of the State, on account of any merely local and temporary considerations.

Mr. Chairman, as I am not looking forward to any preferment in office, I shall offer the remarks I have to make upon this subject honestly, and with the fullest conviction that what I advocate will, in all coming time, prove to be for the best interest of the Commonwealth.

Now, to come right to the point at issue. Is it best to continue the loan of the State credit for the benefit of these private associations or corporations? Is it the true policy of the State? I have conversed with many individuals upon this subject during the few past months, and I have met very few who have differed with me as to the best policy to be pursued for the interest of the State. But at the same time, I have met with very many who have thought this a very unfortunate time for the calling of this Convention in relation to this subject. They themselves thought the only true general policy for the State to pursue, in future, was to refuse the loan of its credit to private corporations, but they at the same time expressed a very warm desire that certain things might be accomplished before that policy was adopted. They desired that there might be a departure in one instance from this policy. No one doubts the wisdom of this policy as the general policy of the State.

But, Sir, however unpopular it may be to advocate an amendment of the character of that offered by the gentlemen from Braintree, (Mr. Stetson,) I trust the amendment will prevail; and believing, as I do, that the amendment embodies the true policy of the State, I shall take this opportunity of presenting, in brief, my reasons for advocating that policy.

The subject before the Committee, namely, State loan to private companies, has become an exciting theme of remark in every section of the State. Every man feels, and without hesitation, gives an expression to those feelings, either in favor or against the principle involved, because the interest of every man is more or less directly affected by the exercise of this legislative authority. I suppose this right on the part of the legislature is predicated on a provision in the Bill of Rights authorizing that body to pass all wholesome laws and ordinances for the public benefit. I never have doubted the existence of that power in the light of our present Constitution, yet when traced to its final results, as it regards individual rights, it most evidently encroaches upon that protection secured to private property by the Constitution. That the law should provide for expenses of the government, in every respect, and for the development of all the resources calculated to advance the prosperity of the State, I admit; but it should be remembered that a marked distinction exists between making internal improvements at public expense and loaning the credit of the State to private corporations.

The great question involved in this resolution respecting the policy of the State, in my judgment, ought to be clearly defined and settled in the Constitution, because the people are to pass judgment upon, and finally settle, the principles of their own constitutional law; and if the decision of the people on this or any other subject differs from my opinions, I will most cheerfully respond to it. The history of the country furnishes the most abundant evidence that corporations often, very often, are unsuccessful, and consequences the most disastrous and unhappy are the results. The financial interests of whole communities often are seriously affected from failures of large corporate establishments, and the dependent families of the poor are reduced to suffering and want by the loss of the fruits of their labor and toil. I allude to cases of this description to show that, if corporations thus fail in the application of their own capital, who shall say they may not in the application of the capital of the State.

There are many considerations which give weight and importance to this subject, and first of all, and not least in the scale, is, that public money, thus loaned, goes directly to aid and advance the interests of corporations, which are formed for the purpose of acquiring wealth. Our government has provided for the existence of corporate organizations for the purpose of enabling men of capital to concentrate their wealth, and thereby more successfully to prosecute measures in connection with great business transactions, than individuals could do; and certain privileges are conferred, by law, to corporate bodies, not given to individuals. These privileges are conferred on the ground that the public may be benefited, and the greater prosperity of the State secured. But, Sir, I assume, that in the event of an unwise and injudicious enterprise on the part of corporations, money expended may produce no profits, and if so, the payment of the money loaned could not be met, and the final result would be, that the tax-payers of the State must pay it. When the State loans its credit to a corporation, who are the parties that run any risk? The taxable inhabitants of the State, most assuredly; for, if the investment be in a railroad, which does no more than pay running expenses, the corporation cannot refund the loan, and if paid at all, it must come from the only reliable source—the tax-paying people of the State; but if the road pays well, then the corporation is enriched, and perhaps a monopoly is created, producing public uneasiness, and furnishing just ground of complaint.

Indeed, the strong argument of the friends of this policy before the last legislature, was the fact, that the State had built up a great monopoly in granting aid to western roads. The State is urged to repeat the same thing that has given such power and influence to a corporation as ought not to exist. It is said, that in view of the concentration of so much power in one great corporation, that the people cannot endure its rule nor submit to its unreasonable exactions. If these arguments are true, where is the remedy to be found? Will the same medicine cure the disease it produced? It might do so, provided always a state of antagonism should exist; but Sir, corporations, thus circumstanced study well their own interest, either by compromise, or by one or the other obtaining a majority of capital, and consequently the control, and in either case, the public obtain no relief. I would not leave a subject, so vast in its bearings, to the legislature.

The benefits, if anything beneficial can result from such a policy, must always be relatively local. Some portions of people must receive chiefly, if not wholly, the advantages, while all the people alike are responsible to the State for the redemption of its pledges. In every instance, where claims are presented for aid from the State, an influence, almost irresistible from without, is brought to bear on the members of the legislature, not to say degrading and dishonest. If a great enterprise is necessary for the best interests of the State, I would have the State take hold of that work, and accomplish it. But, Sir, I do not believe that private capital would be wanting to execute any work, where safe and adequate returns could be reliable. More than sixty millions of dollars of New England capital is invested in railroads west of the Hudson River. The Illinois Central Railroad Company have negotiated a loan in England, on the bonds of the company, for five millions of dollars.

So in any case in Massachusetts, where a reasonable prospect offers for safe investments, capital would not be wanting. Appeals to the State will be made where the risk is of such a character as to prevent the availability of private capital. Is it wise to go on with this policy; are the people in favor of pursuing this policy? I think not.

The Constitutions of most of the States have either prohibited the policy or guarded it by restrictions. I know very well, as I remarked in the beginning, that this is an unpopular subject, and I appeal to members of this Convention if it is not true, that during the whole year the most potent argument used why we should maintain this policy was, that the State had already loaned these companies their credit, and thereby had built up large corporations, by which the public was suffering, and that there should be an equilibrium produced by competition, thus to relieve the public. The influences that are often brought to bear upon a legislature when subjects of this kind are before them, are of a very unhappy character. I shall not, in the course of my remarks, allude to particular instances. I have only to appeal to members of this Convention, to bear me out in this statement, if they will reflect but for a moment. Do you not believe, that during the last two years influences liable to swerve the judgment of the legislative body, and lead them astray from the exercise of their own honest convictions, have been brought to bear upon the members of our legislature. We may not, by any policy, forbid or shut out those influences. It will ever be true, as long as loaning the credit of the State, to the amount of millions of dollars, and that to private companies and associations, shall be the policy of this State; as long as that is allowed to go on, unrestricted by constitutional law, so long you may expect that our legislation will be subjected to all the influences, right or wrong, degrading or otherwise, that can be possibly brought to bear upon them. I submit, whether, in the judgment of this Convention, assembled, as we are, as the representatives of the whole State, whether it would not be better to settle this question in the organic law, at least as far as the amendment of the gentleman from Braintree proposes. He proposes, by his amendment, that no such law shall have force, or go into operation, until it is submitted to the people, and receives a majority of their votes. Is this asking an unreasonable thing to be introduced into the Constitution of the State? Are gentlemen afraid to leave this matter to the people? We ask them nothing more by this amendment. I am opposed, as a general thing, to the idea that legislative acts shall be sent to the people for their confirmation; but in a question of this magnitude—a question that more or less directly bears upon the interest of every individual, it is but right and just, before such policy shall be carried out, and before such a law shall go into operation, that it may be submitted to the people for their approval or rejection. The reason is conclusive, in my mind, why it should, because as I remarked before, if the State should happen, under any circumstances, to fail in obtaining adequate and sufficient security, the money, when once expended, could never be recovered from the enterprise in which it was invested. I simply ask whether, in that case, the tax-paying people of the State will not be eventually called upon to pay that money. There is one other part to which I wish to allude. I know it will be argued here, that as far as the credit of the State has been loaned to corporations, it has been successful; that is, that securities which the State have had for it have heretofore proved to be sufficient. But does that prove that it will always continue to be so. You multiply precedents, and the cases where the State has acted upon this policy shall become so numerous, that every association that wishes to construct a railroad will come before our legislature, and petition that body for loans, and the mere precedents will become at length potent arguments. These petitioners will say to the legislature, you have loaned the credit of the State to build up a corporation, one here and another there; we belong to another locality, and now we ask something at your hands. It will become a most irresistible argument, and there will be no resisting such an application, for the credit of the State. I know it is argued, that during a few years past the State had already, in certain localities, acted upon this policy, and now a portion of the State claims that they have not been benefited; that while they, as individual citizens, have considered their own property as actually under mortgage, they have felt as if they themselves were liable, in case of an emergency, and though they say the thing has operated pretty well, and they have been subject in reality to no taxes in relation to the adoption of this policy, still they have not been benefited like other portions of the State. They present their arguments, upon the ground that they desire to see an equality in this respect throughout the State, and that they need the advantages which other sections of the State have already had. It is said, likewise, ingeniously, that this policy, by producing competition, will relieve the public from the present pressure under which they are suffering. Is that true? Is that argument tenable in all cases? Why, it might be true, if it were not possible, that in the final votes, one of these associations, perhaps, might obtain a majority of the capital, so as to control the whole matter, and it is impossible for any individual to say but we may ere long, be called upon to meet the combined influence of large corporate bodies, and the public may be brought to suffer under a pressure arising from that cause.

I have already alluded to one very great objection to this policy, and in my judgment, if there was no other objection, that alone would be sufficient to condemn it, and that is, the unhallowed influences which are brought to bear upon legislative bodies. I believe that a question of this magnitude should be submitted to the people, and if they, by having an opportunity to express their minds upon the subject, favor such a project as this, I have not a word to say. When I look into our legislative bodies and endeavor to investigate the influences which are brought to bear upon them, I cannot avoid the impression, that we are not safe under these influences. I might allude to things which have occurred during the few months past in relation to this very subject, but I forbear, as I presume they are well understood and well known to all. Men who occupied the highest positions in our legislative bodies, merely because they have acted up to the convictions of their own judgments in this matter, have been treated with the greatest disrespect, and I feel, myself, when speaking upon this side of the question, that were it not for my retirement in life, and my want of notoriety in public life, I might, myself, be subjected to like disrespect. Had I ability to present this subject upon its merits, in all its magnitude—had I the standing that many other men in our State have, I should not expect to assume the position that I do before this Committee this afternoon, without incurring the liability of being held up to ridicule. Small as my abilities are, and as little aspiration as I have for public promotion and office of any description whatever, having an internal, honest conviction to say to the people, wherever my lot may cast me, what my judgment is upon these most important matters, I take the position I have assumed to-day. I have no doubt in my own mind, if there were no subjects of great interest pending in this community, that had any relation to the subject proposed in this resolution, or to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Braintree, (Mr. Stetson,) but what a majority of this Committee would strike hands with me this afternoon.

I have not the least earthly doubt of it; I have the internal conviction, that while I stand here, vindicating the impolicy of the State in continuing to loan its credit to private corporations, that if men would testify their internal convictions of the policy, I should have a majority of votes on my side. But though it be so, I have not the most distant idea that I shall find that there will be a majority who will vote with me. But in taking the vote on this subject, I simply ask, are we following out the obligations of duty to our constituents, or are we swerving from establishing those principles which have ever been avowed by the democratic party, which we in our heart believe are best calculated to promote the interest of the State. Or, again, are we unwilling to submit this matter to the people for their decision? Is this democratic? Do we ask anything unreasonable when we merely say, by the amendment proposed, that before such a law shall have any force, or go into operation, it shall receive the sanction of the legal voters in the State? Is this unreasonable, to propose such an amendment?

I hope the gentlemen of this Convention will not understand me as in the least degree opposing internal improvements. I have already said that it should be the cautious care of our legislature to take all such measures, that were in their tendency and nature, calculated to promote the best interests of the State, that were calculated to develop the resources of the State; but at the same time, I would repeat again, that there is a great distinction between making public appropriations for internal improvements, and granting the loan of the credit of the State to private companies or associations. If there is any object so vast in its magnitude that individual capital could not be enlisted to accomplish that object, if for one would be willing to agree that the legislature should be empowered to grant appropriations to accomplish it. I would not by any means close the doors to the prosperity of the State; but I do not believe in hiring corporations to carry out these measures, because the State runs all the risk, and if money is made the corporations realize all the benefit.

Many gentlemen, in the course of the debates in this Convention, have availed themselves of precedents; and I have one consolation, however unpopular the subject may be, in which I am engaged this afternoon, that the last time, until within three years, that an application was made to the members of the legislature of the State of Massachusetts to grant this credit in a loan, there was such security offered to the State that the legislature in both branches, and unanimously, were satisfied with the security. It was but a small loan which was asked for; some $30,000, and not only the small road which was to be built, but another long railroad stepped in and offered to give security of its whole concern to secure the State. But the legislature took this view then. They were fully convinced that the policy was a bad one, and they thought that the proper time to close the door, was when there was the most undoubted security offered them. That was during the session of the legislature in the winter of 1839 and 1840, I believe.

LOAN OF STATE CREDIT, &c. — COLE — GREENE.

I have another consolation; that many of our States of the Union have thrown restrictions around their legislatures in relation to loaning money to private corporations. I propose to call the attention of the committee for a few moments to some of the provisions of the Constitutions of other States in this particular. Many of the States have incorporated the principle of the provision contemplated in this amendment, in their Constitutions, and they have not done that without experience. The State of New York adopted the policy which we have been adopting, and which seems to meet such a general response, if I can judge anything by the countenances of the members of this Convention. After long experience, they have adopted the policy of refusing to grant the credit of the State to private corporations or associations. It is a fact probably well known to this Committee, that the State of New York has incorporated into the Constitution a provision prohibiting the granting of a loan of the credit of the State to corporations. They have had some experience on this subject. They pursued this policy of granting the loan of the credit of the State, until they had granted it in one case where the work for which it was loaned proved to be a failure. In one instance, by a legislative act, two millions of capital, I think, were relinquished to a corporation and given up, in consequence of the fact, that an application was made by the same corporation for more money; and rather than grant them further aid, the legislature chose to relinquish what had already been given. And in many other instances the terms of payment were protracted and became more doubtful, so that the legislature of New York became fully convinced, by what they learned from actual experience, that the policy was a bad one. In the Constitution of the State of New York, the clause touching this subject reads in this manner:—

"The credit of this State shall not in any manner be given or loaned to, or in aid of any individual, association or corporation."

I design to run through with but a few States because their prohibitions vary. In the State of Maryland the constitutional provision is:—

"No money shall be drawn from the treasury of the State except in accordance with a provision made by law; and every such law shall distinctly specify the sum appropriated and the object for which it shall be applied; provided, that nothing herein contained shall prevent the legislature from placing the contingent fund at the disposal of the executive, who shall report to the legislature at each session the amount expended and the purpose for which it is applied."

In most of the States, where they have not in so many words prohibited the granting of the credit of the State, they have thrown about their legislatures certain restrictions; they have not seen fit to leave the ground entirely open, without any control. In some of the States they have required that an act of this description should receive the vote of three-fifths of both branches of the legislature. In some of them, they have required that the act should receive the vote of the majority, at one session of the legislature, in both Houses, and then that the act should be published in the newspapers, and the succeeding legislature be elected with reference to this act; and if the second legislature saw fit to adopt the act, then it became a law. And in many of the States this has been done in terms equally strong with those contained in the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Braintree, (Mr. Stetson).

Now, without detaining the Committee, as I might, by referring to the provisions on this subject, to be found in the various Constitutions of the several States, you will find this true, that in no State, after leaving New England, can there be found a solitary instance where there are not restrictions thrown about the legislature of the State with regard to appropriations to aid private companies. Massachusetts has been held up by some members of this Convention as a perfect pattern, as though perfection was to be found in Massachusetts if anywhere, and as though her organization of government was superior to that of any State in the Union. I by no means desire to say anything against the laws of Massachusetts, or her policy heretofore; but it occurs to me, and strikes my mind with much force, that there are States which, under the organization which they have adopted, according to the length of time since their first settlement, have enjoyed an unparalleled prosperity. Go to many of the new States, and you will find that their growth and prosperity, when the length of time that they have existed as States is considered, has been even greater than Massachusetts has ever had in any period of her history. There has been developed in some of the new States, a greater degree of prosperity in relation to literature, science, arts, and a general diffusion of knowledge, and all that tends to make a people happy and prosperous, than Massachusetts has ever experienced during the same period of time.

I hope, Mr. Chairman, that the members of this Committee will take this subject into consideration, and all I ask of them is, to award to me that I have expressed fearlessly—and under very unfavorable circumstances, I will admit—the honest convictions of my mind. If it is the general desire of this Convention to continue this policy, so they will do; and if, in the course of twenty-five, thirty, or forty years, it should prove that my convictions in relation to this whole matter are right, it is possible that there may be individuals who will have occasion to look back to the time when this Convention was in session. Should it occur, hereafter, that an application for a few millions, for certain purposes, should be made, and that, in carrying out this policy, the legislature should grant the credit of the State for these few millions, and when that was expended—the work still being unfinished, and the application repeated for more money, and the State having become pledged—should continue to multiply these millions, and in the event it should prove that that money could not be drawn from the source where it was invested, I simply ask, in what condition the State will be? Will there not be many at that time who will say that the whole policy is a bad one? I am confident, that if we pursue this policy, the time will come when that will be the result; because the conviction having once settled down that the policy was a bad one, to retrace our steps now and commence anew in this age of enterprise, we shall be liable to be led too far.

I presume gentlemen will agree with me that there should be a limit; and I would ask those gentlemen where they would fix that limit? Can you point out a better one than that of submitting every case of the kind to the people? It was remarked by the honorable member from Taunton, (Mr. Morton,) when the subject of plurality was under debate in Committee, that he was unwilling to leave it to the legislature. And why? Because he feared the influences which are often brought to bear on the legislature. That was the reason he assigned then; and if there was force in that argument then, I ask the Committee is there not a double force in it as applied to this case, as a reason that this subject ought not to be left entirely to the decision of the legislature? I feel—and I am willing to confess that I feel—a sort of indignant resentment arising in my own mind, when legislators, in the fulfilment of their high trusts and in consequence of their official acts, shall be held up to public ridicule, and when they cannot even escape that worst of all opposition—the opposition of the women. The recent demonstrations of burning effigies needs a timely rebuke. Is there not danger that the members of this Convention may even feel some of the pressure of that influence which is brought to bear upon the members of the legislature? We live in a world where depravity has put its stamp upon everything; there is no perfection here, men are liable to be led away from what is right; there are many wicked influences brought to bear upon legislators. I would, therefore, do all in my power to fix such principles in our constitutional law as would relieve our legislators from these liabilities. How should we feel, if there was an assembly of men around us trying to influence us in our deliberations?

Without concluding his remarks, the gentleman gave way for a motion by Mr. DURGIN, of Wilmington, that the Committee rise, and the Committee accordingly rose, and the President having resumed the Chair of

THE CONVENTION,

The chairman of the Committee of the Whole reported progress, and leave was granted to the Committee to sit again.

Report from a Committee. Relating to the duties of the Governor.

Mr. DAVIS, of Worcester, from the Committee on Governor, submitted the following Report, which was referred to the Committee of the Whole, and ordered to be printed.

COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS.
In Convention, June 28, 1853.

The Committee to whom was referred so much of the Constitution in chapter 2, sect. 1, (except articles 9 and 10,) as relates to the Governor; a Resolve of June 22, relative to the 7th article in chap. 2; a Report of the Committee of the 14th of June, relative to the 7th article; have attended to the duty assigned them, and submit the following Report:

The Committee having ascertained, that the Committee to whom was referred so much of the Constitution as relates to the Militia, had reported to the Convention an article upon which the Convention have acted, that it becomes necessary to strike out of the Constitution the said 7th article. They, therefore, report the following Resolve.

ISAAC DAVIS, Chairman.

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Constitution by striking out the whole of article 7th in section 1st, chapter 2d.

Orders of the Day.

On motion of Mr. WALKER, of North Brookfield, the Convention proceeded to the consideration of the Orders of the Day.

The first matter was the following resolve, which was read a second time, viz.:

Resolved, That the Constitution be so amended as to require a Voting List, or Registry, and to protect presiding officers in adhering thereto.

The question recurred upon the final passage of the resolve, and it was accordingly passed without debate.

The second subject in the Orders of the Day, viz.: the Resolve on the subject of General Laws for Corporations was passed over for to-day.

Upon motion by Mr. WILSON, of Natick, the Committee resolved itself into

COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE,

Mr. Boutwell, for Berlin, in the Chair, for the consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday, viz.: the Report that it is inexpedient to act on the subject of Loaning of the Credit of the State.

Mr. COLE, of Cheshire. I respectfully ask the indulgence of the Committee, while I call their attention to what I consider the constitutional provision as it now exists, under which the legislature has hitherto acted upon this subject. I find no provision that gives authority to the legislature to grant the credit of the State in aid of private associations or corporations, unless it be found in the general clause contained in section 1st, article 4, which is as follows:

"And further, full power and authority are hereby given and granted to the said General Court, from time to time, to make, ordain, and establish all manner of wholesome and reasonable orders, laws, statutes and ordinances, directions and instructions, either with penalties or without, so as the same be not repugnant or contrary to the Constitution, as they shall judge to be for the good and welfare of this Commonwealth, and for the government and ordering thereof, and of the subjects of the same, and for the necessary support and defence of the government thereof."

Now, I would submit to the members of this Committee, whether a subject that embraces interests that are so general in their application, as the resolve which is now before the Committee for our consideration, ought not to be guarded with some further provision. I alluded, in the few remarks which I made yesterday, to the precedent which is furnished upon this subject in the Constitutions of the other States of this Union; but as the hour was late, I omitted to mention particularly what those provisions were, which were contained in the Constitutions of these other States, and recommended to gentlemen to examine these provisions for themselves. I will now, however, respectfully ask the indulgence of the Committee for a few moments, while I read extracts from a few of these Constitutions, bearing particularly upon this very point. The Constitution of the State of Virginia, provides as follows:—

"The liability to the State of any incorporated company or institution, to redeem the principal and pay the interest of any loan heretofore made, or which may hereafter be made, by the State, to such company or institution, shall not be released, and the General Assembly shall not pledge the faith of the State, or bind it in any form for the debts or obligations of any company or corporation."

There is a further provision, that whenever a debt is incurred for any special purpose of internal improvement, such debt shall not be incurred on the part of the legislature until it shall receive a three-fifths vote. I simply allude to this circumstance, to show how the Constitutions of other States, have watched the financial interests of their several States with jealous care; they have not left the whole subject in general terms as it exists in our Constitution, but they have thrown around the legislature certain restrictions.

I will now read from the Constitution of Mississippi:—

"No law shall ever be passed to raise a loan of money upon the credit of the State, or to pledge the faith of the State for the payment or redemption of any loan or debt, unless such law be proposed in the Senate or House of Representatives, and be agreed to by a majority of the members of each House, and entered on their journals, with the yeas and nays taken thereon, and be referred to the next succeeding legislature, and published for three months previous to the next regular election, in three newspapers of the State; and unless a majority of each branch of the legislature so elected after such publication, shall agree to and pass such law; and in such case the yeas and nays shall be taken, and entered on the journals of each House."

Here again we observe the same cautious care manifested by the representatives of the people, assembled in Convention, to watch over the disposition of the finances of the State. I will read from the Constitution of Louisiana:—

"The State shall not subscribe for the stock of, nor make a loan to, nor pledge its faith for, the benefit of any corporation or joint stock company, created or established for banking purposes, nor for any other purposes than those described in the following article.

"The legislature shall have power to grant aid to companies or associations of individuals, formed for the exclusive purpose of making works of internal improvement, wholly or partially within the State, to the extent only of one-fifth of the capital of such companies, by subscriptions of stock, a loan of money, or public bonds; but any aid thus granted shall be paid to the company only in the same proportion as the remainder of the capital shall be actually paid in by the stockholders of the company; and in case of loan, such adequate security shall be required as to the legislature may seem proper. No corporation nor individual association receiving the aid of the State, as herein provided, shall possess banking or discounting privileges. No liability shall be contracted by the State as above-mentioned, unless the same be authorized by some law for some single object or work, to be distinctly specified therein, which shall be passed by a majority of the members elected to both Houses of the General Assembly."

Here you find that a majority vote is required. I will now read from the Constitution of the State of Kentucky:—

"No act of the General Assembly shall authorize any debt to be contracted on behalf of the Commonwealth, except for the purposes mentioned in the thirty-fifth section of this article, unless provision be made therein to lay and collect an annual tax sufficient to pay the interest stipulated, and to discharge the debt within thirty years; nor shall such act take effect until it shall have been submitted to the people at a general election, and shall have received a majority of all the votes cast for and against it."

I will now read from the Constitution of the State of Ohio:—

"The credit of the State shall not, in any manner, be given or loaned to, or in aid of, any individual, association, or corporation whatever; nor shall the State ever hereafter become a joint owner or stockholder in any company or association in this State or elsewhere, formed for any purpose whatever."

I will now read from the Constitution of Indiana:—

"No law shall authorize any debt to be contracted on behalf of the State, except in the following cases: to meet casual deficits in the revenue, to pay the interest on the State debt, to repel invasion, suppress insurrection, or, if hostilities be threatened, provide for the public defence."

You find in this clause in the Constitution of Indiana that there is an exclusion of the legislature's ever granting or pledging the credit of the State unless for specific purposes; which amounts to an exclusion from loaning the credit of the State for private corporations or associations. I will read from the Constitution of the State of Illinois:—

"The credit of the State shall not in any manner be given to, or in aid of, any individual, association, or corporation."

In the Constitution of the State of Illinois we find that debts to a certain amount are authorized to be contracted by legislative enactment, for purposes of internal improvement, and in no other case, unless it be to repel invasion, or to meet some exigency that might be liable to arise suddenly. The Constitution requires that it shall be submitted to the people; so that no great enterprise can be entered into by the Constitution of the State of Illinois for the purpose of internal improvement, if a large amount of money is required, without the question being first submitted to the people. I will now read from the Constitution of the State of Michigan:—

"The credit of the State shall not be granted to, or in aid of, any person, association, or corporation. No scrip, certificate or other evidence of State indebtedness shall be issued, except for the redemption of stock previously issued, or for such debts as are expressly authorized in this Constitution. The State shall not subscribe to, or be interested in, the stock of any company, association, or corporation."

I will now read from the Constitution of the State of Missouri:—

"The General Assembly shall have no power to pass any law whereby any debt shall be created that shall cause the entire indebtedness of the State, contracted under this Constitution, to exceed, at any one time, twenty-five thousand dollars, except in cases of war, insurrection, or invasion. But the General Assembly may propose, by a vote of a majority of all the members elected to both branches thereof, the creation of a debt for any specified purpose, which shall be submitted to the direct vote of the people at the next general election thereafter, and if approved by a majority of the qualified voters voting on such question, shall be of full force and effect; provided that each proposition shall be for one object alone, and shall propose the ways and means by taxation for the payment of the debt and interest as they become due; and provided further, that no more than one proposition shall be submitted by any one session of the General Assembly, and that the debt proposed shall not have a longer time to run than twenty years."

I will now read from the Constitution of the State of Iowa:—

"The General Assembly shall not, in any manner, create any debt or debts, liability or liabilities, which shall singly or in the aggregate, with any previous debts or liabilities, exceed the sum of one hundred thousand dollars, except in case of war, to repel invasion, or suppress insurrection, unless the same shall be authorized by some law for some single object or work, to be distinctly specified therein, which law shall provide ways and means exclusive of loans for the payment of the interest of such debt or liability as it falls due, and also to pay and discharge the principal of such debt or liability within twenty years from the time of the contracting thereof, and shall be irrepealable until the principal and interest thereon shall be paid and discharged; but no such law shall take effect until, at a general election, it shall have been submitted to the people and have received a majority of all the votes cast for and against it at such election."

I will read only one more extract, which is from the Constitution of the State of Wisconsin:—

"The credit of the State shall never be given or loaned in aid of any individual, association, or corporation."

I respectfully submit, that if precedent has any weight upon the deliberations of this Committee, we have that which is of a respectable character, from a majority of the States of the Union. In almost every subject which has been brought to the attention of this Convention, great weight has been attached to precedents; and although this subject, as was remarked yesterday, under the present circumstances, comes before the Convention in a very favorable point of view, yet, let it be remembered that there is no want of precedent; for, in the constitutions of almost all the States out of New England, they cautiously confine the powers which are granted to the legislatures within certain wholesome restrictions, while at the same time they provide that moneys may be raised for purposes of internal improvement, and a reference to the constitutions of all these States seems to show that there is no such object in view as to curtail the prosperity, or to check in any manner the resources of the State. Ample provision is made—and this is a peculiar feature in these constitutions—whenever power is granted to the legislature to create a debt, that means shall be appointed to provide for the payment of that debt. In some instances a tax is to be levied annually to meet the interest of these loans. If a provision of that kind was in force in the State of Massachusetts, that whenever a debt was contracted by legislative enactment, a direct tax should be levied every year to meet the interest of that debt, I think it would have an important bearing on its general corporations among the people. I find that it is not a very popular sentiment in the country to be called upon to pay State taxes. In my own individual business affairs, whenever I contract a debt, I like to look to the end, to know whether I shall be able to meet it when pay day comes; and I think it would be a wise and judicious arrangement, in the management of our State affairs, whenever authority is granted to the legislature of Massachusetts to run the State in debt, that there should be in the same law a provision to meet the interest, if not the principal likewise.

The reason why we are called upon so often, to grant the credit of the State, to raise sums of money for private associations, companies and corporations, is not, in all cases, that the amount of money which is desired to be raised is so large, but because the objects for which it is called for, present so unfavorable a prospect of being good investments and paying operations. Now, we have but to look over the state of affairs of other States, in this regard, to find that railroads have been constructed, which have cost far greater sums of money than have ever been asked for from the State, by corporations. The Hudson River Railroad cost from seven to eight millions, or more, of dollars, and yet there was no want of capital on the part of the corporation. They could obtain, from private sources, all they wanted. Why? Because the investment was considered a good one, and because the road would pay when finished. There is, in the progress of construction at this time, in the Western States, a railroad known as the Illinois Central Road. It is being built by a private corporation, and they ask for no funds except what they could raise upon their own bonds, and they have been able to raise some five millions upon the merits of those bonds. And why have they been able to raise that loan? It is because capitalists have confidence that the investment will be a good one, and that the road will pay. When the facts connected with it are spread before the capitalists of Europe, they are willing to advance the loans upon the strength of the road. Now why is it that money cannot be raised in the same way in Massachusetts? Is it because there is a want of capital? If that is so, why do the people of Massachusetts and of New England, invest such large amounts of capital in the Western States? The difficulty is not, then, the want of capital, but because capitalists are afraid to risk an investment here. Corporations call upon the State to run a venture which individuals are not willing to assume, and herein is found the reason of the frequent application to the State for a loan of its credit. Now such being the case, upon these premises, is it not possible, is it not probable, that a State credit may be given to a project that never will pay? Is it not more than probable that such will be the result, if this continues to be the policy of the State?

I treated this subject, yesterday, upon the merits of the question. I knew that it was a delicate question, but I am clearly of the opinion, that the present policy of the State, in this respect, is an unwise and injudicious one. I am willing, Mr. Chairman, as humble a member as I am, of this Convention, to stand upon that opinion and upon the ground which I have taken, though the voice of this Convention may decide against me. I am willing to leave the soundness of my opinion to the decision of coming time. If time does not reveal, to the satisfaction of the people of the Commonwealth, within the period of forty years, or at all events within half a century, provided this policy shall be continued, that it is an unwise one, I shall be greatly deceived.

Before closing my remarks upon this subject, which to me is one of deep interest, I should like to present a few views upon it, in a political point of view. We, the members of this Convention, acting in our capacity as representatives of the people of this Commonwealth, have all taken a deep interest in preserving the purity of the ballot-box. We have felt that that was the place around which centered the dearest privileges that belong to us as freemen. We have felt the obligation which is imposed upon us, to guard against any evil, wrong, or interest, which might be brought to bear, to corrupt the exercise of the right of the elective franchise. I submit to the members of this Convention, that if we decide to approve of the resolution, that it is inexpedient to act upon this subject, we decide that it is a wise and judicious policy to continue to loan the credit of the State to private companies and corporations. It virtually amounts to that, and we, as the representatives of the people, directly from them, say to the legislature, go on in the course you have heretofore pursued, and continue the policy in which you are already enlisted. It amounts to that, and to that alone.

We learned yesterday, from the gentleman from Natick, (Mr. Wilson,) that there was so much capital now invested in railroad corporations, that its influence was decided and powerful over the legislature, and if I did not misunderstand the gentleman, he stated that such was the influence growing out of that amount of invested capital, that we had no reason to expect that a suitable general act of incorporation, touching railroads, could ever be passed by the legislature. And why? Because of the array of this influence, through the individuals that have made their investments in these corporations. Is it not to be feared that that influence will become a political one, and be brought in to operate throughout the State, in our elections? Am I deceived, and have I not heard it said, since I became a member of this Convention, that such would be the case? Has it not been said, by political men, at least by men who are willing to receive the promotion of a large constituency, that such a course, pursued in relation to this very subject, will enable them to get, for their party, more votes than they could obtain by pursuing an opposite course? Would it be strange, in the existing state of things in this Commonwealth, that in the ensuing election this question should be made to be the great question? Men are moved by motives of self-interest, and, while I would be glad to award to every individual a high position in his political career, still I think it by no means improbable, that that influence may be bad in its effects. I could tell of the influence which the East India Company is exerting upon the legislative department of the government of England. I am inclined to think that it was the influence of that powerful company upon legislation, and the relation which it sustained to the Bank of England, which led the armies of England into the Celestial Empire. Is not the cause of the war with China to be found in the fact, that the East India Company was desirous of extending their commerce into that quarter?

LOAN OF STATE CREDIT. — WEEKS — STETSON.

I call upon the members of this Committee to pause in this matter while it is in their power to give a check to this unhallowed influence which is felt throughout the whole State; an influence which is brought to bear, perhaps, upon every elector. I call upon them, while they have the power, to throw about the legislative authority some wholesome restrictions. I hope they will think well upon the subject before they vote not to act upon it.

Mr. WEEKS, of Harwich. I hope the amendment will be adopted. I think there ought to be some restriction and check imposed upon the legislature, in regard to granting the State credit to private corporations, especially where the projects in view are such that the State receive no indemnification in case of a loss or failure of the enterprise. Where the case to which it may be applied, is detrimental to the interests of one part of the State, and beneficial to another part, I think it should be left to the people to decide the matter. They should have some voice in relation to it. Notwithstanding, I think the legislature would make judicious and perhaps consistent appropriations of State credit, were it not for the evil influences which are brought to bear here, by those who make such applications to them. A floating corporation presents itself here, by its agents, and they are more constant in their seats than some of the members themselves, and they exert a great, I might, perhaps, say, an evil influence, upon the members of the legislature. They take members by the button, and fairly compel them to vote against their will. I think that has been done during the last year, in the last legislature. Now, Sir, I think the matter should be left to the people.

We are aware that the Western Railroad called for and received a loan of the State credit to carry out their project. It proved beneficial to the State as a whole, though it was detrimental to some portions of the State, as I very well know. But the State had something of an indemnification against loss. But what was the language of the people when that project was before the legislature? What was the language of the legislature? It was stated upon this floor that every man's farm in the Commonwealth would be mortgaged, and that idea was bandied about in all the newspapers in the Commonwealth. The gentleman from Barnstable said that every man on Cape Cod would be involved in debt, and their children would be to all eternity. Now that may be true. At any rate, I think it should be left to the people to say what amount of State credit should be loaned.

Mr. STETSON, of Braintree. It was not my intention to address the Convention this morning. But it seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that the members of this Convention, for some reason or another, are rather afraid to discuss this question, and I know of no other reason, perhaps, except that corporations employ eminent legal gentlemen to throw in documents, speeches or other matter, to prejudice this subject, that it may not pass. This question, in my opinion, is an important one. It is important to the rights of the people, which it affects. I believe, Mr. Chairman, that the doctrine is a republican and democratic one, and one which, I think, all who are in favor of liberty, equality and equal rights, should support. There is an under current moving in this matter, and I do not believe, unless the Committee will amend my proposition, and perhaps defer action for two or three years, that this question can be fairly discussed. It may be discussed but the importance of it, and its bearings will not be fairly considered by this Committee.

Is it not true that corporations which want exclusive rights and privileges, use and employ their money in besieging the legislature, and the members of this Convention? Sir, a legal gentleman called at my counting-room since this matter has been before the Convention, and put into my hands a document purporting to be a Report in reference to the Hoosac Tunnel, for my perusal. I have read it, and I have heard it discussed in this House, and I have seen speeches in reference to the Hoosac Tunnel distributed upon this floor. Now is it right that outside influences of this character should be brought into this Convention, which has in hand the altering and amending of the organic law of the Commonwealth? Is it right that this outside influence should be thrown in upon this body, to affect the rights of the people? Well, I put it to those one hundred and twenty-eight farmers who are members of this Convention—according to Mr. Poole's Statistics, though it should be one hundred and twenty-nine, for I am nothing but a farmer, and claim to be ranked among them,—I say I put it to those one hundred and twenty-eight farmers, if they are willing that the legislature—which is hereafter to be constituted upon some basis, we know not what as yet, for we do not know who they will represent, whether a majority or a minority of the people—should mortgage their farms, without themselves having the privilege of saying "yes" or "no" to it?

Now, Sir, I doubt whether it is a principle which can be sustained, except by an overruling majority, in a great public exigency. I do not doubt that the exigency may exist when it may be proper and desirable to loan the credit of the State. But unless such an exigency should arise when such a loan would be directly for the benefit of a very large portion of the people of the State, I hold that the legislature have no right to loan that credit, and in effect to mortgage the estates of all the farmers of the Commonwealth, unless a majority of all the legal voters in the Commonwealth say yea.

The gentleman from Cheshire, (Mr. Cole,) has referred to the constitutions of various States, to support this view of the subject, but he omitted to refer to that of California, and to those of several other States, which contain provisions of the same nature. The Constitution of California provides that the State debt shall be limited to $300,000, and that before the State loans her credit for any purpose of public improvement, the question shall first be put to the people of the State, for their decision. Now, that is the true doctrine. That is the republican doctrine, and a doctrine which I think it would be well for Massachusetts to adopt. But there is no reason why Massachusetts, rich as she is, and able as her citizens are to build all necessary works of improvement, should pledge the public faith for the construction of those improvements. If a case should arise, where these corporations cannot borrow the money of private capitalists, where the success of the project is so doubtful as not to meet the acceptance of private capitalists, I ask whether the legislature, under these circumstances, should do, in behalf of the State, what an individual capitalist would not do? Should they loan the credit of the State, and mortgage the credit of its inhabitants, in cases where an individual capitalist would not grant such a loan? I think not. And I trust this Convention will never authorize the legislature to grant any such loan, unless the emergency should be one which would commend itself to the good sense of the voters in the Commonwealth.

I do not propose to express any opinion upon the past action of the legislature upon this subject. The credit of the State has been loaned upon several different occasions to these private corporations, and I do not pretend to say that the exigencies were not such as to warrant the action which was taken, but I hope we shall have no more action of this kind upon the part of the legislature.

There is another reason why the Report of the Committee, as introduced, should not be adopted at the present stage of the proceedings, and indeed it is a reason why it should not be disposed of in any way for the present. The final action of the Convention upon the subject of the basis of representation has not yet been taken. The members of the Committee may be more willing that this matter should be left to the people, if they find that a minority of the people are to be represented in the legislature, and not the majority, than if the contrary principle were to prevail.

Sir, I think there is some necessity for placing a check upon the power of the future representatives who are to assemble in this hall, for the protection of the rights of the citizens of the Commonwealth. Such a power, placed in the hands of the legislature for all future time, is, in my opinion, dangerous to the safety of the Commonwealth. It would introduce into the politics of the State, an element of contention which is certainly not desirable should be introduced into our political arena.

The question of the loan of the State credit is one, in my opinion, of sufficient importance to call for the opinions of the wise and judicious men of this Committee. It would produce a sufficient cause, if injudiciously exercised, for those who are thus deprived of their political rights and political power, to rebel against the government, as the people of Rhode Island did several years ago. I believe the principles would be the same.

LOAN OF STATE CREDIT. — FRENCH — FOSTER — SARGENT — WILSON.

I heard, upon one occasion, a member of this body deliver a very able argument in the supreme court, sustaining these principles which I now advance. I presume that gentleman may sit quietly in this Convention, and see the principles so ably vindicated by himself, trampled upon, but I maintain that they are the same principles which he so ably advocated on the occasion to which I have alluded.

But, Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to continue this debate. I hope that some gentlemen who are able and willing, will defend the rights of the farmers of this Commonwealth. I have presented my opinions, and I am willing they should go for what they are worth. But before I sit down, in order that the Convention may deliberate upon this subject—aside from any reference to any political consideration connected with the present—I propose to indicate a modification, which I may at some future time make, of my amendment, so as to provide that it shall not take effect until after the year 1856. I think this amendment will free the minds of the members of this Committee from any bias which a certain measure, now being agitated throughout the Commonwealth, may give them, and which I presume does affect, more or less, nearly all of us.

Mr. FRENCH, of Berkeley. I hope the credit of the State will not be loaned to any private corporation or association for their pecuniary benefit. I believe the people of this Commonwealth, if they were to be consulted, would not be in favor of having their private property mortgaged for the special benefit of any special corporation. If a man had sent his ship to sea for ten years and it had returned safely, would that be a reason why he should not have insured for the future? We are told that the State has already loaned its credit to private corporations for the purpose of private speculation, and that is brought as a reason why we should continue to do so. It is said that the Commonwealth ought to treat all her children alike; that she ought not to give bread to one, and a stone to another. But it seems to me that there should be some stopping place where the State should rest, in giving its credit to private speculation. I submit, whether this granting the credit of the State to private speculation is not giving a premium to speculation itself? I submit, whether it is not holding out an inducement to the people of the State to go into speculation recklessly, believing that the credit of the State will be given to support them? Sir, I repeat that there should be some point fixed at which we shall stop in this matter. Is it possible that there is at this moment, a feeling pervading the members of this Committee, moved by the very impulse of speculation? What was the last amendment which it was proposed to offer to this Report? It was that no check should be placed upon this power of the legislature until 1856. Why not place it there now? Why shut the stable door after the horse has been stolen? I do hope and trust, Sir, that with all the evidence which has been presented here, the Committee will see the reasonableness and the necessity of placing this check upon the legislature at once, and that a stop will be put to their power to grant the loan of the State credit for purposes of private speculation.

Mr. FOSTER, of Charlemont. I desire to call the attention of the Committee, for a moment, to the case of a father and son, which may serve to illustrate this subject. The son has arrived at his majority, and his father calls him into his counting-room. The son is a noble, intellectual man, standing six feet and an inch in his stockings. He is a young man who has seen considerable of the world; been shrewd and calculating in his business transactions, his father has trusted him with the management of his affairs since he was sixteen, and he has never once betrayed his confidence or shown himself in any way incompetent; he has in every way shown himself admirably calculated to manage his business affairs with an almost certainty of success. Well, Sir, the father now calls up his son to him, and commences to read him a lecture of an hour and three-quarters long upon the subject of prudence, upon the subject of caution and carefulness in the management of his affairs, upon the danger of placing his credit in a position where it may, under any circumstances be violated, and finally winds up by restricting his son forever after, as long as they shall live together, from loaning his credit or involving it here or there under any circumstances whatever. Well, Sir, the son replies: "Have I not transacted your business heretofore with success? Have not the investments I have made on your account for the last three or four years in every instance proved a source of profit to you? Has not every enterprise I have engaged in more than returned the capital I have risked? Have I ever been wasteful or extravagant? Have I ever shown a want of prudence or carefulness in any business transaction in my life?" "That is true," the father replies, "you have ever shown yourself shrewd, keen and discreet in all the business you have ever been intrusted with, but that is no reason why you should continue to be intrusted with this power in the future." And then he refers him to a certain son in such a place who has squandered his father's estate, and the father had restricted him for the future in the use of his credit. Then he refers him to another son in another place who had also squandered his father's estate, and whose father had also placed a check upon the use of his credit. Then he refers him to another, and another, and so, to six or eight such cases, but each case was one where the son had been a spendthrift and had shown himself utterly incompetent for the transaction of business. [The member from Cheshire read restrictions to State credit in the Constitutions of several States which had repudiated or failed to pay the interest on their debts.] "But," the son replies, "Do not you understand the difference between these cases and mine? Do you not understand that these sons have been improvident in the management of their fathers' property, which I have not?" "That is very true," says the father, "but because you have been careful and prudent, is no argument that you will not, by and by, squander away all my estate. None at all. Because you have in all times past shown yourself an excellent financier, is no reason for supposing that you will not, by and by, become a spendthrift and squander away every thing you can get." [The gentleman applied this language to Massachusetts.]

understand the State of Massachusetts to be placed at the present moment. A shrewd State. A State that has been, and is a model to other States, in her pecuniary transactions. A State that has been exceedingly cautious in the management of her affairs—so much so that I have never heard of her losing a cent by any of her investments. And now, when her public improvements are nearly completed, when she will be asked for her credit to assist but in a few more instances; although she has prospered in every thing she has undertaken, and is now prospering, strange as it seems, to me, just now the people of a certain portion of the State, and I may add, of that portion which has hitherto received the greatest benefit, and all it wants from the credit of the State, have taken it into their minds to place a check upon the power of the State to go any farther in this direction. Well, Sir, I do not know but these people have good reason to apprehend danger in the future, but I ask wherein the danger consists for the future? It certainly cannot be drawn from the past history of our legislation; for, heretofore Massachusetts has shown herself shrewd and care-taking in all her transactions. She understands her interests, and if she continues to exercise her power and capital with as much discretion hereafter as she has done heretofore, no danger certainly need to be apprehended, and no check is required. But that father says to the son; "if you have any quarrel with your neighbors, why then you may have as much money as you please. If you have a fight with your neighbor's son, and you wish to contend with him, then you may have my credit to any extent." That is what the State proposes to do. We are at this day saying that we will let the credit of the State go for the purpose of resisting sudden invasion, a thing which we have never yet experienced since the days of our independence. I should be willing to shut up that door, but I should never be reconciled to the idea that we must shut our doors against internal improvements. They must be and will be carried in one form or another.

Mr. SARGENT, of Cambridge. I am hardly able to determine which way I ought to vote upon this question. It seems to me, that the decision of this question has been brought upon us rather prematurely. I think there is another and very important question which should be settled, and upon the decision which the Convention may make of that question, my vote will be determined upon this. If the legislature of Massachusetts, into whose hands the right of loaning the credit of the State is to be placed, are to represent the whole people of the Commonwealth, and the majority of the people through their legislature are to be left to decide this question, then I should have no particular objection to its being left in the hands of the legislature. But if, on the other hand, a basis of representation is to be adopted by which you place in the hands of two-thirds of the people of this Commonwealth the right to loan the credit of the State, then I should be ready to vote to restrict them as provided by this amendment. I hope, therefore, that the question of the basis of representation will be first settled.

Mr. WILSON, of Natick. I must confess, Mr. Chairman, my inability to see so far as my friend from Cambridge, (Mr. Sargent). I do not understand the connection between this plain and simple proposition, that hereafter Massachusetts shall not loan her credit, and the question of the basis of the organization of the House of Representatives. I do not see the dependence of one upon the other. This question is now before us, to be acted upon, to be decided upon its own merits, and not to be connected, directly or indirectly, with any proposition for the settlement of the basis of the House of Representatives. I am ready to vote upon this question now. Early in the session, my friend from Dracut, (Mr. Brown,) introduced a proposition for the appointment of a special Committee to consider this proposition. That Committee was appointed, and I understand, by a vote of eleven out of thirteen, they reported that it was inexpedient to act upon the subject. I shall vote to sustain the report of that Committee, and of course I shall vote against the proposition of my friend from Braintree, (Mr. Stetson,) who has made an earnest appeal to the farmers of the House to sustain the proposition which he has made. I am aware—for it has been already thrown out here—that certain gentlemen will vote against this amendment, and for the Report of the Committee, owing to a certain question that is agitating the public mind. My friend from Braintree has referred this morning to that question. He has made complaint that documents have been circulated this morning on the floor of the Convention in regard to that subject. I believe if the gentleman from Braintree will read what has been circulated, he will find that it is a very able argument of a distinguished member of the State Senate from Boston, Mr. Cary, against the Tunnel project, and upon his side of the question.

LOAN OF STATE CREDIT.—WILSON.

Suppose, Sir, it may be the case, that gentlemen on the floor of this Convention will vote against incorporating into the Constitution the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Braintree, (Mr. Stetson,) because they may be in favor of granting the credit of State for the Hoosac Tunnel. I find all around me here and elsewhere, gentlemen who, through a long series of years, advocated, sustained, and carried through a policy by which Massachusetts has loaned her credit to the amount of more than five millions of dollars, that have now changed their policy altogether, and wish to incorporate into the Constitution a proposition of this nature, which a few years ago they would have resisted with all their powers. While gentlemen suspect that some of us may be governed by reference to that question now pending before the State, I hope they will see to it that they are not governed in their action here by hostility to that proposition, and especially that they will not act under the influence of a great and controlling railroad interest, where the State has already loaned its credit to the amount of $4,000,000.

I should vote against the proposition of my friend from Braintree, if the proposition to aid the Hoosac Tunnel was not before the State. I am opposed to the proposition to limit the credit of the State, ever have been opposed to it, and ever intend to be opposed to it. I look upon it as a narrow policy—a policy that sprung out of a condition of things, that I trust is never more to exist in this country.

What is the origin of this new doctrine? It was not the doctrine of the men who made the early constitutions of the country. It was not the doctrine held by our public men for two generations. When Gen. Jackson came into power in 1829, the men who elevated him had assailed the administration of John Quincy Adams for its policy in regard to internal improvements. When that party came into power, under the lead of that great general and greater statesman, that policy of the federal government in regard to internal improvements was arrested, and I am glad it was arrested then and there. This question of internal improvements was then left to the State governments, and under the pressure of public necessity for railways and canals, many of the States entered upon a policy of internal improvements, and from 1830 to 1840, something like $200,000,000 of State debts were incurred, mostly for these purposes. Many of the States, in this policy of internal improvements, have gone into extravagant expenditures and speculations. Pennsylvania had incurred something like $40,000,000 of debt in internal improvements, the interest of which she was unable promptly to pay—she was compelled to suspend payment under the pressure. Illinois had incurred a debt of about $16,000,000, and she was compelled to suspend payment. Maryland and some other States were embarrassed by these large debts. Mississippi was not only compelled to suspend payment, but she actually repudiated her debts, and the name and the credit of the country at home and abroad was affected by this discreditable policy. Under the influence of this state of things, the States have incurred debts to the amount of more than $200,000,000.

Having engaged, many of them, in the direct work of internal improvements, and having brought upon themselves great pressure and embarrassment, the people, while under the influence of that state of affairs, in the new States, inserted in their Constitutions a provision that the credit of their States should not be loaned; and the States, also, that have recently held conventions, many of them, have incorporated a similar provision into their Constitutions. This whole policy springs out of the great abuses which have existed in several of the States. How was it in this Commonwealth? Massachusetts entered into no system of internal improvements of her own. This Commonwealth, guided and governed by a wise policy, loaned its credit, to the amount of $4,000,000 to the Western Railroad, and by so doing carried through that great project—a project that has poured immense wealth into the city of Boston and other portions of the State. That policy was assailed. My friend over the way, (Mr. Cole,) has referred to it this morning. It was said all through the Commonwealth that the farms of the people were mortgaged to pay this debt of the Western Railroad. All apprehensions in regard to that matter have passed away, and that policy stands vindicated by the results. Massachusetts loaned her credit to carry on that great work; but it was amply secured. She has spent no money directly for internal improvements, as New York, Pennsylvania, Illinois, and other States have done. She simply loaned her credit, taking ample and abundant security to carry through these great projects, and now, here, to-day, who doubts the wisdom of that policy or the ample and perfect security held by the Commonwealth? I am ready to trust Massachusetts in the future, as in the past. Because new States, having no settled policy, and having squandered or mismanaged their finances, have been compelled by the people to insert in their Constitutions a provision of this character, I see no reason why we should borrow from them a provision of this character and incorporate it into our Constitution—a provision which has cost the people of the State of New York millions of dollars, by its unwise incorporation into their Constitution—a provision which they are endeavoring to modify, under the lead of Mr. Vanderbilt, a leading Democratic politician, I believe. The whole matter is in process of settlement at Albany, and I have no doubt that an overwhelming majority of the legal voters of New York, to-day, would vote to strike the provision out of the Constitution. It was incorporated into that instrument under peculiar circumstances, and it has been to them a source of great embarrassment ever since. Now the people of New York will vote to strike it out, and, in my opinion, they ought to strike it out, or modify it. I wish to borrow no such policy. I believe that government has its duties in times of peace as well as in times of war, and I believe that the government may loan its credit or incur a debt for a wise and comprehensive policy in times of peace, as well as incur a debt for war. I would leave this matter just as it stands. I would, however, be careful and cautious in regard to loaning the credit of the State. I would loan it in no case excepting where it would be for the benefit of the people, and where it could be made reasonably safe and secure. When that necessity arises, I am ready to trust the legislature of this Commonwealth to decide upon the merits of the case.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to detain the Committee in discussing this question. I say here, to-day, that I am not to be governed, that I am not governed, in my views upon this question by anything that has arisen during the past two years; and I hope that gentlemen who favor this doctrine of putting into the Constitution this provision—men who resisted this Constitutional Convention to the last—men who are deeply interested in the great existing corporations, can say that they are not governed by any question which has arisen recently in this State.

I listened to the very elaborate speech of my friend from Cheshire, (Mr. Cole,) in which he has gone over the whole of this matter, and has presented with great distinctness and clearness the arguments that sustain the policy of preventing the State in the future from loaning its credit. Sir, I do not, I cannot agree with his view of the matter; and I do not, I cannot agree, either, with my friend from Braintree, (Mr. Stetson.) This talk about a Democratic policy does not seem to me to be of any value. Why, Mr. Chairman, the great Democratic party sustained Gen. Jackson in his Maysville veto, and in his policy against our entering into internal improvements; their orators everywhere, and their presses everywhere, sustained that position. I think they were right, substantially. But how is it to-day? Why, a Democratic Senate and House of Representatives have passed a bill, authorizing surveys for a great railroad to the Pacific Ocean which is to cost one hundred millions of dollars, ten times more than ever has been expended for internal improvements by the general government, since the beginning of the government. In Mr. Adams's administration, a few thousand dollars were spent, annually, but the Democracy became satisfied the policy was a bad one, and they abandoned it. But now, a Democratic administration, under the lead of a statesman from New Hampshire, a statesman of the straightest sect of Constitutional Constructionists, goes on to make surveys, from Memphis, from St. Louis, and also by a northern route, under Gov. Stevens. The government proposes to build this road at an expense of at least one hundred millions of dollars. I go for that railroad to the Pacific. Democratic theories give way before such practical questions.

Mr. COLE, of Cheshire. I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Natick if it is proposed to loan that money to a private corporation?

Mr. WILSON. I think not. The government proposes to do more than that, it proposes to go on and spend millions to build it. Better far to loan the money and take ample security from a company or an individual, to accomplish a great work than to enter upon the work as a State or national government. Every man knows that a corporation or a private individual will do, and can do, any piece of work far cheaper than a government can do it.

Our friends talk about political considerations. I do not like to refer to political considerations, but I have a single suggestion to make to those gentlemen, here, who hold themselves responsible for the results of this Convention. We have carried this Convention before the people of Massachusetts by labors almost unparalleled in the political struggles of this country. We lost the Convention at the first trial, and we lost it because there is an instinctive feeling in the breasts of the people of Massachusetts against any untried experiments, any headlong changes or reforms. We have a history, Mr. Chairman, running back two hundred and thirty years. Unlike the people of new states, who have no past, who look to the future, the people of Massachusetts reverence the works of their ancestors. They touch not with irreverent hands the works of their fathers. It cost an immense effort to carry this Convention. Having carried the Convention, I would make the necessary reforms and changes, but I would not put into the Constitution a provision, even if I was in its favor, if I knew that it would endanger the adoption of the amended Constitution by the people. I say frankly to the friends of constitutional reform, that the incorporation of this proposition into the Constitution, will array against us thousands of voters who are now with us. I caution the friends of the Convention to look to this question, and not to follow the lead of any one, in or out of the Convention, in a policy that will endanger the amended Constitution before the people.

Mr. COLE. If the gentleman will allow me, I would like to ask him what the policy of the State of New York has been, as he has made reference to that, with regard to loaning the credit of the State to corporations. I would like to know whether the policy of that State was not for many years, to loan its credit, and pledge that credit to private corporations. And I wish the gentleman would tell me what the result of that policy was in the State of New York.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Chairman, I understand the policy of the State of New York to have been this: that she not only loaned her credit, but she went into internal improvements to a great extent—on her own account.

Mr. COLE. I would like to ask, again, if the policy adopted on the part of the State of New York, in entering into internal improvements—and among the works of that kind, the Erie Canal stands pre-eminent—has not proved a judicious, wise, and sound policy, and has not proved a source of great profit from year to year?

Mr. WILSON. The debt of New York is $22,000,000, her property is valued at $35,000,000. I am glad to see the gentleman from Cheshire advocating internal improvements after all. New York did expend millions of dollars in internal improvements; but much of that money being expended under the direction of the State, it was not so judiciously expended as it could have been. But I do not wish to detain the Committee further. I will simply say that I shall vote against the amendment of the gentleman from Braintree without any reference to the Hoosac Tunnel. I am opposed to the proposition embraced in the amendment—I ever have been and ever expect to be unless my views are greatly changed.

Mr. COLE. I wish to say to the gentleman from Natick, with his permission, that I understand that the policy of the State of New York had been, for a great number of years, the same which the gentleman now advocates.

Mr. WILSON. If the gentleman understands the policy of New York, as I suppose he does, he will find that New York entered on a direct system of internal improvements; that she built and has widened her canals, and has had her own commissioners and superintendents of her public works.

Mr. Chairman, let Massachusetts retain the sovereign power to loan her credit and to incur debts, if in the discretion of the legislature the interests of the people demand its exercise. In the progress of events it may be for her interest to loan her credit or to invest her funds in some public enterprise. Let us not tie the hands of the legislature or of the people, by the incorporation of this amendment into the organic law.

Mr. DUNCAN, of Williamstown. Mr. Chairman. The gentleman for Abington, (Mr. Keyes,) a few days since, foreshadowed the course which this debate would take. He assumed to inquire whether this order would have been introduced, had not the project of a Hoosac Tunnel been lately before the legislature, and whether it was not the fact, that it was again to be discussed by this Convention? When the order was introduced, it occurred to me that the mover had a direct reference to that project, and so it seems the gentleman for Abington understood it, and, with his accustomed frankness, made the open avowal. I am sorry that it should come in as an issue at all, but I suppose a bore of that magnitude is not easily to be kept out of sight; and, since it has been formally introduced to the Committee, by the gentleman from Braintree, (Mr. Stetson,) we must look at it as it is. Every gentleman has his own method of arguing his case, and undoubtedly this is his privilege, within certain limitations, but I am compelled to doubt the correctness of taste in any individual, who attempts to enforce his argument by an appeal to the prejudices and passions of men, rather than their reason and understanding.

It has been considered, heretofore, as a cunning fetch in political tactics, to appeal to the prejudices of farmers, by holding up to them the mortgages which the State has given on their farms, for the purpose of aiding corporations and securing monopolies. And, within the last half hour, the one hundred and twenty-eight farmers of this Convention have thus been appealed to, with great warmth and fervor, by one who undoubtedly has much more than an ordinary affection for farmers, and farming interests; but, Sir, I claim the right of appeal also, and I ask, whether this Convention is a popular or a deliberative body, and whether we shall take counsel of our fears and prejudices, or calmly and dispassionately investigate the question before us, with reference to its wisdom or necessity. There are two hundred and ninety-one members of this Convention who are not farmers, but does it follow that they are not land-holders? yet not one word is said about mortgaging their houses and lands, to enable corporations to carry forward "enterprises of great pith and moment." And for myself, were I a farmer I should consider that I was not very highly complimented by the frequent allusions to the "rural districts," which gentlemen are so fond of making. But to return—the easiest way to shut out the light, is to hold something before the eye, and for that purpose nothing answers better than a mortgage—hold before men the instrument which is to convey to the Western Railroad, or Hoosac Tunnel, their houses and lands, and immediately the cry is raised of ruin and monopoly. I am told that the restriction of the State credit is a Democratic policy, and, therefore, we must adopt it. For one, I deny it. I grant that in '39, (if I am not mistaken,) it was used as a political slogan; but, in my humble opinion it had far less influence on the result of that election, than a certain obnoxious law. I have no objection against calling it a democratic topic, since it suited their purpose, and served their turn, but I doubt the propriety of hallowing it, and placing it in the Constitution because it was thus fortunately useful. What the true Democratic doctrine is, cannot be easily determined, and therefore I adopt the excellent political maxim, "as I understand it," which gives great individual scope and latitude, therefore the doctrine that Massachusetts must restrict the legislature in the use of the State credit, is not the Democratic doctrine, "as I understand it." So much for its Democratic relations. But there is a power behind the party, stronger than the party, which demands the engraftment of this resolve into the Constitution—the power which fought, through material agents, the appropriations for the Hoosac Tunnel in the legislature of last winter. Do you doubt it? Look at the documents which have flooded this floor, to which the gentleman from Natick alluded. I was not among the fortunate ones who received a pamphlet "with the respects of T. G. Cary," but through the kindness of a friend, I have had an opportunity of examining one. There may be a difference of opinion, but for one I think it in bad taste for the Hon. T. G. Cary to distribute his argument against the Tunnel loan bill, just at this juncture—it seems too much like an attempt, on his part, to influence the members of the Convention in their decision upon a great question, where, if freedom from bias is ever necessary, it is here.

I will do him the justice to say that his argument is an able one, and well enough in its place; but the character and occasion are sadly out of joint. It answered its purpose when delivered, but its introduction on this floor, just at this moment, must be regarded as another attempt at coercion in that power, which is ever mindful of its own interests and anxious to perpetuate its monopoly. He says, very quietly, in his concluding remarks: "I look for great evils to come from the rivalry that would be engendered by this measure." I suppose he means that the fare and freight would be reduced on the Western Railroad if the Hoosac mountain was tunnelled. This has been a cunningly devised plan, and it belongs to this Convention to say whether it shall succeed or not—whether, after all, and it must come to this, that the Western Railroad shall give law, and constitution, to the people of Massachusetts.

The gentleman from Natick, with great force and clearness, has given the reasons which should induce him to vote for the Report of the Committee. These reasons, I take it, are satisfactory, and such as must commend themselves to every friend of reform in this State. He says very wisely, "that we are not here to legislate for the people, but to propose certain changes in the organic law, which, if accepted, shall act as checks and balances on future legislation." It is, in fact, a self-imposed law, the last will and testament of the people, by which they devise and grant power in general terms only, leaving it wholly with the legislature to meet to the especial wants of the Commonwealth in conformity to it. But we cannot cover the whole ground of legislative action. We must be content to establish general principles, and then leave to future legislation the duty of filling up the minutiae and carrying out the details. And I ask gentlemen, is it not wise to do so? Again: is it well to introduce into the Constitution any question of doubtful policy? And this, in my humble judgment, is one of that character, and if adopted into the Constitution, and the Constitution submitted to the people as an entirety, will cause a rejection of the whole. Then shall we hazard all these reforms for this question of doubtful expediency, even though urged never so strongly by a power which works unseen through every chink and crevice of governmental policy.

My friend upon my right challenges me to say how this influence is exerted. I cannot tell; I am unable to trace power through all its ramifications, and say, where, and how, it urges, persuades, and moves men. But let me state one of the most common methods, one of easiest facility. It has become the custom of railroad corporations to furnish members of the legislature with tickets at half price for transportation over their roads. There is nothing improper in this—quite a business transaction; but the kindness of such corporation is not lost upon the individual. He thinks, honestly enough, that such an act of courtesy entitles the corporation to his warmest thanks; and not to be outdone in kindness, he naturally enough falls into a partizanship, and at last identifies his interests with those who are willing to serve him. This is only the natural tendency of kindness, and men do and must gravitate towards the source of attraction. But the suspicion is rife among the people that more material means than tickets were used by a certain corporation to defeat a project before the legislature of last winter. I am unacquainted with the process of legislation, and therefore cannot say but this is the regular method of procedure; but it seems to me, if these charges are true, it savors somewhat of corruption.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chairman will remark that reflections upon the legislature are not strictly in order.

Mr. DUNCAN. I will endeavor not to transgress the rules of order, but it came in so easily that I could not resist the temptation of stating myself what I have heard so often stated by others.

Mr. COLE. If the gentleman from Williams-town will allow me, I would like to ask him whether it has not been the practice for all railroad corporations to carry members of the legislature free, before this subject was in agitation at all.

Mr. DUNCAN. Possibly. I do not know, but then the gentleman will pardon my skepticism when I say that they would be just as likely to carry every-body free as members of the legislature, unless they expected, in some way, to reap a benefit more than equal to their fare. The same rule applies to the Convention; and at this moment the pressure from outside is so great that we can barely stand up against it; but I hope there is mainly firmness enough to resist the monster force which has hitherto carried all before it.

Mr. Chairman, I have no disposition to weary the patience of the Committee, but before I close my remarks I would like to say one word on the subject of the application of this resolve to the policy of other States. Much has been said about a similar provision in the Constitution of the State of New York, and it seems to have been argued, that if it had been found good for the State of New York, it must therefore be good for Massachusetts, very much on the principle that "what is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander." But let me remind gentlemen that we have nothing to do with the Constitution or policy of New York. We are to determine what shall be the Constitution and what shall be the policy of Massachusetts; and I look upon it as a much safer precedent to refer to her own past history, and to let our action on her future destiny be governed by a wise regard for the past, than to follow theoretical vagaries at the expense of sound discretion. Has the public property been squandered, that the people are clamorous for the adoption of a provision which will hereafter tie the hands of the legislature, that they, or others through them, may not plunder the public chest? I believe not. If they have erred heretofore, it was on the side of parsimony and not prodigality; and therefore I am opposed to the adoption of any clause in the Constitution to prevent them from doing what they have repeatedly refused to do. At this present juncture it seems like surplussage; for the power to which I have referred before, is a sufficient check without any constitutional provision to the contrary. We have had repeated glorifications of Massachusetts, and nothing has been said in her praise to which I do not fully assent; and I only refer to this to call the attention of gentlemen to the fact, that all her greatness and prosperity has grown up under the Constitution which we have assembled to reform. Let us approach it with some misgivings, rather than lay violent hands upon it under the false impression that "change is reform;" lest we find too late that we have "advanced backwards," while the people refuse to follow.

Mr. HURLBUT, of Sudbury. As allusion has been made to the Committee who reported this proposition, and as the chairman of that Committee is not now, and probably will not be present to-day, I beg leave to submit to the consideration of the Committee an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Braintree, which is, to strike out all after the word "Resolved" in the second line, and to insert the following:—

That "from and after the first day of May, which will be in the year 1855, the credit or moneys of the State be not loaned to the prosecution of any private enterprise, unless the question be first submitted to and accepted by the people."

I suppose, Mr. Chairman, that I shall be called upon to give my vote upon this question, and I am unwilling to do so, or to give it silently, as a member of that Committee and a member of the minority of the Committee to whom allusion has been made, without first explaining my position. Reference has been made by gentlemen to the leading of others. Sir, I came into this Convention a free man, independent of the views and independent of the action of any other gentleman. I went into the Committee with these views, and I entertain a view upon that subject different from the majority of that Committee. Nor do I here allow myself to be guided or governed by the views or feelings of any man or of any party of men. I deny the right that any man has or may have to control my action. I hold myself responsible only to my own conscience and to the God who gave me being. I believe, Sir, that this doctrine of State loans is not in accordance with the views or wishes of the people of this Commonwealth. I believe, that if we were assembled under other circumstances than those under which we are now assembled, this Convention would give the amendment introduced by the gentleman from Braintree its cordial assent. But we are told from one quarter and another that if we entertain that amendment or anything approximating to it, it will prejudice the acceptance of our doings in the minds of the people of this Commonwealth. Sir, if that be true, let us stop where we are—let us pause forever. If gentlemen dare not come into this Convention and express their views and act in accordance with the dictates of their free, enlightened and honest convictions lest the people of the Commonwealth should overthrow all else which the Convention has done, I say, let it be overthrown. Sir, I entertain no such views; the people will pass upon each proposition separately upon its own merits. We were told the other day that if we passed another certain proposition, we should thereby secure the cooperation of five thousand voters in the Commonwealth; but I submit whether this be a consideration worthy of this body. I believe the true democratic principle to be this: that the State credit shall not be loaned to private enterprises. Had there not been an enterprise of that kind; had the Hoosac question been settled in the last legislature, we might now justly stop where we are; we might have started anew, and say that, from this time forth, there shall be no State loan for any private enterprise without the assent of the people. But, Sir, this aid has been granted in several instances. Some gentlemen—more than one, I think—have called upon us to state if a single instance could be produced in the history of the Commonwealth, where one dollar, or a fraction of a dollar, of the people's money has been sacrificed in consequence of any loan or grant of the State credit. Sir, if our records be true, money has been sacrificed and lost. I will refer gentlemen to the action which this State took in 1820, when, although the amount was comparatively small, yet there is the fact of a loss which may stand as a precedent for future time. The State purchased thirty shares in the Gloucester canal, and it was a complete failure. Not one dollar or one cent of that money was ever received by the State again. I believe, Sir, that although the Commonwealth of Massachusetts has been generally successful in all her enterprises of this kind, yet that does not warrant the assertion, upon this floor or elsewhere, that she always will be. We may have had wiser or better legislators than we shall have in this respect. I pretend not to say how that will be; but it is clear to my mind that the time may come, and in the common occurrence of human business the time will come, if we continue this policy, when we shall engage in some enterprise that will not prove as fortunate as those in which we have engaged hitherto. I would therefore place the matter beyond the control of the legislature; I would not give them the power thus to entangle themselves and contract a debt for the people of this Commonwealth. I believe this principle is right. I do not agree with the gentleman from Cheshire that the Constitution of this State does warrant the legislature in loaning the public money for private enterprises. Upon this I entertain an honest difference of opinion from him.

But, Sir, there is one point which this resolution contemplates, that I wish now to suggest; and that is this: Since 1822, and up to 1839, the legislature has granted very liberally these loans; it has loaned its name and its credit for private enterprises. I consider, therefore, that other bodies of men—other corporations and other individuals—have, in consequence of this, had expectations raised in their minds of receiving similar aid. In consequence of these antecedents, persons in another quarter of the Commonwealth have come up here in years past, seeking a loan of the State credit for their own purpose. I think, under these circumstances, it would be unjust and wrong, inasmuch as the State has already embarked in these enterprises, to shut them off now, at once and forever. I wish to be understood distinctly, that although I am opposed to the principle of loaning the State credit in this manner, I would only yield thus much for the sake of equality and fairness. I cannot agree with the gentleman from Natick in thinking that the farmers generally are opposed to the principle of this amendment, and by the way, I believe that gentleman does not belong to the farming community—I believe he represents a mechanical and not a farming interest—although he may, perhaps, have better means of knowing the views of farmers than myself. I am decidedly of opinion, however, that the farmers of his county and mine, which is the same, are opposed to the loan of the State credit for private enterprises. It is only because the State has entered into it—because she has granted this aid, and thus others have been led to expect it in their own cases, and think they have reason to expect it, that I would prolong the time to give them an opportunity to accomplish their objects and get the facilities which they require; but I hope the time is not distant when it shall not be in the power of the legislature alone to grant this aid to any private company.

And, Sir, this resolution does not cut off the possibility of assistance to any person or to any company of persons hereafter, and on this point I wish to be very particular. If the people of this Commonwealth are willing that the monies which they pay should go for any other than the necessary purposes of government; they are capable, and in my humble judgment they alone are capable, of expressing that willingness. If the matter is submitted to them and they approve of it, they will express that approval, but if it does not meet with their views, they will say “no” to it, and there is where I wish to have the responsibility rest.

Sir, I am opposed to the Report of the Committee because it leaves the question open for all coming time. And I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Braintree because it would at once and completely cut off expectations just and proper. And, Sir, I oppose it from another consideration. The State has helped to create a monopoly in one section, and it is from that source more than any other, in my judgment, that opposition has arisen. Gentlemen well understand the outside influence, from the Western Road. No one has denied the statements made on this floor, that thousands of dollars are paid annually by that road to retainer counsel, against this new enterprise of the Hoosac Tunnel. And why this opposition? Because in that it sees, or imagines it sees, a rising competition. Was there any such opposition to the Norwich, to the Portland, or to the Andover and Haverhill roads? Certainly not. And each of these claimed and received aid from the State. Sir, I am opposed to a monopoly. The Western Road, with its five millions of dollars, has been the great opposing centre to this enterprise. Massachusetts has long been a nursing mother to private corporations, and now, for the first time in her history, gentlemen propose not only that she conceive not again, but that she choke and strangle this little one just struggling into life. Sir, I protest against it. The amendment which I have had the honor to submit, provides, that after a future day named, the State shall stand aloof from private loans while, at the same time, it offers an opportunity to such as have expected, and justly too, to renew and perfect their claim.

Sir, having submitted these my views, humble though they be, I yield the floor, with my hearty thanks for the indulgence of the Committee.

Mr. HOOPER, of Fall River. Coming from a section of the State which is not particularly interested in the great projects which gentlemen are disposed to make an exception to the general rule, I wish merely to remark, that for one, I am opposed to the gentleman's amendment, and indeed to all amendments which have been offered to the original Report. And I would say to the gentleman from Cambridge, (Mr. Sargent,) that I am not sorry that this question has come up for discussion at this time, for I am ready to discuss this question independently and by itself, as I am every other question, upon its own merits. I have no fear that there will be any injustice done to any other question which can have any bearing upon this. Sir, if this were a new question, if this credit of the State never had been loaned in any case, I for one would take a different position from what I shall now take. I should have contended at the outset that under no circumstances should the credit of the State be loaned, without the question being first submitted to the action of the people. But the case is now different, and the question is not an open one, as the credit of the State has been loaned, and repeatedly loaned, and thus far successfully. Now gentlemen come forward and propose and desire to put a provision into the Constitution, that shall put a stop to this policy, and cut off the loaning of the State credit. But these very gentlemen would put in a saving clause, by which the operation of the provision should go into effect so far in the future as to accommodate a particular project, as I understand it, to which, in my opinion, if the State credit can be safely loaned, it can be safely done in any case which may hereafter arise. If we leave the principle open to projects which have already been proposed and advocated, I see no reason why we should not leave it open hereafter to every case that may arise, for I can conceive no project which will ever be started that can present more risk than this to which gentlemen refer.

Now, Sir, in relation to this question, I wish to say in the outset, that I have no hostility to it, though I do not know that I am an advocate of it. I have not examined it to an extent sufficient to enable me to judge whether the scheme is practicable and plausible or not. But I say this, that if a case can be made out as favorable to loaning the State credit to that undertaking, showing it to be safe to do so, then I go for letting the State assist that project as well as others. I believe, if I know the feeling of the people of the section of country from which I come, they have no prejudices and jealousies upon the subject, and they are willing that it should receive the same aid that other projects receive. I see no reason why we should make this project an exception, or why we should put it into the Constitution at all. I say leave it out, and accept the Report of the Committee, and let that project stand upon its own merits, and leave the legislature to judge and vote in relation to it, as upon any other case which may be presented to them. For this reason, I shall vote against every proposition to amend, and in favor of the original Report.

Mr. KEYES, for Abington. I never expected to take a very active part in the discussion of this question, nor do I pretend to take a very lively interest in it one way or the other, though it appeared to me that it was one of that sort of questions which might require me to say something, because it is somewhat delicate in its nature, and I have never been in the habit of being alarmed by public opinion.

It seems to me, that there may be a few words said in relation to some representations which have been made upon this subject. In the first place, it will be borne in mind, that if the amendment offered by the gentleman from Braintree, (Mr. Stetson,) is adopted, it will not shut up the public treasury entirely against great public works. It simply puts upon the matter this restriction, that the question shall be left to the people to decide. Is there anything wild in that?

Now, this Convention have decided that the legislature, chosen by the people of the Commonwealth, are not fit to be trusted even with the simple question of their adjournment. It has been intimated here that they will either sit here day after day for two dollars pay per day, or else for the purpose of wrangling and quarrelling and debating, and using up time unnecessarily. If that is the character of the legislatures which are to be hereafter—and that is the character which this Convention has assumed that they will hold—it seems to me, that it will not be very wild if we refuse to trust such a body with the unlimited wealth and property of the State. Therefore there is nothing alarming in the proposition itself.

Now, Sir, there are other things to be considered; and it strikes me, and I am firm in the faith, that were it not for the matter of the Hoosac Tunnel, some restriction would now be put into the Constitution upon the matter of loaning the State credit. The loan first made to the Western Railroad commenced, I believe, about the year 1836-7, and ended in 1841. Here was a great project, which was supposed to be beyond the reach and accomplishment of private corporations and individuals. It was an experiment, and an experiment which ought to have been tried. It was tried, and the object was accomplished. That was an experiment worthy of being tried, even had Massachusetts sunk every dollar of that loan. But so long as that object has once been accomplished, you do not want to try it again on the same ground. So long as the object was to open one avenue from the seaboard to the Hudson River, it was a project worthy the enterprise of the whole people of the Commonwealth. But since it has been accomplished, you do not want another of the same kind effected, either by public or private means, until this great avenue ceased to be able to perform the work for which it was made. The arguments which were made in favor of the Western Railroad are not at all applicable to the Hoosac Tunnel. The one, I hold to be a great State project, and the other a local project. I do not propose, however, to go into a discussion of that subject at all; but I want to say, that the legislature, in consequence of granting that loan, found that many other corporations in the State came before them one after another, and by arguments drawn from that loan, succeeded in inducing the legislature to make other loans.

It is assumed on all hands here, that Massachusetts has never lost anything, and never will lose anything by these loans. How is it known? Scarcely one of those loans have been paid. We are not wholly out of the woods, and it is by no means entirely impossible that Massachusetts may lose a great deal by these corporations yet. I do not hold it entirely certain she may not. The stock of some of the railroads which have obtained the aid of State credit, has been worth almost nothing, and in the multiplication of railroads, and in view of their being affected by the various new internal improvements that have been projected, who knows but that, within the twenty-five years which are to elapse before the loans are to be paid, these roads may not fail altogether.

After the legislature stepped in, and made these loans, the railroad corporations from every quarter of the Commonwealth came pressing into the legislature for similar grants. The legislature saw that it had commenced a plan or system which it would be dangerous to carry out, and I ask if the people of Massachusetts did not accord with the design and purpose to put a stop to it? From 1841, if I am not mistaken, until the present time, the legislature has refused constantly to grant a loan of the State credit for these purposes, and I ask if the people of Massachusetts do not approve of that? To be sure, the legislature came very near granting the State credit to the amount of two millions of dollars at the last session of the legislature, and if it had been made, would it not have been the source of other applications and grants? Would it not have been the basis upon which to found arguments for repeating the same grants for other sections of the State? The argument in favor of this grant of the State credit to the Hoosac Tunnel, was founded upon the fact that the State of Massachusetts granted its credit to the Western Railroad. Such was the argument, and such its foundation. Had it not been for the prejudice against the Western Railroad, which was brought to bear upon the question, the Hoosac Tunnel claim would not have been half as successful as it was. When I had the honor of being one of the directors of that road, I recommended to its directors to say nothing about the Hoosac Tunnel, and to keep its attorneys and agents out of the State House. I told them not to lift a hand, if they did not want the Hoosac Tunnel loan to be carried. I saw that the prejudice against that Western Railroad was the chief capital for the Hoosac Tunnel. In relation to buying friends by a liberal distribution of tickets, that corporation has never been considered as very liberal, but has had a reputation directly the other way. Along its line I found that its enemies exist in great numbers, on account of the manner in which it conducted its affairs.

But it strikes me that, over and beyond all this, there is another subject which should be considered, and that is, the influence, growing out of attempts to obtain State loans, which is brought to bear upon the legislature, not only in regard to the loan claimed, but in regard to all other subjects. When a corporation wants one or two millions of State money, we all know what inducement there is to use all attainable means, whether proper or improper, to accomplish that end. And how do such influences affect the legislature here, not only upon the question at issue, but upon all other subjects of legislation? For the first time, perhaps, a man comes to the legislature from some distant quarter of the State, whose constituents have some project which they expect him to carry through. It may be one so reasonable and so just, that there would be no difficulty in carrying it. But he is timid and doubtful, and wishes to recommend himself to his constituents by his success, and the friends of some great project, which is to plunder the treasury out of some one or two millions of dollars, finding him in such a position, come to him and say, "You want to carry your project?" "Yes, Sir." "Well, you vote for our great project, and we will put yours through." In this way bargains are made in the legislature, and in this way, I believe, many of the members of the legislature are pledged to vote for those great projects before they hear an argument in favor of them, and before there is any necessity for pledging themselves, even as a means of promoting their own ends; and thus, when the discussion arises afterwards, they are not in a condition to be influenced either by truth, justice, or anything else. I do not allude particularly to the Tunnel matter at this time, but to other projects which are urged and hurried through the legislature by this species of log-rolling. But from the time the Hoosac Tunnel project was first brought before the legislature, it has been amazing to witness the increased corruption of that body, not only in regard to that special measure, but to other matters which the people know nothing about. Now, Sir, how did this matter, which came so near passing at the last session, differ from the Ogdensburg and Vermont Central railroads? What reason had we to believe that the latter would not be just as likely to pour wealth into Boston, and to be as profitable an investment as this Hoosac Tunnel project? I ask, if these two corporations, which contemplated opening a communication between Lake Ontario and the city of Boston, could not, on the ground of the very same arguments which have been used in favor of the Hoosac Tunnel, have claimed the aid of the State credit, with as much force as the Tunnel?

Sir, the gentleman from Natick, (Mr. Wilson,) stated that this Western Railroad Corporation had vindicated its character, and stood before the public, fully justifying all the reasons on which its application was founded when these grants were made. Now, Sir, I do not understand that to be the universal opinion, by any means. If I understand it, the arguments of the friends of the Hoosac project are based upon the ground, that the Western railroad has utterly failed to accomplish the objects for which it was constructed, and therefore another great avenue must be opened to do the business which that road has utterly failed to perform. If that is not so, what are the arguments in favor of the new avenue? None at all, Sir.

They are based entirely upon the ground that another avenue is wanted in order to conduct the trade and produce of the Western States to the city of Boston. In my opinion, it is perfectly absurd in that view—supposing the argument is good for anything under any circumstances. If the Western Railroad has done what it pretended it would do when it asked the loan of the State credit, that is sufficient, and we do not want any more answers, but if it has failed to accomplish that object, then the argument, based on the wisdom and propriety of the grant to that road, falls to the ground, and there is no other which can be adduced.

Now, Sir, allusion has been made to other States. I care but little about the example of the Western States or of the Southern States. I think they are not in the habit of setting examples which it would be well for us to follow, but I think we may place some reliance upon the provisions of the Constitutions of those States which have grown out of their experience and misfortunes. I know that Mississippi and Michigan, and several other States have placed provisions in their Constitutions forbidding their legislatures to loan the credit of their States to private corporations, and what did they do it for? It was because, before these restrictions were placed in those Constitutions, the States had become absolutely beggared by State loans, or what is about the same thing, State expenditures for internal improvements. It was because the credit of these States had become a by-word, and a sneer to the whole world in consequence of the acts of their legislatures in loaning their credit. They have placed these provisions in their Constitutions because their experience taught them that their safety and security depended upon it, and it seems to me, it would not be very unwise if we should allow their experience to admonish us.

Sir, I dislike very much to appear as the opponent of any project like that of the Hoosac Tunnel. Some very good friends of mine are very warmly interested in the success of that project. Sir, I am not opposed to the accomplishment of that work. I should be glad to see it completed, for I believe some good may be accomplished by it. But it has never been my habit or custom in places like this, to forbear saying what I believe in regard to subjects of this character, because it will have any effect to prejudice the interests of any party or section of the Commonwealth. But I think the gentleman from Williamstown, (Mr. Duncan,) in his remarks upon this subject, has not assisted that project at all, nor has he done any credit to the people of his section by intimating that they will oppose the new Constitution provided their wishes in regard to the Tunnel are not complied with. I do not know whether these things operate upon others as they do upon me; but when I answered a question the other day, by saying, that because one large party—who did not oppose the calling of a Convention, but denied the power of the people to call a Convention—I went for it. That was one of my reasons, and that was enough in itself. And when it was stated that the military of the State, five thousand in number, proposed to vote against the Constitution which we shall make, if we did not set the feathers higher than any thing else, I would have voted to kick them out of the Constitution altogether for that very reason. [Laughter.] And now, if gentlemen in favor of the Tunnel project cannot vote for the Constitution because we cannot approve of their project, I would say to them, "If that is the case, you may go through the Tunnel if you please." But I think the Tunnel people need not be at all alarmed. I have no power or wish to oppose the Tunnel, against what I believe will be the action of this Convention, although I trust that if we are not to oppose the project by the action of the Convention we shall not endorse it directly, as the amendment of the gentleman from Sudbury, (Mr. Hurlbut,) would do if adopted.

I hope we shall not give the friends of the tunnel project cause, when they come into the legislature next winter, for saying that this Convention, representing some of the talent and all the people of Massachusetts, favored it, and opened the door by which they might enter into the public treasury. I would not do anything here improperly to influence the legislature to be chosen hereafter, for or against it. But I think the friends of the Tunnel need not be at all alarmed, for, if what they say of the general popularity of this measure be true, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Braintree, if adopted by the Convention, will materially aid them.

They appear to be perfectly convinced that a large majority of the people of Massachusetts are anxious that the credit of the State should be granted to the Tunnel project. Now, if the assertion be true, I have no doubt that a bill, submitting the question to the people, would go through the legislature with a great deal less trouble, and one quarter the expense, that it would require to put it through, if the legislature were to settle the question definitely themselves, because there is a tendency upon the part of the members of the legislature, as well as upon the part of members of this Convention, to throw the burthen of responsibility from their shoulders, upon the broad shoulders of the people, and there may be many men would vote for a bill submitting the project to the people, who would not vote for it if they were to bear the responsibility themselves.

As I said before, I sometimes make prophecies, and I would now prophecy that the best method, the easiest and most facile way of obtaining the loan of the State credit for the Tunnel project, would be to put this provision, submitted by the gentleman from Braintree, into the Constitution, and then for the legislature to pass an act referring the ultimate decision of the question to the people; for I can tell those gentlemen, that though they represent an important section of the State, and although they represent a great many small towns which are going to be pretty well represented in the legislature hereafter; yet, if it is intimated that their friendship or their hostility to the Constitution which we shall adopt, is going to grow out of the favorable or unfavorable action of the Convention towards their favorite project, I do not believe they will gain any friends by it, but I believe that the open hostility which they will incur by such a course, will be perfectly and completely fatal to them. Let them pursue a liberal course towards this Convention and Constitution, and my word for it, the people will meet them with equal frankness and the same liberality.

These are the views which I entertain upon the subject. I shall vote for the amendment of the gentleman from Braintree. I think it is safe; I think it is wise, and so far as the legislation of the Commonwealth for the future is concerned, I think it is eminently proper. In these days of railroads and rapid inter-communication among the people, when the remotest corners of the State are placed within a few hours reach of this capital, I think our representatives need protection, and their authority needs limitation. I think every guard should be thrown around them which it is possible to throw around them. The temptations are yearly becoming greater in number and in magnitude, and it will, ere long, become as impossible, unless some check be placed upon them, to obtain justice without paying for it more than it is worth, as it is now in the congress of the United States.

These considerations have induced me to adopt the conclusion to which I have come. I have lived in the railroad cars somewhat for the last year, and I have seen a great many of the people of Massachusetts. Something has been said about what the people expect of this Convention in regard to the various subjects which have been placed before us. Well, Sir, I will give it as my opinion, that the people expect that some check shall be placed upon the power of the legislature to loan the credit of the State. The legislature has kept as clear of these matters as possible. They have held off as long as possible, but now, when they are about to be overwhelmed, this Convention is called. The people come to their rescue, and I believe that it is in accordance with the wishes of the people, that this protection or guard should be thrown around them. I would not restrict the legislature where it is not necessary for its own and the public good. I have voted against such restriction in every case. I have some confidence in that body, but it is not precisely confidence that we want. We want safety. They want to be protected from the hundreds of claims and petitions which they have no arguments in their own minds to oppose; and when we throw this shield around them, they will sit with much more satisfaction and ease in their seats than they otherwise would.

I do not know but I should make a break down if I were to undertake to make an apology to the friends of the Tunnel, as I am not much in the habit of making apologies. Yet, I am constrained to say, that I have no word to oppose to them. I like the small towns and the people who live in them, and I do not feel that I could take their property, or their credit, and appropriate it for the benefit of a corporation. If I could do something for their great project—and it is worth something for its very grandeur—I would do it, and it is with no feelings of hostility to it that I have made the remarks which I have.

Mr. HILLARD, of Boston. I think it is obvious, from the tenor of this discussion, that many gentlemen are inclined to look at this question through the telescope of the Hoosac Tunnel. But I submit that we want more light, and a wider horizon than such a point of view affords. Now, I happen to be one of that small minority who have no opinions at all about Hoosac, any more than I have who were the men that built "Stone Henge" or what tune the "Syrens sang to Ulysses." I have carefully barred the doors of my mind against all arguments for or against the Hoosac Tunnel project. I have studiously avoided reading any thing that has been written upon one side or the other of the question, and therefore, so far as this project is concerned, I am in a state of absolute indifference.

Then what is it that we propose to do, in rejecting the Report? We propose to give away a portion of the natural sovereignty of the State of Massachusetts. We propose to surrender a portion of that sovereignty which is, and ever has been, devolved upon everything like a sovereign State—I mean the power of lending its credit in aid of enterprises which have for their object the prosperity and welfare of the whole community. And what is the argument upon which this proposition to surrender, rests? It is an argument drawn against the use of this power from its liability to abuse. Well, Sir, suppose you extended that consideration to all the business of life, what would be the result? The world would absolutely come to an end. No man would send his ship to sea because it might be wrecked. No man would give a promissory note in his business, because when it should become due he might not be able to pay it. No man, in short, would ever go into water until he had learned to swim. By imposing this restriction upon the future legislatures of the State, we assume the spirit of prophecy, and suppose that we who sit here to-day, are better able to judge of the exigencies that may arise ten or fifteen years hence, and are better able to apply the principles of wisdom and expediency, than the men into whose hands the government of the State will then be intrusted. I think that the gentleman for Natick, (Mr. Wilson,) gave the doctrine of the true political church.

He said, that he would leave the power in the hands of the sovereignty, but would exercise the greatest caution in the use of it. Now the history of this restriction is curious. It illustrates two things. It illustrates the tendency of the human mind to seek right in reverse of wrong, and it illustrates the tendency of the American mind to rush from one extreme to the other. New York, while smarting under the evils produced by an abuse of this system, in granting the aid of the State to private corporations, also felt powerfully the contagion of the example of Pennsylvania, where the same evil was felt in a greater degree, and under that pressure she incorporated into her Constitution a restrictive clause. New York being so great a State, naturally served as an example to the States which followed in her path, and, therefore, they, one after the other, I suppose without much reflection, incorporated into their Constitutions the same clause. I suppose that the Constitutions which have been formed since 1846, have adopted that restriction. What has been the result? The State of New York has felt the inconvenience of that policy so severely, that since this Convention has been in session there has been a law introduced into the legislature to amend the Constitution, which passed both branches unanimously, I believe, with the exception of a single dissenting voice in the Senate. So take the State of Michigan. I understand, that in consequence of the restriction in her Constitution, she has found very great inconvenience in her inability to give the aid of the State to a most excellent scheme of internal improvements, and the result has been, that the congress of the United States has granted aid to a private corporation to enable them to do that very thing which Michigan wanted to do. If I am wrong, my friend who represents Marshfield, (Mr. Sumner,) will correct me. We see what are the results of a measure made under the pressure of temporary inconvenience, and which looks forward to a long period. I submit for the consideration of the Committee, that the temptation which led Pennsylvania and New York to overdo this matter, does not exist in Massachusetts. What was the cause of this over-issue of the State credit in Pennsylvania? It arose from her remarkable material resources, from her remarkable mineral wealth, which it was very important to bring to the sea-coast in order to be distributed to other parts of the country. What was the case in New York? That great State, touching on one side upon the great Western Lakes, and having at the other end the greatest commercial metropolis of the country, was led to open a system of internal communication and internal locomotion with other parts of the country. Pennsylvania and New York both over-acted in this matter. Pennsylvania was perfectly right in her policy, but she over-looked the important element of time. She did in ten years what ought to have been distributed over thirty years. I submit, that Massachusetts has neither these great internal resources more than those ordinarily possessed by other States, nor are her relations such as powerfully to stimulate any system of internal improvement. Therefore, the elements of temptation which exist in Pennsylvania, and New York do not operate here. As to the amendment of the gentleman from Braintree, (Mr. Stetson,) it seems to me, to be one of those questions upon which much may be said upon both sides. On the other hand, I do not like the principle of shifting our responsibility upon the shoulders of the people. I think it is not manly, not courageous, and it is a departure from the proper function of legislation. Besides, if we devote this matter upon the people the issue may be determined by a certain popular excitement passing from one portion of the country to another, and thus a question of general policy may be determined by the force of local prejudice. Granting the credit of the State, is not one of those usual normal legislative acts, for which we may suppose the legislature to be sent here to exercise. It is not an act of government, but of administration, and whenever the State lends its credit to any scheme of internal improvement, that is strictly speaking an act of centralization about which we have heard so much; and I confess that I should be willing to have this particular mode of State action guarded by some more cautious sanctions, than an ordinary act of legislation. For that reason, I think that the action of two successive legislatures would be better than to submit the question to the people, and I could wish, so far as I have considered this subject, that it might be put upon the same footing as constitutional amendments now are, and that the credit of the State may be granted to any incorporations whenever two successive legislatures shall deem it expedient.

Mr. WILSON, of Natick. I wish to say a single word to my friend, the delegate for Abington, (Mr. Keyes,) the clear tones of whose voice I always listen to with great pleasure. That gentleman made a very powerful argument in favor of the Report of the Committee, and against the amendment which he advocated. He assumed that the grant of the credit of the State of $4,000,000, and the subscription of $1,000,000 stock, amounting to $5,000,000 in the Western Railroad, was an experiment that the State ought to have tried, and would have been justified in trying, at the risk of losing the whole. If the Western Railroad was one of those great experiments which would justify this policy, I put it to that gentleman to say if another just such emergency should arise, whether the State should not risk its credit and peril something? The gentleman says, that in 1841 the legislature abandoned that policy. That is true. I happened then to be a member of the legislature for the first time. I well remember the discussion had upon that subject.

It was said that the State had gone far enough, and that there was no great pressing question then to call for the use of the State credit. Then the legislature had wisdom enough to guide the policy of the Commonwealth aright; and from that time up to the present no great emergency has arisen which called for the use of the State credit.

The gentleman shows by his argument in the first place, that an emergency did arise, justifying the action of the legislature, and if it arose then, it may arise in future. Then, in the second place, he shows that the legislature, when it has accomplished what was demanded by the emergency of the case, has sagacity, principle, and firmness enough to pause. The gentleman says—and he only repeats what we all say—for I notice every man when he gets up, says that the people agree with him upon all these points—that he has lived in the cars the last year much of the time, as some of us know, and that he has seen a great many people, and understands thoroughly their views, and that they expect something to be done in this matter. We all know that he is a very sagacious observer of men and things; but I always notice when I talk with any man about this matter, he most always agrees with me about it. The gentleman assumes another position, that we ought to submit this matter to the people. I deny this whole doctrine of submitting questions to the people, unless we believe they are just and wise. I go for submitting the Constitution to the people as a whole. I will not consent to insert anything in the Constitution which I do not believe to be right, to gratify anybody here or elsewhere; and I will not incorporate any particular views of my own which I think will peril any important questions. I do not want the Western Railroad interest coming up to this legislature and undertaking to influence anybody; and I think that the managers of that road will hereafter act with a great deal of wisdom if they will take the advice of the gentleman, even at this late day, and not send agents here to meddle with pending matters. Let them leave the legislature free and unembarrassed to settle this question according to its own wisdom. That is my view of this matter. I say that the question of the Hoosac Tunnel should not govern our action here. It has not governed my action heretofore. I do not believe that we should insert in the Constitution this limitation.

In the future, perhaps twenty years hence, in the progress of science and of great discoveries, it may be the part of wisdom for the people of this State to exercise this power to loan the credit of the State. I am willing to trust the future to this extent. I am willing to trust future Constitutional Conventions in this matter. I do not believe that the wisdom of Massachusetts will die out when this Convention dissolves. I look upon this Convention as a very able body of men, but there will be wiser men to come here twenty years hence. Every generation grows wiser and wiser, according to my views, as they have the experience of the past to guide them, and the world will learn much during the next twenty years. I hope twenty years hence another Convention will sit here, for, whatever may be the result of this Convention, in my judgment, the expense attending it will be more than repaid by the fact, that for two years the people of this State have been discussing fundamental principles, and examining those great principles that underlie our Constitution, and that are embodied in our fundamental laws. Every farmer and mechanic in the State has been reading the Constitution, and all our proposed amendments have been examined with more knowledge of the Constitution of the State and the Constitutions of the several States, than ever existed before in this Commonwealth. I hope every twenty years hence we shall have a Constitutional Convention, and therefore I do not go for tying up everything now, but leave it to the wisdom of the future to take care of this matter.

Mr. DAVIS, of Plymouth. I rise, merely for the purpose of expressing a hope that the Committee will take a vote upon this question soon. I wish to add, that I agree with the gentleman who has just addressed the Committee, that there has been no call on the part of the people for a provision in the Constitution limiting the legislature from loaning the credit of the State. I agree with the gentleman from Fall River, (Mr. Hooper,) that in the south-eastern section of the State, and more particularly in that section of the State which has never received any portion of that credit, so far as I can understand, that no complaint has as yet been made that the credit of the State has been used against their interests or against the interests of the public generally. There is no demand by the people for the incorporation of such a provision in the Constitution. Those sections of the State that have received no benefit whatever from any credit of this kind, do not ask it, and it seems to me, that this is a sufficient reason why the Report of the Committee should be accepted. I believe that two-thirds of the members of the Committee are ready to vote upon this question. The Report of the Committee will probably be carried through by a majority of three to one, and I do hope that we shall not spend much more time in discussing it.

Mr. PHINNEY, for Chatham. I have no desire to prolong this discussion, which has been so fully and so ably discussed by members of this Convention; nor do I intend to retract anything I have heretofore said or written against the policy of loaning the State credit to corporations or private enterprises. I should not have risen now to speak upon this subject, had not my past course as the editor of a newspaper been called in question by the member from Harwich, (Mr. Weeks,) who took occasion this morning to speak of certain statements about "mortgages upon farms," growing out of the loan of the State's credit to the Western Railroad. This credit, I believe, has been extended to that and other railroads to the amount of over $5,000,000. The opinions I then entertained have been more than confirmed, and the fact is well established, that the business of several enterprising towns in Barnstable County has sustained serious injury. I mean, Sir, the carrying trade between Boston, Albany, and Troy—so largely engaged in by the citizens of Barnstable, Yarmouth, Dennis, and Chatham, and to a greater or less extent by other towns in this important section of the Commonwealth. This trade, so largely engaged in by her mariners, has been almost entirely destroyed by the transportation of the freight over the Western railroad; and when the State gave its loan to the building of this road, it required no prophet to foresee its result upon the business of the Cape. Most of the vessels built for this business, were of a class not easily converted to the fisheries, and their owners had to suffer great losses in their disposal. This it was which gave rise to strong prejudices among the citizens of Cape Cod against State loans for building railroads.

It is not my intention at this time to oppose this measure. The towns I have alluded to have recovered, for the most part, from the injury thus received, and their seamen have become usefully and, I believe, profitably employed in other pursuits.

Cape Cod—which has been so often and so justly termed the "right arm of the Commonwealth"—is now struggling to improve her condition by establishing better facilities for communicating with Boston and New York, where so large a portion of her products find a market. And let me add, Mr. Chairman, an effort is now being made to extend the Cape Cod Branch Railroad from Yarmouth to Provincetown, and I fear that it cannot be done without a loan from the State. I cannot believe the members of this Convention are desirous of shutting down the gate forever, and thus doing injustice to this section of the State, by depriving the citizens of Cape Cod of the benefit they may hereafter derive from a State loan.

Several MEMBERS (in their seats). "I go for Cape Cod."

Mr. PHINNEY. In connection with the boring of the Hoosac Tunnel, it has been more than intimated that the State will lend her aid to Cape Cod; and it is chiefly in this way that it can help to recover to Cape Cod somewhat of her loss by past legislative action. As it respects the feasibility and importance of this project, there can be no doubt. There are facts and figures sufficient to show that the importance of the fisheries, in which Barnstable County is so extensively engaged, would warrant the extension of the Cape Cod Branch Railroad to Provincetown at an early day, and who is there that doubts, when completed, it would prove beneficial to the whole State? I shall, therefore, vote against the amendment of the gentleman from Braintree, (Mr. Stetson,) and against all amendments limiting the legislature to a narrow policy, and I trust the majority of the Convention will go for sustaining the Report of the Committee, for the reasons which I have offered.

Mr. WEEKS, of Harwich. I wish to make a single remark in reply to the gentleman from Chatham. He has alluded to me, and has misapprehended my remarks. I said a gentleman from Barnstable had made such and such statements. There are other gentlemen in Barnstable besides the gentleman for Chatham. Although he belongs in Barnstable I did not refer to him. But there have been remarks made in certain papers with regard to loaning the credit of the State, to some of which I had reference.

Mr. MORTON, of Taunton. I rise to submit a motion that the Report of the Committee be recommitted with instructions to report a resolve limiting the power of the legislature to grant the credit of the State beyond a certain amount, and also limiting their power to incur liabilities to aid any corporations or associations.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would suggest to the gentleman from Taunton that the Convention being in Committee of the Whole, it is not in order to submit that motion at the present time.

Mr. MORTON. I acquiesce in the decision of the Chair. I see the Committee are very anxious to take the question. I feel, Mr. Chairman, a good deal of interest in this subject, and I have some desire to express some of my views in relation to its merits; but I have not either the physical or intellectual power to treat the subject as it ought to be treated. I have neither health nor preparation; but it is a subject to which I have given a good deal of consideration, and would therefore ask the indulgence of the Committee to express in brief some of my views in relation to it. I have no fear that the Committee will suppose that my views have any reference to the Western Railroad or to the Hoosac Tunnel, or to any other local and special object; because my opinions on this subject were long ago put upon the records of the State. Different individuals have expressed different opinions in relation to the wishes of the people in different parts of the Commonwealth, and no doubt each has expressed correctly the views of the people in his own section. I must say, before proceeding, that in that portion of the Commonwealth where I reside, the people have looked upon this subject with interest, and did expect it would be brought before the Convention.

Sir, what is the real question which is proposed for the action of the Convention? It is the question of the grant of power. We are now to determine what powers the people of the Commonwealth shall grant to the legislature. In relation to this, I apprehend the rule by which we ought to be governed is very plain. The people ought to grant such powers, and such powers only, as are necessary for the proper transaction of the public business. Shall they, then, in this view, grant to the legislature the power of running the State in debt, or of incurring the liability or responsibility of the State for the benefit of private corporations? It is not, Sir, a question whether these private corporations shall have the aid of the State. That is left entirely open. But it is a question, by whom this aid may be given, or a question whether the people or their agents are to decide upon the propriety of granting this aid. If any corporation or enterprise needs the assistance of the Commonwealth, they have only to ask the people, the source of all power, and if they choose to grant it, it will be given. But when we are conferring power upon the legislature, I think we should be exceedingly cautious in granting it. If the power is liable to be abused, and is not indispensably necessary, it should be withheld from the legislature, and exercised solely by the people. In this case, I apprehend there is no such necessity for the granting of this power. Sir, I hold that this power is one which is peculiarly liable to abuse in the present state of our country; and whether we refer to the State or nation, we are in danger from an abuse of this power. The very great prosperity throughout the country, and the great surplus of means in circulation is a source of danger. The temptation, either in the congress of the United States, or in the legislature of Massachusetts, to make improvident grants, is very great. When it will cost nothing but a vote in the legislature, members will be much more readily convinced that an appropriation is for the public good than if they have to put a tax upon the people themselves, to meet it.

I regard the subject of taxation as one of great difficulty. I may be wrong in my views, but I hold, that the greatest safety in a democratic government is a resort to direct taxation and nothing else. If the expenses of this Commonwealth and the expenses of the United States were necessarily paid by direct taxation upon the people, they would be less by three-fourths, or at least by one-half, than they are at the present time. In the United States government you would not have seen them rise within fifty years, from eight millions to over fifty millions. I hope we shall come to this sometime or other in this State, and that we shall cease all indirect taxation. An indirect tax is collected and paid, and nobody feels any sort of responsibility, or knows much as to what he pays or the manner in which it is expended. I think the tax upon banks is founded in very great error, and I hope the time will arrive when it shall cease, not by a repeal of the law, but by the expiration of the charters which have been granted to those institutions, and the resumption of private banking establishments. I hope the time will come when the whole United States will have to support their government by direct taxation, when we shall manufacture everything we want and everything we can use, and collect nothing on imports. Then, I apprehend, you will have a security which you never can have by indirect taxation. Then, you will take away the inducement to squander the public money, and abolish the temptation to run into all manner of extravagance if not corruption.

LOAN OF STATE CREDIT.—WESTON—WALKER.

But this is not very directly connected with the subject under consideration. I think we may well learn something from the example of our neighboring States. I am not prepared to say that we are so wise that we may not derive improvement from the example of others. Within the last twelve or fifteen years more than half the States in the Union have introduced restrictions upon the power of their legislatures to incur responsibilities, and involve the States in debt. It was not, as my eloquent friend from Boston, (Mr. Hillard,) suggested; it was not because New York has done it. One half of the restrictions which have been made were made before New York made hers, and therefore they were not made to imitate her. And it was not because half the States had involved themselves in extravagance and in debt. It was done by other States as well as by those. Our daughter, Maine, was one of the first to adopt such a restriction, and Rhode Island, our neighbor, did it very early. Then go to a distance, and look at the great and prosperous State of Missouri, that depends upon hard money for her circulating medium, and which has restricted her legislature from running into debt beyond the small sum of $25,000; and with the light to be derived from these States, which have been involved in difficulty for the want of these restrictions, and those which have kept entirely clear from difficulty by having them, I think we have a safe guide, and one which we may very properly follow.

But I think there are innumerable evils arising from this. I have already alluded to the facility with which an act of appropriation is passed when nothing but voting is necessary to grant the credit of the State. Another evil is the tendency to create unprofitable and useless corporations. You establish a corporation by your aid in one part of the State, and it makes a foundation for another grant somewhere else, and so on for a second, or a third, or even a fourth, until, as a consequence, you will see projects rise up which are entirely useless. Some of them may originate from such a reason as that given by my friend from Barnstable, (Mr. Phinney,) representing Chatham. He is quite disposed to hold up the project for the Tunnel, because there is a railroad down on the Cape somewhere which he wants to have aided in the same way. If the Old Colony is to be considered a part of the Commonwealth, I hope she will come in and take her share, at least a small share. She will require but little to satisfy her wants. But other things may be asked for by and by, and the time may come when somebody may say: "The Western Railroad has got $4,000,000," and perhaps, "the Hoosac Tunnel has got two, or four, or six millions, and we want a canal cut across Cape Cod,"—a project which has been agitated for the last half century—"so as to cut across from Buttermilk Bay to Barnstable Bay, and save that long route of dangerous navigation around the Cape;" and can we refuse to vote the aid they need, when so much has been done for other parts of the State? But, to come nearer home, there was once a project for a canal from Taunton River to Weymouth Landing, and whether that may be of any use or not, and whether we have any faith or not that it will be useful, we may insist upon it in order to get our share of the plunder. I think, that by pursuing this course, you increase the tendency to improvident and useless grants. I hope, therefore, that the amendment of the gentleman from Braintree, (Mr. Stetson,) will prevail. I am opposed to the subsequent amendment. I am opposed to the introduction into a constitutional law of anything which shall have reference to any private corporations, or any private transactions whatever. If it is proper to establish a rule let us establish it, and not except any body from its operation. I think it an undignified and inconsistent course for this body to pursue. Mr. Chairman, I hold that the functions of government are essentially different, and should be kept distinct and separate from all private transactions. I would never have the government enter into partnership with individuals or corporations, either for railroads, or banks, or manufactures, or for any other purpose. The result always is, that the government loses. Every-body knows that government cannot carry on any transaction so economically as a private individual, and if she enters into partnership with any company, the consequence will be, that she will share the expense, while the profit of the partnership will go into private hands.

Mr. Chairman, there is one subject to which I would refer by way of example, and that is, the extravagant expenditure of other parts of the United States. We have seen all about us States involving themselves in debt; sometimes in profitable investments, and sometimes in unprofitable ones. What has been the consequence throughout the country? What is the consequence of granting the credit of the State anywhere? It has led to involving your country in debt; and from a statement which I lately saw, it appears that the United States are indebted to individuals in Europe to the amount of $312,000,000; and upon that we have to pay, in interest, at least $20,000,000 annually. I do not mean to say that none of these investments have been well and profitably made; but I do mean to say, that the draught of $20,000,000 a year impairs to a considerable extent the resources of our country. I do not mean to say that we are not able to meet it, and much more, but I do mean to say, that it is a direct drain upon the country, and very essentially limits the capacity of our citizens in other respects.

I did not intend, when I rose, to go into this subject, but to throw out some hints; and in this view of the matter, I hope that in some stage of it, it will be recommitted for the purpose of having the proposition introduced, limiting the ability of the legislature to run the State in debt beyond a certain amount, and also limiting the power to grant to corporations the responsibility of the State.

Mr. WALKER, of North Brookfield. Mr. Chairman. Although I know that gentlemen are very anxious to take the question, I hope the Committee will indulge me a moment, for I have a vote to give, and I wish to state the reasons for that vote in a very few words. I am in favor of the amendment which is proposed, but I should have liked it better if it had said 1856, instead of 1855. For one, Sir, I want to give the friends of the Hoosac Tunnel a fair chance to get their grant from the legislature. I am disposed to do everything for them consistent with justice, and give them a fair opportunity; and, as they have made their application under the old state of things, to have that matter tested to their satisfaction under the old regime. I think three years will be an ample allowance of time for that purpose, after the new Constitution goes into effect—that is, if this proposition should be accepted with the amendment now pending. I think, therefore, that it would be better to add one year more, so that nothing could be said against this proposition by the friends of that project, and nobody could suppose that injustice or unfairness was intended with regard to the Hoosac Tunnel.

I am in favor of having the legislature limited in this matter—not that I am, by any means, opposed to internal improvements; but I want the people to have a chance to say whether they deem them real improvements or not. I think we ought to restrict the granting of the money on the credit of the State, until the voice of the people, who are interested in the matter, shall be expressed upon the question; for, Sir, a wonderful change has taken place in our legislative affairs within the last few years. Lobbying has become a science, and log-rolling one of the fine arts! [Laughter.] This has all taken place within a few years, and gentlemen know perfectly well what the state of things is; and now we have got to guard against this influence. That is what I intend to do, so far as I can, at the risk of being one of those who are in a small minority; for one gentleman told us that the Report of the Committee would be adopted, three to one. Notwithstanding that, I am going to vote for this restriction, after giving a reasonable opportunity to our friends to get the aid which they want for the Hoosac Tunnel.

I do this because I think I ought to do it—because experience shows that it is necessary, and because we have the example of a majority of all the States of this Union in favor of this course of action. I think we are fully justified, and more than justified in doing this, and that it can by no means be called an illiberal course. Those who know me know that I am willing to give the Tunnel project a fair chance to be carried; but then I am for putting up the bars, so that hereafter, if the State credit is to be loaned, the question shall be referred to the people. And why should it not be referred to them? I am not afraid of referring any question to the people; I believe their decision will be right. If there is a manifest propriety in making a grant of the credit of the State, I believe the people will agree to it, and will do it cheerfully.

I have no doubt at all about that matter. But if the State credit is to be left altogether in the hands of the legislature, there is great danger that they will go too far, and act unadvisedly under this outside pressure. There is a tendency—and it is one of the worst tendencies of the present age—towards the creation of a public debt. This is one mode of enslaving a people—absolutely selling them. Why, Sir, how is it in England? It is stated by their distinguished statesmen, that the industry of England is now taxed one-half of all its earnings. If a laborer earns a shilling a day, sixpence of that has to go to pay his taxes. This is the effect of legislation, which has created an enormous funded debt, by which the people are bound down and forced to work half of their time to pay the interest upon this debt, and the ordinary expenses of the government. Suppose that public debt should increase, and be twice as large as it is now, the people would then have to work all the time to pay the interest, and would be utterly enslaved—there would be no remedy for them.

Now that we understand how the system operates, I hope we will be careful to avoid it, and not begin to enslave our posterity. And I say, therefore, that if anybody desires to have a debt created, the effect of which will be to mortgage the industry of the people, it is no more than right that they should have a voice in the matter, and say whether they are willing to assent to it or not. I agree that the past course of the legislature in granting the credit of the State has been judicious, so far as we can see; but I think, as it has been shrewdly said by the member for Abington, (Mr. Keyes,) that we are not out of the woods yet, and we had better not halloo too quick. The State may be taxed very heavily before we get through with all these speculations. I would not like to see our State lose a million of dollars in any one of these projects. That million of dollars would afford sixty thousand dollars a year in interest, and that sixty thousand dollars a year would do a great deal towards educating the people, and keeping up schools and free colleges. I would like very much to have an article inserted in the Constitution, which should prevent the legislature from involving the Commonwealth in heavy pecuniary obligations, of the kind referred to, without the consent of the people. As things now are, this may be done. Projects may be suddenly brought forward, and, by management and intrigue, carried through the legislature, which the people never would and never ought to approve. Let us prevent this. After giving a chance to those who have applied, under the present state of things, to get their case fairly and fully tried before the legislature, let us then place a safeguard, as other States have done, against all further danger from that source. In regard to the application to which I refer, it is proper and safe to make the exception, because the people, throughout the State, are fully apprised of the measure, and will choose their representatives in reference to it, and thus give their verdict, pro or con, upon the subject. I hope, Sir, the amendment before us will prevail.

Mr. WHITNEY, of Boylston. I merely wish to say, Mr. Chairman, that we have all got votes to give, up here in the eastern gallery, but we do not propose to make any speeches upon them. [Laughter.]

The question being then taken on the amendment to the amendment, which was submitted by Mr. Hurlbut, it was not agreed to.

Mr. COGSWELL, of Yarmouth, moved to amend the amendment by striking out all after the word "that," and inserting the following:—

The legislature shall have no power, unless by vote of a majority of the members elected to either branch thereof, to loan money or otherwise to involve the State in debt, excepting in case of war, insurrection or invasion.

The question being taken, the amendment to the amendment was not agreed to.

The question then recurred upon the amendment submitted by Mr. Stetson, which was read. It is to substitute for the Report of the Committee, the following resolution:—

Resolved, That the Constitution be so amended, that hereafter no loan of the State credit shall be granted to any corporation or individual, unless the question be first submitted to the people.

The question being taken, the amendment was not agreed to, upon a division—ayes, 144; noes, 145.

The question then recurred upon agreeing to the Report of the Committee.

Mr. TYLER, of Pawtucket. I wish to offer an amendment to that Report, viz.: to strike out all after the word "Resolved," and insert the following:—

That every bill, for a loan of the credit of the State to private corporations, shall be framed by one legislature and be referred to a succeeding legislature before it shall become a law.

I am not much acquainted with the forms of legislative proceeding, and having had no assistance in framing this amendment, I do not know that it is in the best form, but I should like to have something of the kind adopted.

Mr. Tyler's amendment was read by the Secretary, and the question being upon its adoption, Mr. COLE, of Cheshire, moved that the Committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

The motion did not prevail.

Mr. TYLER, proceeded to address the Committee in support of his amendment. Gentlemen may be assured, said Mr. Tyler, that I will not inflict a speech upon them. I desire only to make a very few remarks in defence of the amendment I have had the privilege of offering.

Sir, I hope that something of this kind will prevail, in order that the people may have an opportunity to express their will in regard to it. We must trust the people. If we are afraid to trust them, the people may well be afraid to trust us, and they will distrust us unless we show confidence in them.

Perhaps, Sir, I may be permitted to answer one argument which has been advanced in this body against the amendment which was offered by the gentleman from Braintree, (Mr. Stetson). That argument was, that hitherto the loan of the State credit has not been attended with any disastrous results. I think that argument is not a sound one, for how often do we see cases where an enterprising man will go on from one enterprise to another, and be encouraged by his very success to go into enterprises that will ruin him at last. I have now in my recollection, three young men who commenced business on nothing and went on until they had divided seventy thousand dollars apiece; but they still kept on, and went into one speculation after another until they were all bankrupts, to the amount of several hundred thousand dollars each. It was my desire that the amendment of the gentleman from Braintree should prevail, and therefore I did not offer mine until his failed; but I sincerely hope that we shall act upon this subject deliberately. I am sorry to see that there has been a degree of impatience and haste manifested in regard to this subject that has not been manifested upon any other subject which has yet been before this Convention since we have been together. Why is this? Why is a measure of this importance to be hurried through in this manner? I think that the remarks which were made by the gentleman from Taunton, (Mr. Morton,) were worthy of consideration, and I entirely coincide with them. I think that the remarks of the gentleman who represents Abington, (Mr. Keyes,) were also very just. He has well remarked that we are not yet out of the woods. Instead of that, Sir, I am afraid that we are getting farther into the woods; and we shall get so far in that we shall never get out if we go on much longer at this rate. I apprehend, however, Sir, that unless there is some pause, some time for reflection, my amendment will fail, because there seems to be a disposition to vote down everything without consideration. I hope that action will not be taken upon it now; but that when final action is taken, the question may be taken by yeas and nays.

Mr. MILLER, of Wareham, moved that the Committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

The motion was not agreed to.

The question being then taken on the amendment submitted by Mr. Tyler, it was not agreed to.

The question then recurred upon the adoption of the Report of the Committee.

Mr. JAMES, of South Scituate. I would like to inquire what that Report is.

The CHAIRMAN. The Committee to whom was referred the subject of the loan of the State credit to any individual or corporations, etc., report that it is inexpedient to act thereon. The question is now on agreeing to that Report.

Mr. JAMES. I am very sorry that that is the Report of the Committee. I have been indisposed, and consequently unable to be here, and I have heard scarcely a word of this discussion. I claim the privilege of saying a few words before the question is taken, if the Committee will have patience with me.

Mr. HALL, of Haverhill. If the gentleman will yield the floor, I will move that the Committee rise. I think it is due as an act of courtesy to the gentleman from South Scituate that he should have an opportunity of being heard upon this question. I therefore move that the Committee now rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

The motion was agreed to.

The Committee accordingly rose, and the President having resumed the Chair of

THE CONVENTION,

The chairman, Mr. Boutwell, for Berlin, reported progress, and asked that the Committee have leave to sit again.

Leave was granted.

Mr. MORTON, of Taunton, then submitted the following resolution, which was read:—

Resolved, That the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of the Report of the Committee, and that the same be recommitted, with instructions to report a resolve limiting the power of the legislature to create debts or to incur liabilities on behalf of the State.

The hour of one o'clock, P. M., having arrived, The Convention adjourned.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The Convention met at 3 o'clock.

Orders of the Day.

The Orders of the Day were taken up for consideration, upon motion of Mr. MORTON, of Taunton, when that gentleman modified his resolution offered in the morning, so as to read as follows:—

Tuesday,]

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, &c. — WHITNEY — WESTON.

Resolved, That the Committee of the Whole, to whom was referred the Report of the Committee on the State Credit, be discharged from the further consideration of that subject, and that the same be referred to a Select Committee, with instructions to report a Resolve, limiting the power of the legislature to incur debts and create liabilities in behalf of the State.

Mr. WHITNEY, of Boylston. I did not think that I should be tempted to say a word upon the motion, but I will make one remark, and that is, that I hope the resolution, before the Convention, will not pass. It seems to me that, however well disposed we might be to put such an article into the Constitution, if it came to us under favorable circumstances, yet we cannot do it now. If we vote to shut down the gate now, we shut off the Hoosac Tunnel case, and if we let the gate set open long enough to let them get what they want, we commit ourselves in favor of the Tunnel. In either case, it seems to me, that we commit ourselves one way or the other. I hope, therefore, that this Convention will vote to lay this resolution upon the table, and take no action upon it, but leave the Constitution where it is in reference to this matter. I move that the resolution be laid upon the table.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to by a division vote—ayes, 104; noes, 51.

So the resolution was laid upon the table.

Mr. BUTLER moved to lay the Orders of the Day upon the table; which motion was agreed to.

House of Representatives.

Mr. BUTLER then moved that the Convention resolve itself into Committee of the Whole, upon the Majority and Minority Reports upon the House of Representatives, and the subjects connected therewith.

The motion was agreed to.

The Convention accordingly resolved itself into

COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE,

Mr. Wilson, of Natick, in the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN stated the question before the Committee to be, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Lowell, (Mr. Butler,) to the Report of the majority of the Committee upon the basis of the House of Representatives, (herein before inserted).

Mr. WESTON, of Duxbury. Mr. Chairman: It was my intention not to trespass upon the indulgence of the Committee with any remarks upon the subject now under consideration. But, considering the importance of the question, and the interest felt in it by the inhabitants of the Old Colony, which I in part represent; and believing, as I do, Sir, that if the amendment of the gentleman from Lowell should be adopted by the Convention, it would deprive the five south-eastern counties of the Commonwealth of their just, proper, and equitable share of political power, and transfer it to the four western counties—Hampshire, Hampden, Franklin, and Berkshire, I am constrained, by a sense of duty, to state the reasons which will govern me in the vote that I shall be called upon to give. I came into this Convention, Mr. Chairman, with my prepossessions strongly in favor of town representation; of preserving this principle, as far as it could be consistently done with justice and equity, to all parts of the Commonwealth, and not make too large, numerous, and unwieldy a House of Representatives; and, Sir, my feelings in this respect remain unchanged. I have ever looked upon the little municipalities—town corporations—as one of the greatest beauties and blessings of our system of government, and as one of the chief safeguards of our free and republican institutions. I believe they create, in our people, a feeling of deep interest in the affairs of the government, which stimulates and incites them to study, and become familiar with its true principles, its theory and practical operations, and thereby enables them to appreciate the blessings which they enjoy under it. I believe they cause every citizen to realize more fully than he otherwise would, the responsibility resting upon him to preserve and protect the invaluable inheritance of civil and religious liberty which he has received from his fathers; and I believe they nourish in him a desire and determination to transmit this great legacy unimpaired to posterity. As the inhabitants of the small towns assemble in town-meeting for the purpose of discussing and regulating their municipal affairs, and deposit their votes at the polls, they are reminded that the sovereign power is in their hands; they realize the importance of exercising that power in such a manner as shall permanently secure to themselves and their children the rights which they now enjoy; and they feel that they have—as they do have—a voice in making the laws under which they live, and in choosing the rulers whose duty it is to see those laws faithfully and impartially executed.

Mr. Chairman, I am not one of those who believe that the greatest object of our government is the protection of property. This is undoubtedly one of its objects, but its chief design, in my judgment, is to defend and preserve the lives and liberties of the individual, without distinction of race or color—of the poor man as well as of the rich—of those of foreign as well as those of American birth—one and all who seek an asylum upon our soil. In times past, nowhere in this land of liberty has the great object of government to which I have just alluded, been more fully attained than in Massachusetts. This has been justly attributed by many, in a great degree, to town representation.

For the considerations which I have briefly stated, as well as for others which time will not now permit me to enumerate, I am in favor of preserving town representation as far as it can be done with justice and equity to all sections of the Commonwealth; and to this principle I shall adhere, unless driven by necessity to abandon it for the protection of the political rights of those whom I in part represent.

I will now proceed to consider the amendment before the Committee, and attempt to show its unequal distribution of political power, and the great injustice that will be done the Old Colony if it shall be adopted by the Convention. I have, Mr. Chairman, with much care, made some figures upon the subject, and drawn a comparison between the four western counties and the five south-eastern, to which I now ask the attention of the Committee. The four western counties, with a population of 164,269, by the amendment, will be entitled to a representation of 932 in 10 years, averaging 93 2-10ths a year. This gives them a representative to every 1,762 2-10ths of their population, and gives them, every ten years, 202 more representatives than they are entitled to under the present Constitution. Their average gain is 20 2-10ths a year. The five south-eastern counties, with a population of 176,648, by the amendment will be entitled to 716 every ten years, averaging annually 71 6-10ths. This gives one representative to every 2,467 1-10th of the population. This allows the five counties, every ten years, 50 representatives more than they are entitled to at the present time. The average annual gain is 5, which is 15 less than the four western counties, which have a population of 12,379 less than the five eastern counties. It will be readily perceived, by this, that the four western counties, with a population of 12,379 less than the eastern counties, will be entitled, by the amendments, to the privilege of placing upon this floor, every ten years, 216 representatives more than the five eastern counties, and 15 2-10ths more annually.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I will bring Norfolk County into view, and see if it will improve the picture. She, with a population of 77,441, will be entitled to 302 representatives every ten years, being 22 more than she is entitled to at the present time. Add this 22 to the 50 gained by the five south-eastern counties, and you have 72 gained in ten years. Here we find the four western counties, with a population of 89,815 less than the six south-eastern counties, entitled to the right of placing upon this floor annually 20 6-10 more representatives than the six south-eastern counties.

I will call the attention of the Committee to a comparison between Plymouth and Franklin. I select Franklin, as she has the smallest population of the four western counties. Plymouth, with a population of 54,509, will be entitled to 2 4-10 more representatives annually than she has at the present time. Franklin, with a population of 23,621 less than Plymouth, will be entitled to an annual representation of five more than she has now. It is plain that 2,290 of the population of Plymouth will be allowed but one representative, while 1,457 in Franklin will be entitled to the same. I am unable to understand, Mr. Chairman, why so great a political inequality should exist between the inhabitants of old Plymouth and those of Franklin. While I accord to the latter every virtue that can adorn an intelligent people, I claim equal merit for the former.

I will now institute a comparison between the counties of Barnstable, Dukes, and Nantucket, and that of Franklin. The three former, with a population of 47,192, will have 192 representatives in ten years, gaining but two more than their present number in that time. Franklin, with a population of 16,304 less, will be entitled to 212 in ten years, 50 more than her present number, and gaining annually five representatives; while Barnstable, Dukes, and Nantucket will gain only 2-10 of a representative annually.

Mr. BUTLER, of Lowell, (interposing). If the gentleman will allow me, I will ask him a question.

Mr. WESTON. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER. I desire to know whether Franklin will gain from the number it is entitled to now?

Mr. WESTON. I understand that, by the proposition of the gentleman from Lowell, Franklin will gain 60 representatives more than she is entitled to now.

Mr. BUTLER. Franklin is now, in valuation year, entitled to 26, and she will be entitled to 20 by my plan.

Mr. WESTON. I have endeavored to go over the calculations which I have made very carefully. I have shown them to other gentlemen and I have full confidence that they are accurate, and that the statements I have made are correct.

I would ask, Mr. Chairman, why this great inequality exists? Why are the political rights of Old Cape Cod thus disregarded—"the right arm of the Old Commonwealth," (as has been said by the gentleman from Boston on the opposite side of the hall,) "always stretched out to welcome the returning mariner from his labors and dangers on the mighty deep?" She has ever been regarded as the great nursery of our seamen; and her noble and hardy sons have, in time of peace, with unequalled skill and enterprise, carried the stars and stripes of our glorious Union into every navigable ocean, sea, and river; and, in the future, as in the past, they will stand ready to defend the flag of their country in time of war. But, Sir, it does not become me to defend Old Cape Cod; she has able delegates upon this floor who can protect her rights with far more ability than I can.

Mr. Chairman, all that the Old Colony asks or claims, at the hands of this Convention, is a share of political power equal to that of other sections of the State; nothing more nor less. This she has a right to demand; and I trust this Convention will pause and deliberate before they adopt the amendment now under consideration. Mr. Chairman, I love the Old Colony; yes, Sir, I love the Old Colony, and I will say, in the language used by one of her distinguished sons, when standing upon the spot hallowed by the footsteps of our Pilgrim fathers and mothers:—"She is the mother of us all. Unlike other matrons, her strength increases with her years, and her beauty with the number of her children."

Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of what may be called rather a large House of Representatives—say a maximum of 350 or 400—and a minimum of 250 or 300. I am willing, Sir, to adopt any system of town representation that will produce this result, if it can be done upon any principle nearly approaching an equal distribution of political power. I do not expect to obtain numerical equality and retain town representation. The great difficulty in adhering strictly to an annual town representation, without making too large a House, is caused by the great increase of small towns.

Much has been said, in this debate, of the danger apprehended, growing out of too great a centralization of political power and wealth in the city of Boston; and, Sir, I cannot shut my eyes to this danger. I fully concur in the sentiments expressed the other day, by my honorable friend for Berlin, upon this subject. But I do not stand here to say anything against the city of Boston, or anything to create a country prejudice against her or her inhabitants, nor to utter one word in disparagement of her "princely merchants," as they are called. In all my dealings and transactions with them, I have always found them governed by the highest principles of integrity and honor. I do not cast the slightest reflection upon the inhabitants of this noble city, when I speak in terms of disapprobation of her vast centralization of power, which is far greater than that of 130,000 people in the rural districts.

The citizens of Boston are not to be blamed that the evil exists. It is nothing more than a natural effect from a known cause.

Sir, it requires no argument, in addition to what has recently been said in this debate, to prove that the tendency of large municipal corporations is to place in the hands of their citizens a vast amount of political influence, which acts as an unit and moves with almost irresistible power in one direction. We need not cross the ocean and seek for illustrations of this subject among the despotisms of Europe; instances, fortifying the position which I have assumed, may be found nearer home. In this House, most of us have seen Boston represented for a few years past, by upwards of forty of her able and distinguished sons, who all entertain the same political opinions, and who stood shoulder to shoulder on all great political questions relating to the interest of their constituents. Why! the fact is before our eyes now. Here, this day, is this vast metropolis with forty-four delegates—among whom are many of the ablest men of our State, and not a few of those whose graceful oratory and finished rhetoric enchain our attention daily, and delight our ears. In order, Mr. Chairman, to check centralization, and restore to the large minority of the citizens of Boston a proper share of political influence, I have been able to devise no better plan than that which has been proposed of districting the city.

But Mr. Chairman, I will not longer detain the Committee.

Mr. ALLEN, of Worcester, (interrupting). Before the gentleman yields the floor entirely, if he will allow me, I will ask him, as he has stated the difficulties and the objections to the plan of the gentleman from Lowell, to tell the Committee what plan would meet his concurrence.

Mr. WESTON. I am aware that there is great difficulty in forming a plan which will be just and equal to all portions of the State, and which will at the same time preserve the principle of town representation. At some future time I may—I do not say that I shall—but I may submit a plan to the Convention which will embody my views of justice in regard to the basis of representation.

Mr. KEYES, for Abington, (interposing). I have understood that the statistics presented by the gentleman from Duxbury, are based upon the existing state of things; that he has contrasted the plan of the gentleman from Lowell with our present system. Now it is true that we may see difficulties with this comparison, and perhaps injustice, provided the present state of things is exactly just. But, supposing it so happened that the present system was also unjust, then it would not necessarily follow that the plan presented by the gentleman from Lowell was intrinsically unjust in itself because it differed from the system now in existence. It would only follow, that those counties of which the gentleman speaks as unjustly dealt with, were favored to a greater extent by one system than by the other. I understood the gentleman, all the time, to compare the plan before us with the existing state of things, and to complain of its injustice because it differed from that state of things. Now, the present system has been considered as entirely unjust, and has been rejected as absolutely out of the question; and it seems to me, therefore, that if the comparison he makes be a correct one—and I have no doubt that it is—it does not prove the plan under consideration to be necessarily or intrinsically wrong, but only differing from the present state of things.

Mr. WESTON. If I understand the gentleman, my answer to his remark is this. The injustice of the proposed plan is proved by comparing it with the present state of things, from the fact, that under the present system the four western counties of the State have a greater proportion of political power than the five southeastern counties, and therefore, any plan which gives to the former more political influence than they now have, and to the latter about the same as they now have, is a still wider departure from equity and produces still greater injustice.

I thank the Committee for their kind attention, and I will close by saying to my western friends, that I am willing to be just toward the western counties, and more than just—I am willing to be generous towards them in the distribution of political power; but the political inequality which would be caused by the adoption of the proposed amendment, as it now stands, I cannot, in justice to my constituents, vote for.

Mr. UPTON, of Boston. There has been a good deal of research and learning shown in the course of this discussion, to prove that, in the early history of the Commonwealth, town corporations, as such, are represented in the legislative department of the government. I do not propose to go into that matter, upon the present occasion, to any extent. I have probably not read the early history of the colonies aright; at least, the opinions I have formed from that reading in relation to this matter of representation, differ very materially from those advanced by various gentlemen who have spoken upon this subject. I can see in the early history of town representation in Massachusetts, little more than a representation of parishes, and by a representation of parishes I mean Protestant parishes, Congregational churches and societies, or by whatever name they at that period were known; and this system of representation was followed as long as the public opinion would have it. Within the memory of most gentlemen here, the towns were substantially, nothing more than ecclesiastical corporations. The minister was chosen by the town, and the people taxed for his support. At that period of our history, the representation was founded upon these religious societies, and the changes which have taken place is the transition state of representation based upon church-membership, to that upon ratable polls, property, or population. But as I remarked, I do not propose to discuss this particular question at this time.

The question arises, and it has been very much debated in this Convention, whether there is a necessity for all the small town corporations in the Commonwealth, as such, to have annual representation in the House of Representatives. Well, Sir, I am in favor of every individual in the Commonwealth being annually represented if they desire it. It was stated by the gentleman from Pittsfield, (Mr. Rockwell,) that if the entire inhabitants of the Commonwealth were assembled together for the purpose of enacting the laws which should govern them, that would have been an equal representation of the people. But let these inhabitants say how they will be represented. If they please to be represented by districts, each containing an equal number of inhabitants, that would be also an equal representation, and abstractly speaking, it would be the only equal representation which can be provided. But a different system has hitherto been adopted in Massachusetts; according to the present indications, a different system is to prevail in future, and so far as my vote goes, I am willing to concede to the small towns twice the representation in proportion to their population, which I will ask for the city of Boston; but I am not willing to carry the principle further than that, particularly when you provide for districting the cities and large towns of the Commonwealth. Gentlemen must bear in mind one thing. The very moment you undertake to district the cities and large towns, that moment you divide those towns against themselves. You make, practically, an aggregation of small towns out of one large town, and in fact, politically neutralize the power of that town. So long as you allow the cities and large towns to elect by general ticket, so long you give them an advantage in your legislature, but the moment you provide for districting them, that moment the advantage ceases.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES. — UPTON.

But the particular point to which I wish to call the attention of the Committee is, as to the question Whether there is any necessity that all the town corporations of the Commonwealth should be annually represented? In order to illustrate this question, it seems to me that it would be a fair proposition to place before the Committee a statement of the condition and size of the House of Representatives, when the members of the legislature were paid by the towns which sent them here, and when there were about three hundred town corporations, each entitled to as much as one representative, and with the right to send as many as five hundred members.

In the year 1818-19 there were 224 representatives.
 " 1819-20 " " 402 "

This was the year of the Convention.

In the year 1821-22 there were 238 representatives.
 " 1822-23 " " 159 "
 " 1823-24 " " 296 "

This was a year of great excitement, growing out of the question of the Warren and Charles-town Bridge, and the Committee will remark, there were but 296 representatives.

In the year 1824-25 there were 249 representatives.
 " 1825-26 " " 199 "

In this year of 1826, by a concurrent vote of both branches of the legislature, the members were paid from the treasury of the Commonwealth, which system has continued until the present time.

In the year 1826-27 there were 237 representatives.
 " 1827-28 " " 350 "
 " 1828-29 " " 355 "
 " 1829-30 " " 501 "
 " 1830-31 " " 452 "

This is as far as I have carried the statistics, but I will state, for the information of the Committee, that the House of Representatives went on increasing, until the amendment to the Constitution of 1840.

I only produce these statistics by way of answer to the argument which has been adduced here, and with a great deal of force, that there is a necessity for an annual representation of each town. I ask gentlemen, if there was that necessity, why did it not exist, when towns paid their own members from their own treasuries? I am not going very far back in the records, although the book from which I intend to quote seems to be such a formidable one. I am speaking, let the Committee bear in mind, to one important point only, and that is, whether there is a necessity for towns, as such, to be annually represented upon this floor in their corporate capacity. It was found, at a very early stage of the government, that the towns did not value this right of sending representatives, and although they occasionally sent them here, they came, staid a day or two, and then went home. Precepts had to be issued, calling in members, and the House would be often left without a quorum. The result was, that towns were often fined. The following is a resolve passed in 1801, and is a sample of the various resolves which were passed, commencing at this period:—

" Resolve, abating Fines to Towns for not sending Representatives.

" Whereas, the towns hereafter mentioned were fined in the several sums annexed to their respective names, for not sending a representative to the general court the last year—that is to say—

" Hamilton, forty-nine dollars and twenty-three cents; Holliston, sixty-four dollars."

And so on, for fifty different towns, and concluding as follows:—

" Resolved, for reasons set forth by representatives from the aforesaid towns respectively, That the said sums be remitted, and the towns aforesaid are hereby respectively discharged from paying the same; any resolve or order to the contrary, notwithstanding."

This, as I have before stated, is a sample of the various resolves which have been passed upon this subject, from the year 1801 to the year 1826. I desire the Committee to bear in mind the point upon which I have been speaking, and that is, does a necessity exist, of such an important character, as that each town in this Commonwealth should be represented here in its corporate capacity annually? It seems to me, that I have shown from the records, when the question was put to the towns themselves,—Have you any particular business affecting your prosperity coming before the legislature of Massachusetts, to make it necessary that you should be represented there? that they have said no, by refusing to send representatives. I now submit, for the consideration of the Committee, a form of tax act, passed in 1824, four years after the Convention was held for revising the Constitution.

" An Act

" To apportion and assess a tax of seventy-five thousand dollars, and to provide the reimbursement of sixteen thousand nine hundred and ninety dollars, paid out of the public treasury, to the members of the House of Representatives, for their attendance the two last sessions of the general court."

The Committee will bear in mind, that the representatives were paid from the public treasury, and then the assessment was made afterwards upon these towns. The pay of the various members, commencing with the county of Essex, was as follows:—

" Salem, three hundred and forty-two dollars; Marblehead, one hundred dollars; Danvers, one hundred and fourteen dollars; Beverly, fifty-six dollars; Gloucester, seventy-four dollars;"

And so on, through all the counties, with such towns as were represented in those counties, respectively. The aggregate amount paid for the whole representatives of the Commonwealth, according to this tax, in the year 1824, was the sum of $16,990. That was the amount assessed upon the various towns and cities of this Commonwealth, in the year 1824, for the pay of their representatives. And now, Mr. Chairman, I think, if anything is to be gathered from statistics, it is, that there is no necessity for each town to be represented in its corporate capacity, annually. It seems to me, that this is a fair argument. I think that the business of the Commonwealth can be better accomplished with a smaller House than has been proposed by the gentleman from Lowell, (Mr. Butler). According to that gentleman's proposition, we are to have, upon an average, for ten years, a fraction of over three hundred and ninety-seven members, that is to say, we are to have three hundred and fifty-nine members for four years in the ten, and four hundred and twenty-three members for six years, which gives a fraction over three hundred and ninety-seven. I am very free to admit, that that, in my opinion, is too large a House. If you adopt the basis of the gentleman from Lowell, (Mr. Butler,) in regard to the small towns, I think that you would have to increase the basis of the large towns, particularly if you propose to district them, which would make altogether too large a House. It has been argued in favor of a large House, that it is the means of diffusing information among the people. I concede to a certain extent that it is. It has occurred to me, however, in the course of this debate, why should not this information be divided equally among all the inhabitants of the Commonwealth? Why confine it to small localities? I find, in looking over the statistics, that there are two hundred towns in the State which have an average population of only 1,175. Gentlemen can see at once that to undertake to give a representative, even half the time, to towns of that size is going to make a very large House, too large a House, in my opinion. There is another important matter which has a bearing upon this question. By the basis proposed by the gentleman from Lowell, (Mr. Butler,) I have shown that we shall have about four hundred members of the House of Representatives. The pay of these members is proposed to be fixed by a resolution which was offered a few days ago, at $250 each. The pay of the members annually cannot be less than $110,000. The average annual pay for your House of Representatives for the last six years, has been $108,000. You propose to increase the pay of your House of Representatives, and make it $110,000. I submit, to the members of this Committee, and the representatives of small towns generally, if, in the period of ten years, there will not be drawn from the treasury for the pay of representatives alone, one million one hundred thousand dollars. Will it be drawn by equal representation of the people of this Commonwealth? By no means. The sum of $1,100,000 will be divided among the citizens of this Commonwealth, but it will be divided very unequally, less than one-third of the population of this State, through their representatives, drawing more than one-half this amount. I have a table of forty cities and towns, having an aggregate population of more than one-half of the inhabitants of the Commonwealth, which, according to the proposition of the gentleman from Lowell, will elect less than one-third of the members of the House of Representatives.

Now, Sir, supposing we change that proposition and take the converse of it, and it should be argued on this floor by the gentlemen who represent the large towns in this Commonwealth, that the small towns should pay in this ratio. I ask gentlemen if they think such an argument, if advanced, would be sustained for a single moment? I think not.

Mr. FRENCH, of Berkley. I wish to ask the gentleman whether he could give us any assurance that a small House would not cost more than a large one?

Mr. UPTON. I would say, in answer to the gentleman from Berkley, in the first place, I do not think he could have heard my remarks. I read from the list of the State-taxes for 1824, and I stated the number of representatives for that year, and every town was entitled to send. The amount of the taxes for that year, for the pay of representatives to the towns, was $16,900, and I think if the gentleman will put my argument together, it would be satisfactory that a small House did not cost nearly as much then as a large one.

Much has been said about centralization, and its effect being unfavorable to the small towns. I do not claim to know as much about the internal affairs of this Commonwealth as many gentlemen on this floor. It so happened, however, that what little education I obtained, was obtained in a quiet town situated between this city and the city of Lowell; and it was before the city of Lowell was conceived of. I think, therefore, I know something of the inhabitants between here and the city of Lowell, and the effect of centralization upon them. I think I understand that as well as any gentleman who lives either in Lowell or Boston. I am well acquainted in the vicinity of Lowell, I have seen salmon taken in the Merrimac River, where Lowell now is, and if any boy in those days caught more fish in the Concord river than I, it was because he got up earlier and fished later. [Laughter.] But this is an episode. I supposed that this centralization was for the advantage of the whole State of Massachusetts. I confess that in other bodies than this, I have done what I could to get this centralization here and prevent it from going to New York. I have thought that I was doing the Commonwealth of Massachusetts good service in that way, that I was not doing any wrong to the internal population of this State. Why Sir, in some towns that I know of in the neighborhood of Lowell, the centralization here complained of, by the gentleman from Lowell, (Mr. Butler,) is the very life-blood of those towns. Lowell has given them a market. If other towns have not the same advantages which Lowell has, it is because nature did not give the same resources to make them which she gave to Lowell.

I know, Sir, of no evil which has resulted from centralization. I associate in society in the city of Boston, and I associate with a great many from the country; and none of the gentlemen with whom I associate from the city or country have any of those feelings which have been stated upon the floor of this Convention, as existing with regard to this question of centralization. Why, Sir, the gentleman from Lowell, in speaking of this matter, when he introduced it, did not manifest exactly the spirit which I liked. He said—and I thought I saw his eye twinkle as though it could not be answered—"that great fish eat up the little ones; but that nobody ever heard of little ones eating up the great ones." The gentleman is a little wrong in his natural history. In the Pacific Ocean, the sperm whale, which I suppose may be called a great fish, finds one of its greatest enemies in the smaller fish called the killers and in the sharks. You can fancy these little killers with their associates, the bill-fish, with their bills sticking out from their nose, going off a reasonable distance and then darting forward and thrusting their pointed weapon into the body of the sperm whale, and then going off in those blue waters and making an attack again, trying if possible to hit the former wound a second time; and finally are the death of the whale. But there is the shark a little way off—

Mr. BUTLER. Do they eat them?

Mr. UPTON. Yes, Sir, they do. I will give the gentleman the moral of it. They eat as long as they can after they have destroyed the whale. But there is a very wise ordination of Providence with regard to it, which, after the life is out, causes these carcasses to float upon the waves, and long before the sharks have had time to consume them, the blasted carcass lies floating upon the ocean, unfit even for the stomachs of the sharks.

Now, Sir, I do not believe that centralization will do the State of Massachusetts any harm; because if it will, we had better stop our large towns in their growth. Let us take the converse of the proposition; let us abolish Lowell and let us pull down Boston. It is hardly worth while to have these wharves stretching out here. Let us send our ships to other ports; and so far as the great mart of trade gathers here, let us seek for it another channel, so far as this place is concerned. Now I appeal to the members of this Convention, to gentlemen representing the towns in this Commonwealth, whether the language upon this floor has not been rather bitter, and whether any cause for it exists in fact. I think it leads to irritation of feeling which does no good. I should be most happy as a representative on this floor, to give my vote upon any question affecting the basis of representation, which should give to the small towns of the Commonwealth, and to all in fact, a just and reasonable share of representation.

The question was put to the gentleman from Duxbury, (Mr. Weston,) what he proposed, or if he had any plan. Now, I have no plan to propose. There was a plan proposed by my friend from Charlestown, (Mr. Thompson,) which I think looks like the most reasonable one which has been proposed. It was printed and distributed this morning. There may be objections to it, for, as I understand, it is very easy to find fault with any plan. Still, that looked to me more reasonable than any which has been proposed. But I think the plan proposed by the gentleman from Lowell is too severe upon the large towns; and the effect will be that it will lead to irritation of feeling in the great towns and cities, which after all, results in no good to this question. I suppose it is the desire of every member of this Convention, if possible, to have this question settled by some fair and amicable adjustment which shall not only be satisfactory to the Convention but to the great body of the people in the Commonwealth.

Mr. KINGMAN, of West Bridgewater. I understand, Mr. Chairman, that every member in this Convention ought to have the privilege of expressing his views upon the subjects to be discussed here. I have not spoken one word upon the subject now before this Committee, and I do not intend to detain the Committee more than ten minutes, and perhaps not even that. My friend from Duxbury, (Mr. Weston,) has anticipated much that I intended to say; therefore I shall not go over, if I can possibly avoid it, what he has said. I have the honor to represent a small town in the county of Plymouth; but I do not appear here to claim or ask any special privilege for the town that I represent. All that I ask for it, is, what is right and just and equal. I do not propose to make any invidious comparison between my constituency and the people of any other portion of the Commonwealth. I merely say this, Sir, that in point of general intelligence, they will compare favorably with any other portion of the Commonwealth; and I will remark, that we have a very fair sprinkling of "men of eminent gravity." But I wish to show, not so much what is proposed to be done, as what already has been done by this Convention. I had the honor to make a very few remarks when the basis of the Senate was under consideration. I then endeavored to show the inequality of the basis then established, and I remarked that if the power thus taken from the smaller towns and given to the large manufacturing towns and cities, was returned when the basis should be fixed for the House of Representatives, I would be content.

I have here a very few statistics merely comparing the county of Suffolk with the county of Plymouth; and I wish to show that in making that basis, it gives to the county of Suffolk one senator which I think, fairly belongs to the county of Plymouth; because I think the legal voters are the only true expression of political power. While in the county of Suffolk it takes 3,767 to choose a senator, in the county of Plymouth it takes 6,104. These include all the voters upon the check list. If we take the votes actually given in the election for governor in 1850, the result is far more unfavorable to the county of Plymouth. We find the number of votes then required in the county of Suffolk to elect a senator was 1,641 only, while in the county of Plymouth the number of votes required, was 3,846.

Thus, by the basis fixed for the Senate, it takes two legal voters in the county of Plymouth to be equal to one in the county of Suffolk. All I ask is, that the county of Plymouth shall have equal justice done. Much has been said by the representatives of the city of Boston on this floor, with regard to their wish to establish representation upon principles of equality. I am ready, as far as I am concerned, to meet those gentlemen on that issue, and whenever they are ready to place it on legal voters, as a basis of representation, I am ready to adopt any just system, even the district system.

Mr. Chairman, I promised not to detain the Committee more than ten minutes, and I intend to fulfil my promise. I came here with strong prepossessions in favor of town representation. I should still desire it, but I consider that one thing is settled. In my mind it is a fixed fact, that sooner or later, we have got to come to the district system. That is a settled fact; how soon it may come, I do not know. But I wish whenever that system is adopted, it may be upon a just and reasonable basis; and it appears to me that that basis is the legal voters.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.—WILKINS—WILKINSON.

Mr. WILKINS, of Boston. When the gentleman from Duxbury, closed his argument, I understood him to say that he had not seen the statistics of the gentleman from Lowell, which have just been distributed. I suppose he referred to the Document No. 84, made to illustrate the amendment of the gentleman from Lowell. Now, it so happens that I have not seen anything else on this subject, I should be glad to read what I regard to be wrong in respect to this table. The county of Barnstable has only two hundred and ninety-three less inhabitants than Hampshire and only sixty less legal voters, but has ten less representatives. Franklin County, that county so often referred to has five towns less than Berkshire, and has 18,049 less population; and it has four more representatives.

Mr. BUTLER. Do I understand the gentleman to say that Franklin has four less representatives than Berkshire?

Mr. WILKINS. Franklin has four more than Berkshire.

Mr. BUTLER. The gentleman is mistaken, I think. I presume he is looking at the wrong column of the table. As I read it, Franklin has seven less than Berkshire.

Mr. WILKINS. I believe I have got the wrong column, Sir.

Mr. WILKINSON, of Dedham. It was at one time my intention, Mr. Chairman, to have gone over the ground of this question somewhat at large, so many have spoken upon the subject, however, and the matter has been so thoroughly discussed, I had almost abandoned the idea of addressing the Committee at all. But coming as I do from a town and county whose inhabitants it is deemed unsafe to intrust with an equal share of power in the legislation of the Commonwealth, it may not be improper for me, perhaps, to make a few remarks in reference to the Report of the majority of the Committee. The inequalities and injustice of the system proposed by this Report, have been clearly pointed out and are not denied by its friends. It seeks its justification, however, in the history of the past. Corporate representation has existed, therefore it should continue to exist. It has always been unequal and unjust therefore its inequality and injustice should not only continue but be progressive. I do not think there is a very striking analogy between the towns of the Commonwealth as they are now, and as they existed under the colony charter, or the province charter, or even under the Constitution in its earliest state. The present great disparity in the size of towns is of more modern growth. Under the old colony charter, towns were more nearly equal in population. They were not allowed by the general court until they had a sufficient number of church members, in whom alone was the right of suffrage, to maintain a church government, and support the administration of its ordinances. They had also to provide for their defence against the Indians. They were established before representation, and while the freemen assembled in general court as a body, the representative system was merely the substitution of a part of the freemen for the whole. When representation was adopted for the freemen of the towns, the sending of a representative to the general court was considered rather as a matter of duty on the part of the towns, than as a matter of right.

These towns were not only required to pay their own representatives, but to send men "sound in judgment concerning the main points of Christian religion, as they have been held forth and acknowledged by the generality of the Protestant orthodox writers." The towns were fined if they failed to send a representative sound in the orthodox faith, and such unsound representatives might be, and actually were, expelled the general court. Besides, the subject matters of legislation at that time were of a more general and public character. Their statute books were not so filled with acts of local and special legislation as they are at the present day. The colony towns in point of fact, however, were not entitled to representation equally. Nor were they all required or allowed to send. Until they had a certain number of freeholders, they were to vote for representatives with some other town—that is, towns were put together so as to constitute representative districts.

When the Province Charter came, in 1692, then, for the first time in the history of the Colony, or Province, as then called, all the towns and places were entitled to equal representation, but at the same time that charter authorized the legislature to prescribe the number of representatives for each county, town, or place, and that body accordingly did make such an enactment, destroying this equality of town representation.

There is another point, which has not been alluded to in the course of this debate, or if so, it has escaped my attention; the provincial legislature proceeded to incorporate towns and districts with all the rights and privileges of towns, with the exception of the right of sending representatives to the general court; and continued so to do till their dissolution by the revolution. A large number of towns thus grew up in the Commonwealth, which were either not entitled to be represented at all, or else were formed into representative districts. They were sometimes called, in the act of incorporation, districts, and sometimes they were simply called towns, there being no distinction between them and the other towns, with the exception that they were not singly entitled to representation. Why, Sir, the town of Palmer, when incorporated in 1752, represented to the general court that she did not wish to be represented in that body, and a charter was granted giving her all the rights and privileges, and making her subject to all the duties of other towns, but exempting her from the privilege of representation, the right of which she disclaimed. There was the representative district of Deerfield, as I should call it, composed of the towns of Deerfield, Greenfield, Conway, and Shelburne, all of which were classed together, for the purpose of electing a representative to the general court. Thus an extensive system of district representation grew up and existed under the provincial Charter.

I am aware that when the Revolution commenced, this power of incorporating towns under the charter without the right of representation, as has been stated by the gentleman for Wilbraham, (Mr. Hallett,) was questioned. The provincial congress, which was then assembled, considered that it was an exercise of power in derogation of the Charter, and went on to declare, that the disinction between the districts and towns should be abolished, and to provide that all towns and districts having thirty voters should be entitled to a separate representative.

In May, 1776, the general court was composed of two hundred and sixty members, and great complaint was then made in regard to the size of the House. The number was said to be double that of any general court prior to the year 1774. Induced, by this evil of a large House, or some other cause, the general court, in 1779, incorporated the town of Mount Washington, and restricted her from the right of separate representation; they also incorporated a district in the year 1780 with the same restriction. These acts show that their former disapprobation of the course pursued by the provincial legislature was confined to the creation of towns and districts whose inhabitants should have no right to vote for a representative at all, and not to the denial of the right of corporate representation. When the Constitution was adopted, it contained a provision that each town, then existing, should be represented, but that no new town should be created, with the privilege of representation, unless it should contain one hundred and fifty ratable polls.

Immediately after the adoption of the Constitution, the system was again pursued of incorporating districts, with all the rights and privileges belonging to towns, excepting the right of sending a representative to the general court, and from that time to the present, a large number of corporations, exercising the rights and privileges, and subject to the duties and obligations of towns, but excluded from the privilege of representation, have always existed. It would therefore seem to be clear, from the history of this matter, that with the exception of one or two short periods, and each of those at some great crisis in the affairs of the country, there has never been in this Commonwealth, either under the colonial or the provincial charter, or under the Constitution, a time when all the town corporations then existing had a right to be represented in the general court; and nowhere do I find the principle recognized that all such future corporations should have that right by inheritance. I submit, then, that we are called upon by the Majority Report of the Committee, to adopt a new system, that is: that all towns existing, and hereafter to be created—for this is the way I understand the Majority Report—shall be entitled to a representative in the general court. I conceive that to be the introduction of a principle which does not exist now, and which I am not aware has ever existed in the history of this Commonwealth. Our legislation, so far from being general, as was formerly the case, has now become to a great degree local, special, and sectional in its character; and for this reason, together with many others which may exist, we can not safely continue, much less increase and endeavor to make perpetual, this inequality of representation.

Much has been said about log-rolling. I will not enter into the discussion of that matter at all, for I think that it is an argument in itself against the increase of power in local districts. If legislators are subject to improper influence the danger of giving their election to a minority of the people is much increased.

Who, I would ask, first created these towns? Was it not the freemen in whom the right existed, not only of creating towns, but of making laws for the guidance of the Commonwealth? It must certainly be conceded. Towns existed before representation was known,—I had almost said, before it was thought of,—and after these towns had been created, then it was that representation was established. And is it to be said that the equality of freemen is to be sacrificed for the preservation of the representation of these towns? Perhaps I may unconsciously argue this question as though the system of district representation would destroy the towns. Gentlemen have spoken of it in that aspect, but I cannot conceive it to be so. In my opinion, towns will exist for all the purposes of their original creation, just the same under the district system as they do at the present time. Individuals will go into their town meetings and vote as they do now, and all the town duties will be performed and the town rights preserved as they are and have ever been, with the simple exception of a corporate representation in those towns too small to constitute a district.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, &c. — WILKINSON — HUNTINGTON — HALLETT — LIVERMORE.

I have listened in vain for some reason to satisfy my mind of the necessity for an increase of our already overgrown House of Representatives and making the election of its members still more unequal.

The preservation of town rights, does not require this, because I do not understand that any body is desirous of adopting a district system which would divide towns or destroy their municipal character. In fact, excepting the tendency to centralization which has been so forcibly urged, I do not know that I have heard any very strong argument suggested. I am anxious, as are some other gentlemen who have participated in this debate to know what is meant by centralization. I come from the county of Norfolk, a county in which, by the Report of the majority, three men are allowed to have about as much political power as one man in the county of Franklin, and all for the purpose of getting rid of the supposed tendency to centralization. What evidence of centralization has Norfolk given to cause this great alarm, and justify the restraints to be imposed upon her. What great tendency to centralization existing on Cape Cod, deprives her of a fair and equal representation? I am aware that when this argument is pressed, the place usually selected as the centralizing point is the city of Boston. Why, then, should other portions of the State suffer on her account? Or is there no centrifugal force to counteract this centralizing tendency, except in the West? A district system would divide this central point, and, one would think, thus neutralize its force. But I do not know what is meant by the centralizing power in the State of Massachusetts—a State scarcely two hundred miles long and less than half that in breadth, and a constituent part of a great country, extending from ocean to ocean. Can it be, that this State has within her limited borders a portion of territory inhabited by a class of legal voters who cannot be safely trusted with an equal share of legislative power. I think this matter of centralization is only terrible from its vagueness and incomprehensibility. Its dangers cannot be defined and pointed out with accuracy; they are, therefore, easily magnified by the imagination.

In making a Constitution, I do not think it is wise or proper to incorporate any provision in it which shall array one portion of the citizens of the Commonwealth against another, or which shall make any invidious distinction. In my opinion, if this Majority Report is adopted, especially if adopted for the reasons suggested in the argument before the Convention, it will be said that the Constitution cannot give a fair and equal representation to all portions of the people of the Commonwealth, because crime exists in some portions to a greater extent than in others; because a larger proportion of the persons who exercise the elective franchise in some localities are dependent, ignorant, vicious, or unsafe, than those in other sections of the State. I ask, will not such a course engender the greatest dissatisfaction, to say nothing of its injustice. Will it not make the Constitution itself unpopular in certain portions of the Commonwealth, not only creating a prejudice against this the organic law of the State, but causing the most bitter heart-burnings and jealousy among the people? Can it be, that gentlemen are prepared to say that there is this great difference in the people of the several parts of the Commonwealth. I am led to believe, as I said before, that there is not that inequality which would make it proper for us to provide in the organic law for such an unequal representation of the citizens as is proposed by the Committee. It seems to be admitted on all hands that entire town representation, with anything like an approach to popular equality, would give us a House of Representatives far too large for the proper discharge of public business. If, then, the so-called town rights come in direct collision with human rights, which should be preferred?

I submit, we are required to preserve town representation only so far as is consistent with the equal rights of all the community.

The question was then taken upon the adoption of the amendment of Mr. Butler, of Lowell, as a substitute for the Report of the minority, and upon a division—ayes, 155; noes, 118—it was decided in the affirmative.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BIRD, of Walpole, moved that the Committee rise and report to the Convention the resolve and the amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

The Committee accordingly rose, and, by their chairman, (Mr. Wilson,) reported to

THE CONVENTION,

That they had had under consideration the Report of the Committee on the subject of the Basis of the House of Representatives, had adopted an amendment to the same, and recommended to the Convention that it ought to pass.

The amendment was read by the Secretary.

The question being upon concurring in the amendment reported by the Committee of the Whole,

Mr. HUNTINGTON, of Northampton, inquired of the Chair, if it was proper to amend the amendment?

The PRESIDENT replied that it was.

Mr. HUNTINGTON. I move, then, to strike out from the third paragraph of the amendment of the gentleman from Lowell, the words "one thousand," and insert "twelve hundred;" and likewise in the fourth paragraph, to strike out and insert the same words.

The question was upon the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. HUNTINGTON. This proposition presents the question in an entirely new aspect, but it has been suggested to me by the mover of the amendment which has been adopted in Committee, (Mr. Butler,) that the further consideration of the subject had better be postponed until to-morrow. I am perfectly willing that it should take that course, as, on account of the lateness of the hour, but little progress could be made this afternoon. I would state, however, that I have incorporated here the main principle which I intended to submit in my plan which has been printed. There are a few reasons which I have to present in favor of this alteration, but I defer them for the present. I now move that the further consideration of this subject be postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. HALLETT, for Wilbraham. Will the gentleman withdraw his motion for one moment; I desire to suggest an amendment.

Mr. HUNTINGTON. I should like to know what the gentleman's amendment is.

Mr. HALLETT. I do not know that I can inform the gentleman without the withdrawal of his motion.

Mr. HUNTINGTON withdrew his motion.

Mr. HALLETT. I propose to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Lowell, by striking out from the second paragraph the word "five," and inserting the word "two," so that it will read, "towns may unite for a period of not less than two years," instead of five years. In the last paragraph, I wish to substitute the word "two" for the word "three," so that the last line will read, "no district will be entitled to elect more than two representatives."

The PRESIDENT. The Chair would state to the gentleman for Wilbraham, that his amendment will not be in order until the amendment of the gentleman from Northampton is disposed of.

Mr. HUNTINGTON renewed his motion to postpone the further consideration of the subject until to-morrow, and the question being taken, it was decided in the affirmative.

Compensation of Members.

Mr. LIVERMORE, of Cambridge, moved to take from the table the resolve reported by the Committee on the Pay Roll, on the compensation of members.

The motion was agreed to.

The resolve was read by the Secretary as follows:—

Resolved, That there be paid out of the treasury of this Commonwealth, to the members of this Convention, respectively, three dollars for each and every days' attendance, and two dollars for every ten miles travel from their respective places of abode, once during the session; and to the President three dollars a day, in addition to his pay as a member: provided, that, in no case, shall any member receive more than two hundred dollars for attendance, and the governor is hereby authorized to draw his warrant accordingly, on the treasurer, on an order of this Convention.

Mr. LIVERMORE. I move to amend the resolution, by striking out the word "authorized," and inserting the word "requested."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LIVERMORE. As the Committee have seen fit to report a different sum for the compensation of the members of the Convention, from that usually received by members of the legislature, it will probably be desired that an explanation should be given why the Committee were induced to make that change. When the subject was first considered, the Committee were rather inclined to report the same pay per diem as is received by members of the legislature; but after deliberating upon the subject more fully, they finally came to a different conclusion. It is known to all who are conversant with the duties of the legislature, that there is but a limited portion of the session of that body when they can have two meetings in a day. Now, it is directly the reverse in regard to the Convention; members from the very first were willing to hold two sessions a day, and would have done so, could they have found a convenient place for that purpose. As soon as an opportunity was offered, however, they commenced to hold two sessions a day, and have continued to do so until the present time, and, no doubt, will still continue to hold two sessions until the final adjournment of the Convention. That was one reason which induced the Committee to report the sum named in the resolve as the per diem pay of the members.

Tuesday,]

COMPENSATION OF MEMBERS. — LIVERMORE — MORTON — DANA.

Another reason—and one that had great weight with the Committee—was, that the Convention was called together at a time when it was very inconvenient for members to leave their farms and business; and that they had much rather come to the legislature in winter for two dollars, than to leave home and their several avocations at this season of the year for three dollars a day.

Another reason which had considerable weight in our deliberations on the subject, was, that about the time this body assembled, there was a general raising of the prices of board throughout the city, which made it more expensive for members who attend here from the interior, than it was for the same members of the legislature during the winter season. It was for these reasons that the Committee finally unanimously reported the order allowing three dollars per day as compensation. So far, I believe all is plain. Then comes a proviso, that in no case shall any member receive more than two hundred dollars for his attendance. The Committee thought that, with the exercise of due diligence, the Convention would be able to adjourn by the tenth of July, or at most in a few days after, and in order to satisfy a part of the members by having a session of only sixty-seven days, which would allow them to draw two hundred dollars, we made this proviso. And I am sure there is no reasonable person in this Commonwealth who would think of allowing members who perform the arduous duties which we perform in this Convention, a less sum than that I have named. These are in brief the reasons which induced the Committee to make the Report now under consideration.

Mr. MORTON, of Fairhaven. The gentleman from Cambridge has stated the reasons which induced the Committee to report this resolve, but I am inclined to ask the sense of the Convention upon a portion of that Report. I therefore move as an amendment, to strike out the words "Provided, that in no case, shall any member receive more than two hundred dollars for attendance."

Mr. LIVERMORE. I would have no objection whatever to that amendment, if I did not think that it is intended by the gentleman from Fairhaven, to follow up that motion by another to strike out three dollars and insert two.

Mr. MORTON. I will go as far as I can to please my highly respected friend, but I cannot make any promises, as to what motions I may submit hereafter. As I understand the present meaning of the resolve it is that it is the deliberate judgment of the Convention, that our services here are worth to the Commonwealth for sixty-seven days just three dollars per diem, no more and no less. But I think that if we discharge the duties properly which we have been sent here to perform in sixty-eight, sixty-nine or seventy days, that either of those days will be worth just as much to the Commonwealth, as any within the sixty-seven days so amply provided for in the resolve. The same reasons which I endeavored to assign the other day for the payment of members of the general court apply with equal force to this case, but I will not allude to them here. It seems to me, however, and I would not by any means use discourteous language, that the idea savors somewhat of meanness, that the Commonwealth is not willing to pay its public servants for the labor of every day spent in the employment of the public; and I submit to the members of this Convention, if it is not the most manly and dignified course we can pursue, to go on as we have since we first assembled here, do our duty faithfully to ourselves and our constituents, and when we have accomplished the purposes for which we have come together, we can then adjourn, whether it be after a session of sixty-seven or seventy-seven days, unrestricted by any such provision as is contained in this resolve.

Mr. DANA, for Manchester. I hope the motion that was last submitted will prevail. I confess I felt badly, very badly, when the Convention, the other day, passed the resolution letting out the legislature of the State by the job. It entirely conflicted with my notions of the manner in which the Commonwealth of Massachusetts ought to treat the legislature of Massachusetts. But, Mr. President, I know I am out of order, and probably will be so told in a moment.

The PRESIDENT. The gentleman has a right to allude to the action of the Convention, but he cannot, in this connection, reply to arguments used in the debate on that occasion.

Mr. DANA, (continuing). But then the answer was that there was an absolute necessity, that it was in accordance with the character of the legislature, that such had been the character, and such for the time to come would be the character of the legislature of Massachusetts, that they could not be trusted without some hold upon their pecuniary interest; and that a very small hold would be strong enough to govern such a body as the legislature of Massachusetts. Another reason seemed to be that it was no great matter if such a provision were introduced into the Constitution, because the legislature meets annually; and a gentleman of much experience remarked to me that however injuriously it might operate upon one legislature, the inconvenience would be temporary, another would come in in six months time; and that is very true. Although they may hurry through the business of legislation when the money is exhausted, and transact the business imperfectly, yet a new legislature is to come after, which will remedy the defects and imperfections of the former. All that is true enough; but I should like to know when a Convention is to meet to do what we leave undone.

Has this Convention shown, as yet, such a character or disposition as to oblige us to put such a restriction upon ourselves as we have thought proper to put upon the legislature? Has there been such conduct exhibited as to render such restriction necessary? Now gentlemen in this Committee, I doubt not, have the same notions of propriety and dignity that I have, they differ from me in opinion only as to the necessity of the case. The principle is this, the Commonwealth desires to compensate members for services, for expense incurred while performing services, and the question is, shall that compensation be made by a reasonable allowance per diem, or shall the work be given out by contract? I am myself greatly in favor of having the work of legislation done by day's work. If I set about building a house, and I can find an honest and skillful mechanic, and if I want my house to stand as long as stone and wood can stand, then I should undoubtedly employ such mechanic, if I had confidence in him, to do the work by the day; but if I do not care very much how my house is built, or if I cannot find a workman whom I can trust, then I should have it done by the job. And it really seems to me that if gentlemen of the Committee had the same idea about the necessity of the case that I have, they would come to the conclusion that it is unworthy of the State of Massachusetts to put such a proviso into the Constitution. But it seems to me that gentlemen have discovered a necessity that has not been apparent to me. I do not know how great that necessity may be to the minds of other gentlemen, but I cannot believe there is a gentleman in this house to whom the per diem allowance is any kind of consideration. If there is a gentleman here who is not sitting here at a daily pecuniary sacrifice greater than the per diem allowance of a member, then I have entirely misapprehended their usefulness, the importance of their pursuits. I had supposed that most of us, if not all, were sitting here at no small sacrifice of time and money; and I cannot believe that the prospect of compensation would induce any gentleman to sit one day longer than the public business required.

This proviso is based upon the supposition that gentlemen would sit here without that restriction longer than they ought to sit. Sir, I cannot believe it. And if I did believe it I would not put it upon the records of this Convention.

I sincerely trust—though I ought to ask the pardon of the Convention for having assumed to indoctrinate it on a matter of dignity, but really the question, and the only question is, whether this Convention is likely to sit here longer than it would otherwise do for the sake of the compensation? And even if so, is it best to put such an admission upon record? It strikes me, Sir, that we should not. I hope we shall sit here just as long as it may be necessary to do the work we have to do, and to do it thoroughly and well. I do not want to see the previous question voted for upon any other ground than that of public duty. I do not want to have it suspected of any man or by any man that he is voting for or against the previous question, for any other purpose than the public benefit, yet this proviso assumes that gentleman may be governed by other motives. I hope, therefore, the motion of the gentleman from Fairhaven, will prevail; and that when we come to the question of compensation the vote will be given without reference to any supposed necessity—erroneously supposed as I believe,—for placing a limitation or restriction of this kind upon gentlemen who have been selected by the people of this Commonwealth to represent them in this Convention.

Mr. KEYES. I suppose it would be improper for me to say that I rise for the purpose of shooting "folly as it flies," but rather "to catch the manners living as they rise." Sir, I like the argument I have just heard remarkably well. I have had occasion once or twice to say, in this Convention, that I have sometimes stemmed the torrent of opposition, here and elsewhere, and have been for the time overpowered and defeated, but I have generally had the satisfaction, not long afterwards, of finding that I was right.

I have risen, Sir, almost solely for the purpose of asking the Convention to consider how much better I shall feel in voting for this proposition, than will those who vote to impose the same restriction upon the House of Representatives from which it is intended to relieve the Convention. I ask the Convention to consider how these gentlemen are situated who have voted to put a halter on to the legislature, which they will not submit to themselves. [A laugh.] I certainly hope the Convention will adopt this amendment. I hope they will reflect sufficiently upon it to cause them to remove the stigma which they have placed upon the legislature of the Commonwealth, a body which ought to be as respectable, clothed with as much dignity, and possessed of as much integrity, as the Convention.

Mr. HILLARD. I was not a member of the Committee which considered this matter and reported upon it, but I suppose the object of the Committee was—or, at least, that they argued in this way, that we should get just as much for our work if we sat only sixty-seven days, as if we sat one hundred days. We have for several days past had under consideration the subject of representation, and we have finally made a compromise between the town and the district system. It was not done by the job nor by the day, but it was a combination of the day system and the job system.

The emperor of China once asked Lord Amherst or Sir George McCartney, at that time ambassador from Great Britain, how his master the king dealt with his physician. The ambassador replied, when my master, the king of England, is taken ill, he sends at once for his physician, and pays him his fees for attendance. Then he is paid so long as his majesty is ill, is he not? Undoubtedly, sire. Truly, replied the emperor, that seems to me to be an injudicious way of managing things; my physician has a salary while I am in good health, and which ceases so long as I am ill, and the consequence is that my illness comes very unfrequently, and lasts but a very little while. [Laughter.]

Now, I suppose it is proposed by gentlemen to combine the system pursued by the emperor of China in paying his physician, and the system of the king of England in paying his. [Laughter.]

The question was taken on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Fairhaven, and it was decided in the affirmative.

So the amendment was adopted.

Mr. HOOD, of Lynn. I now move to strike out the word "three," and insert the word "two," so that members shall be allowed two dollars per day for their attendance here. I make this motion because two dollars was the sum paid to the members of the Convention of 1820, and has been the pay allowed to members of the legislature, with but one exception, from that time to the present. Besides that, Sir, I think it will be establishing a precedent which will be followed by future Conventions and legislatures, and I believe that two dollars is a sufficient sum to be paid for the services of members. I presume it is well known that there are in the towns of the State many number of competent men, who are willing to serve the Commonwealth for this sum, not on account of the pay, for that is not the motive for accepting the office. Another and important reason why the pay of members should not be increased, is that those who were opposed to the Convention, objected to it on account of the expense. I desire to have a limit placed upon the expenditure which may result from it, and that the sum may be kept within the estimate of its friends. It is a matter of but little consequence to us, individually, whether we receive two or three dollars per day, and if we cut off one-third of the amount, the result will be more likely to meet with the approbation of the people. I therefore hope that the amendment will be adopted, and the compensation fixed for two dollars per day. When the question is taken, I move that it be taken by yeas and nays.

The question was taken on the call for the yeas and nays; and, upon a division—yeas, 45; noes, 198—there being not one-fifth voting in the affirmative, it was decided in the negative.

So the yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. SIMONDS, of Bedford. I had intended to have remained silent upon this question, and be satisfied simply with having my vote recorded against it, but as I am deprived of that privilege, I propose to express my dissent to the raising of the pay of members of this body above that which has been heretofore allowed to members of the legislature. It has ever been the policy of Massachusetts to allow a moderate pay to her servants in the general court, not so much as a compensation for their service, as to remunerate them for the expenses they may have incurred while performing their duties in the legislature. A large house has always been the result of small pay, and a small house will increase the compensation of its members. I hope we shall not deviate from the course we have always pursued in this matter, but that the compensation will be the same as that allowed in all our legislative bodies.

Mr. KEYES, for Abington. I regret exceedingly the position of things. I thought that if anything was to be paid to the members of this Convention, three dollars a day was the proper compensation, and I am satisfied that the people so regarded it. It was my intention, if the yeas and nays had been ordered, to have voted for it, but as we have been debarred from the privilege of recording that vote, that the people may see how we stand in this matter, I shall now vote against the proposition for three dollars. It was an act similar to this, which, more than anything else, rendered the last session of the legislature so obnoxious to the people. When members were called upon, on one occasion, to record their vote, that it might be known who voted for increasing the compensation to two dollars and a half, they absolutely refused. This was the subject of comment and jeers in the newspapers.

Now, I want to know whether the members of this Convention are not, on this occasion, repeating the same thing? I will say again, that I think it is quite reasonable that the Convention should be paid at the rate of three dollars per diem for its labors; that the people will be satisfied with it, I am confident; but, notwithstanding I am in favor of the proposition, I will not vote for it, unless I can have an opportunity of recording that vote by yeas and nays.

Mr. STETSON, of Braintree. I propose to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Lynn, by substituting the following in its stead, "That all those who have conscientious scruples against receiving three dollars a day, may be permitted to receive two dollars and fifty cents." [Laughter.]

The PRESIDENT. The amendment is not in order.

Mr. CHAPIN, of Worcester. I voted against the calling of the yeas and nays, but for fear that I shall not have an opportunity to record my vote against the amendment of the gentleman from Lynn, I move a reconsideration of that vote. And I desire simply to say in this connection, that if I should not happen to be present to give my vote against the amendment, I wish to have it distinctly understood that I am opposed to it, because I believe that the people of Massachusetts feel that the sum proposed in the resolution reported by the Committee is necessary and proper, and that they do not wish us to sit here during the warm season, for a less amount than that.

Mr. DANA, for Manchester. I wish to say one word in defence of the Convention. I voted for the yeas and nays, on the ground that I believe that they ought to be taken in all cases where we vote ourselves money; but I think that this body would appear in an unfavorable light, if the construction put upon that vote by the gentleman for Abington, (Mr. Keyes,) was a correct one. Most of the gentlemen near me voted against the taking of the yeas and nays upon this amendment, under the supposition that they would be taken upon the final passage of the resolution. I do not believe—because it would defeat all the arguments which I made against the proviso—that any gentleman in this Convention voted against taking the yeas and nays with any reference to the keeping of his vote concealed from the people, and I think that this fact should be known.

Mr. TYLER, of Pawtucket. I would state to the Convention, that the reason which governed my vote against the taking of the yeas and nays upon this amendment, was, that I supposed they would be taken on the final passage of the resolution.

Mr. DANA. As the gentleman from Worcester kindly withdrew his motion to allow me to make a brief statement, I now renew it.

Mr. HALLETT, for Woburn. I wish the Convention, in considering this subject, to stand upon its own dignity and character, and that its members shall conduct themselves as men acting in the agency of a great Commonwealth. I think the time has gone by when any political capital can be made out of two and three pence, or fifty cents, put upon the wages of the representatives of this State. All such attempts to make party capital should be thrown to the dogs. It is unbecoming any party, and especially unbecoming a body, of the high character and the higher objects of this Convention. The question is, "What is right?" Why, Sir, gentlemen have been called here from their various avocations to perform the most important of public duties, in attending to the interests of the Commonwealth, and at what expense and inconvenience to themselves and their families? I do not at all speak for myself, because, although I come from a distant country town, [laughter,] my domestic arrangements are so handy that it is convenient for me to be at home all the time the Convention is in session! But there are large numbers of delegates in this body, who, being from towns more distant than mine in reality, though nearer in locality, are compelled to remain here during the whole time, and what compensation will they receive that will save them paying more than they get? We know that the prices that members are now obliged to pay for comforts of the ordinary kind, are sufficient of themselves to require very nearly the expenditure of the usual amount received for attendance. Besides this, there is not a gentleman in the Convention, from the country, who owns a farm, or has other business, but is compelled to pay probably more than the amount he is receiving here for the purpose of carrying on his business in his absence. It is not a question, therefore, as to the mere increase of compensation to meet increase of expenditures, but a question of justice. It has been said that the people are not willing to pay their delegates more than the ordinary per diem which is paid to members of the legislature. But I believe the people are always willing and ready to be just, and if it is necessary to increase the compensation of members of that body hereafter they will approve of it, although that is not a matter which this Convention should interfere with. I am a friend to labor, and I want to see the poor man able to come here or elsewhere, as well as the rich man, who can afford to stay here and find himself. At this time, when prices of living are rising, labor of every kind is struggling hard for some addition to the compensation that is paid for it, and I want to see the prices of labor increased in all departments of industry. I am willing to set the example here. The mechanics have struck for higher wages, and though there is no occasion for us to strike, and, if need be, we could give our labor to the public for nothing, yet I hope we shall establish the rule, that the laborer is worthy of his hire, and join the laboring class, and do what is right to establish a rule, of reasonable compensation. I hope that the amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. HOOD, of Lynn. The gentleman who has just taken his seat, says that the time has come to strike for higher wages, and that the question should be settled by fixing the price at three dollars, as an example. But, let me ask, how it is in regard to this Convention? Have we not been fixing the pay of members of the legislature for future years, or at least regulating the length of the session, and not allowing the members to receive pay after one hundred days? And I submit, if there is not as much propriety in limiting our own compensation as in limiting that of members of the legislature. As I find there is great opposition to the amendment, however, and that it will require some time to take the yeas and nays, I withdraw the amendment.

The question being on the adoption of the resolve reported by the Committee,

Mr. THOMPSON, of Charlestown, moved that when the final question be taken upon it, it be taken by yeas and nays.

The motion was agreed to, and the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BIRD, of Walpole, moved to amend the resolve, by striking out the words "three dollars" and inserting "two dollars," and upon that question he moved that the yeas and nays be taken.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. THOMAS, of Weymouth, moved that the Convention do now adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. STETSON, of Braintree. I desire to say that I shall vote for the resolution reported by the Committee. If I recollect aright, there was one legislative body in session during the warm season of which you, Mr. President, was a member, and that body received three dollars per day. I intend to vote openly and frankly in favor of the resolve, because I think, that if the duties devolving upon this Convention are worth anything, they are worth the amount which has been named, and I believe the people so consider it.

The question was taken by yeas and nays, upon the adoption of the amendment, and it was decided in the negative—yeas, 54; nays, 192—as follows:—

Absent and not voting, 173.

The question recurred upon the adoption of the resolve.

Mr. SPOONER, of Warwick. I move to strike out the words "three dollars" and insert "two dollars and fifty cents." Much has been said, Mr. President, about the great sacrifices and inconveniences which gentlemen have suffered in coming here to represent the interests of the State. But, Sir, it is my opinion that there are not one-eighth of the gentlemen in this House who suffer to the extent of one dollar in their interests at home, or anywhere else, by coming here and receiving their per diem, but on the contrary, I believe they are making money by it. [A laugh.] Here is my honorable friend on my right, who represents Wilbraham, (Mr. Hallett,) who is engaged in his ordinary duties of an officer of the United States, but, Sir, I do not believe the United States has suffered in the least from his attendance in this place.

I will not consume the time in further remarks, however; I merely offer my amendment as a compromise, and I hope it will be adopted.

Mr. EAMES, of Washington, moved that the Convention adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

The question was then taken on the amendment of the gentleman from Warwick, and it was decided in the negative.

Mr. TYLER, of Pawtucket moved that the Convention adjourn.

The motion did not prevail.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Charlestown. I would ask if it is competent to withdraw the motion to take the question on the final passage of the resolution by yeas and nays?

The PRESIDENT. If no objection be made, the gentleman can withdraw his motion for the yeas and nays.

There being no objection, Mr. Thompson withdrew his motion.

The question was then taken upon the final passage of the resolution as amended, and it was decided in the affirmative.

So the resolution was adopted.

On motion by Mr. FAY, of Southborough, the Convention then, at ten minutes past six, adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, June 29, 1853.

The Convention assembled at 9 o'clock, and was called to order by the President.

Prayer by the Chaplain.

The Journal of yesterday was read.

Report from a Committee.

Mr. BATES, of Plymouth, from the Committee on the Reports of Debates, submitted the following Report, which was adopted:—

COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS.

In Convention, June 29th, 1853.

The Committee to whom was referred the subject of Reporting and Publishing the Debates and Proceedings of the Convention, ask leave to report the following resolution.

For the Committee,

M. BATES, JR.

Resolved, That there be paid to Harvey Fowler, the official Reporter of this Convention, the sum of $1000, in part payment for his services, and that the Governor of the Commonwealth be requested to draw his warrant on the Treasury for the same.

Orders of the Day.

On motion by Mr. BREED, of Lynn, the Convention proceeded to the consideration of the Orders of the Day.

The first item in the Orders of the Day, was the resolve reported by the Committee on the House of Representatives, with the amendment offered by Mr. Butler, of Lowell, and recommended by the Committee of the Whole—the pending question being upon the amendment to the amendment, offered by the member from Northampton, (Mr. Huntington.)

Mr. HUNTINGTON, of Northampton. When I made the motion, Sir, to strike out "one thousand" and insert "twelve hundred" inhabitants as the basis for annual representation, it seemed to me that it might bring the action of the House to some direct test, upon the question whether we should give the towns below twelve hundred in population, a full representation, or exclude them. It has occurred to me, however, upon further reflection, that the object will not be attained by this motion. Those who are in favor of a higher number than twelve hundred, and yet who would prefer twelve hundred to a thousand, would now vote against the basis of twelve hundred, because they prefer a higher basis. If presenting this amendment would secure a test vote, I should feel disposed to urge it. But it has seemed to me, upon the whole, that it may be proper and advisable to withdraw it, until gentlemen have had an opportunity to test the sense of the Convention on the higher numbers. There are schemes to take fifteen hundred as the basis—there are schemes ranging from fifteen hundred to two thousand, and from one thousand up to three thousand, as proposed by the member from Boston. By the common parliamentary rule, the question should be taken upon the highest number first; and perhaps fairness would require, that this amendment should now be withdrawn, unless it can be taken as a test question.

We have reached a certain stage, upon this great question of representation, but the matter is yet open for amendment.

To my mind, there are two great evils attending the present system. The first is the general ticket system, which has always been extremely obnoxious to me. We see the operation of it in regard to the city of Boston. Here there are forty-four representatives, elected by general ticket—no matter what party they represent, for I am not speaking with reference to party. In the future, we do not know what party is to prevail; in fact, judging from the vote last fall for President, it is not the whig party, at any rate. I say that there is an unfairness, standing out palpably in the general ticket system, where there is so great an inequality as exists between the city of Boston and all the other cities and towns in the Commonwealth. Where there is anything like an equal division of parties in the Commonwealth, forty-four men coming into the legislature, by general ticket, from one city, can control every political question, from the election of a United States Senator down. That is one great objection, in my mind, to the present general ticket system.

Another great objection is, the operation of the amendment of the Constitution in 1840, as to representation upon the small towns. Not that the amendment of 1840 in itself unjust—not at all; but the operation of that amendment upon the small towns has been entirely unexpected, both by the inhabitants of the large and the small towns. By the rapid growth of the cities and large towns, the representation from the large towns has retained its strength, while the small towns have lost in their ratio. The basis of full representation has advanced from twelve hundred up to about sixteen hundred, more or less, and thus the small towns have dropped behind in the race. They have lost a portion of their representation; and we all wish to redress that wrong. Now, how is it proposed to remedy these two evils? We have gone so far as to decide not only that the general ticket system is a bad one, but that it is proper that the State should be restricted to some extent. So far as the vote went yesterday afternoon, it decided that the districting system is to be applied to the cities. Another step has been taken. It has been decided that towns containing less than one thousand inhabitants, are not to have a full representation; but it has not been decided that a still higher number than one thousand should not be adopted. Another thing has been decided. It has been decided that a system of representation for every town in the Commonwealth, every year, is not a just system, in the opinion of this Convention. So far we have advanced, and perhaps we have gone one step further, and that is, to reject the plan of districting the whole Commonwealth. Some gentlemen say that has not been fairly tested; if it has not, I hope it will be. But, in my opinion, the sense of this Convention is, that the people are not ready for a full district system, especially a district system based upon population and mere numerical equality, for every district. And, Sir, if a district system ever is adopted in this Commonwealth, I think it will be with a different basis in the different districts—one basis for the cities and large towns, and a smaller basis of representation for the smaller towns. If we have such a feature as that, in my opinion, there is no great objection to the district system. I did not come here with my mind made up as to town representation or district representation. I can see good and evil in both systems; both can be attacked, and both can be defended. I came here in the spirit of the document which was put forth by the friends of this Convention, a majority of the legislature of 1852; and by that, no particular preference was expressed for town representation over the district system. Let me say, further, that by that document, the idea was not even shadowed, that towns containing less than twelve hundred inhabitants, were to be entitled to a representative every year. What was complained of, then, by the majority of the legislature friendly to this Convention? It was the unjust and unexpected operation of the amendment of 1840, tending to disfranchise the small towns. Not, that in itself it was wrong, or that it was wrong at the time when it was adopted. There was no intimation that the basis of annual representation was to be depressed below twelve hundred. That document alludes to both systems—the district system and the town system, and no great preference is expressed for one or the other. I read from it:—

“The first subject which would demand the attention of the Convention is, a change in our present system of representation. . . . The present constitutional provisions on this subject, though complicated, are ingenious, and though they have been the source of much complaint during the last few years,” [mark these words,]

“yet the practical working of the system has been much better, thus far, than it is likely to be if continued in future. But however light, comparatively speaking, may have been the evil hitherto, . . . ten years' experience under it, coupled with a knowledge of its future operation as now established by official facts and calculations, can leave no doubt, &c., that some change is absolutely necessary.” . . .

Again:—

“Whether this most desirable result can be best accomplished by dividing the State into single districts based upon the number of people, of legal voters, or of ratable polls, or whether corporate or town representation under which the people of the Commonwealth have so long lived and prospered, and for which there unquestionably exists a strong attachment—it is not the province of the legislature to say.”

I do not think any member of this Convention has the right to say that one system is more democratic than another. I have no doubt that if the basis of representation was fixed altogether on the district system, it would operate with some inconvenience for a time; but I think the people would flourish as well under that system as under any other, when they should have accommodated themselves to it. I have a preference for the town system on some accounts, if we can get a system which shall be tolerably fair, without conflicting too much with the habits and feelings, or if you please, with the prejudices of the people.

I do not place any stress upon the past history of the Commonwealth in regard to this matter; the habiliments of the child are not the habiliments of the grown man. I care not whether by the colonial history of the Commonwealth it is shown that the district system or the town system prevailed. I believe it has been a corporate right long enough to establish it in the feelings or the prejudices of the people of this Commonwealth. It is a corporate right, and the Constitution recognizes it as such. The right to be represented does not exist in the people of the Commonwealth independently of this corporate right. That doctrine has been established by the supreme court of this Commonwealth. The question was raised of the right of a town to vote not to send a representative; and it was argued, that a town could not vote not to send, because, according to the Constitution, the right existed in the people, and not in the town. The Constitution, it was argued, declared that the people shall have a right to be represented. The answer of the supreme court was, that this right to be represented, by the Constitution, was a corporate right, and not a right of the people, independent of their municipal institutions. That is the doctrine in this Commonwealth. It may be changed, I admit; and we have settled it, as I conceive, that this corporate right, to some extent, shall continue. What is the next thing to be done? Well, Sir, by the amendment of the gentleman from Lowell, the basis of annual representation is changed from that established in 1840; it is changed from twelve hundred to one thousand. He proposes that all towns having one thousand inhabitants, shall have a representative every year. Now, Sir, can any one man tell me why a town of one thousand people should have a representative every year, and why a town containing five hundred inhabitants should not? If you take a standard below twelve hundred, can any good and valid reason be assigned for making this distinction in favor of a town of one thousand inhabitants, while you refuse to admit a town of nine hundred to the same privilege? I cannot see any such reason; and therefore I can see a degree of justice, or less injustice, in the plan of the gentleman for Erving, which I cannot find in the plan of the gentleman from Lowell, in this respect, because while it admits every town in the Commonwealth to a representation every year, it also adopts the general ticket system, which is a compensating advantage given to the large towns and the cities, and one wrong is neutralized by another. And if I were compelled now to vote, and choose between these two systems alone, that of the gentleman for Erving, and that of the gentleman from Lowell, I should give my vote for that proposed by the gentleman for Erving, unjust as I think it is.

My amendment proposes to take twelve hundred as the basis; it can be defended by good, substantial reasons. I go to the Constitution as it was amended in 1840; and what is the history of the basis which was adopted at that time? That amendment was, that a town of twelve hundred inhabitants should be entitled to a representative every year, but that no town below twelve hundred should be thus entitled. That, Sir, was the result of a compromise. At the time when that was adopted, the question of the property basis in the Senate was before the people; and there were friends of the property basis in the Senate who belonged to the legislatures that passed that amendment. There were also the friends of a large House, and these were those who were in favor of reducing the number, which was very great at that time. Committees embracing these different interests and opinions were constituted, and the result was the amendment now standing in our Constitution, that towns containing twelve hundred inhabitants should be entitled to a representative every year, and all others below proportionately. And, Sir, from the earliest history of the Commonwealth down to the present time, there has been this distinction in relation to small towns. The doctrine has always been recognized that the smallest towns were not entitled to a representative every year, with the compensating principle of the general ticket. The amendment of 1837, which had been adopted but recently, did not stand, because the House was rapidly becoming more unwieldy than ever, and the basis of 1840 was adopted, almost by the unanimous consent of the people of the Commonwealth. Every small town in the Commonwealth had an opportunity to know, and did know, exactly what the compact was. Every town containing less than twelve hundred inhabitants knew that it would not be entitled to a representative every year. That amendment received the sanction of one general court. It then came before another general court, and received the sanction of that also, by a vote of two-thirds of the House of Representatives each year. It then went to the people. Less than five thousand of the people recorded their votes against that compact—that compromise. We have, then, the calm, deliberate agreement, that all towns containing less than twelve hundred inhabitants should not be entitled to a representative every year.

Mr. GRISWOLD, for Erving. If the gentleman will give way, I will state that there were, less than thirty thousand people who voted for it, while there were probably 140,000 voters in the Commonwealth at that time.

Mr. HUNTINGTON. True, Sir; but I take it a man must be considered as approving a measure when, having the opportunity, he does not dissent. If a man does not choose to express any opinion when called on to vote yea or nay, it is fair to conclude that he acquiesces in the doings of the majority, in such a case as this. As I stated, there were less than five thousand votes recorded against that compact or compromise of 1840; and the senatorial basis entered into that compromise. Now, Sir, there has been no retrograde movement in relation to the basis of the Senate in this Convention. The avowed movement is certainly the other way. The Senate is to become the popular branch, and the House is to become the conservative department it is said, which seems to be a perversion of all theory and practice, and all constitutional doctrine. At any rate there is no advance proposed by this Convention towards a more conservative or property foundation in constituting the basis of the Senate.

Now, Sir, I can justify myself to my constituents, and to the people of this Commonwealth, in taking the basis of twelve hundred. When I am asked, why do you fix the basis there? I can reply, that it was because that number was solemnly agreed upon in 1840, by two legislatures, and not five thousand people in the Commonwealth recorded their votes against it. I can give a good reason for my course upon that ground. But when I am asked why I give my support in favor of a basis of one thousand, and why I allow these thirty-one towns,—I believe there are that number, with a population between ten hundred and twelve hundred,—a representative every year, and exclude all towns having less than one thousand from having a representative every year, and lessen the representation in towns that have gained in population, I can give no good reason. The selection of that number is entirely arbitrary, and cannot be supported by any principle whatever.

Since 1840, I suppose the population of the Commonwealth, in the large towns and cities, has increased from two to three hundred thousand. (About 235,000.) These two or three hundred thousand are to be cut down in the basis of representation, cities are to be divided into districts, by the amendment of the gentleman from Lowell, (Mr. Butler,) while in the other direction, a boon is extended to some thirty-one towns, which, for ten or twelve years past, have not thought of having a representative every year, and they are to be allowed to come in and enjoy rights which they have not even asked for. I ask why it is, that these two or three hundred thousand people are to be cut down in their rights, and why these thirty-one small towns are to enjoy privileges which they had not before?

I have here the number of representatives which it was estimated in 1840 would constitute the House, when the census of that year should have been taken. When the amendment of 1840 was adopted, two hundred and forty constituted the number of representatives, and it was estimated that when the census should be taken, upon which the amendment was to operate, the House would consist of two hundred and seventy members. The number of small towns, at that time, which were not entitled to representatives every year, was one hundred and four. Now, upon the basis of twelve hundred, which I propose by my amendment, that number of towns is reduced, and it excludes from annual representation only ninety-four. So that my amendment does not operate against the spirit of the compact entered into at that time.

Another circumstance I call to mind. It is said that this system has operated unjustly upon the small towns since 1840. I agree to that. But what was the extent of the injustice? In 1851, a proposition to call a Constitutional Convention was laid before the people, with a full knowledge, on their part, of the extent of this inequality and injustice. And what did they do? They rejected the idea of calling a Convention to cure it. That system, which required twelve hundred as the basis of one representative, had been in operation some ten or twelve years, and the people of the Commonwealth knew all about its effect, and yet the evil had not reached a magnitude which would induce them to come together to correct it. Next year, to be sure, they did call a Convention. I say these are controlling considerations, in my mind, why towns, containing less than twelve hundred inhabitants, should not be admitted to a full representation.

Well, Sir, there is another feature in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Lowell, which I do not like; and that is, that it does not allow for the advantage gained by the operation of the general ticket system. It says: "Every town of one thousand inhabitants, and of less than four thousand, shall be entitled to one representative each year." Here the increasing ratio is "three thousand." The next clause is: "Every town of four thousand inhabitants, and of less than eight thousand, shall be entitled to two representatives each year." Here the increasing ratio is "four thousand," and no more is required in the next advance, from eight to twelve thousand, in order to entitle a town to an additional representative. And when you go above twelve thousand, the increasing ratio is again brought down to three thousand; and above that number, a still different ratio is adopted.

Now, the amendment which I have suggested, but have not yet offered, though it is in the hands of the members of this Convention, has regard to that objection. It proposes to establish an increased ratio for each additional representative. As you increase the number by general ticket, you should increase the ratio also. But I do not look upon that as an all-important objection.

But there is another feature in this proposed amendment, the operation of which I did not fully understand. It seems to me, that it may make a very large House, much larger than is contemplated. The proposition says: "In all apportionments after the first, the numbers which shall entitle any city or town to two, three, four or more representatives, shall be so adjusted, in proportion, as hereinbefore provided, that the whole number of representatives, exclusive of those which may be returned by towns of less than one thousand inhabitants, shall never exceed three hundred and seventy."

Now, there are some sixty towns, containing less than one thousand inhabitants. To be sure, it takes three hundred and seventy as the number to compose the House, but to that you add sixty more, and you have four hundred and thirty. To that, also, you are to add representatives from all towns of fifteen hundred inhabitants, which shall hereafter be incorporated. So that, in 1855, when a new census is to be taken, you have a House composed of from four to five hundred members, for aught I can see. Even that I can vote for, but for reducing the number below twelve hundred inhabitants, as the number required to entitle a town to a representative every year, I can find no reason satisfactory to myself. I am free to say, that I think twelve hundred too low a basis, but there is a show of substantial justice in it, and it seems to me, that in adopting that number, full and ample justice is done to the small towns, and it is as far as they could ask the people of this Commonwealth to go.

Well, Sir, so much for this amendment. I have already said that I approve of one feature of that amendment, and that is the one in relation to the district system. That system is convenient for the large towns, and they can easily adopt it, but I think "five thousand" is too low a ratio of increase for the city of Boston. I think a basis of "six thousand" for the large cities would operate more fairly and equally upon the people of the Commonwealth. That would be convenient for their wards; and a double district would make twelve thousand inhabitants, and one half of a senatorial district; or if we should give them a general ticket of four representatives, it would cover a senatorial district. But this consideration has nothing to do with the justice of it.

I propose to explain in a few words, why I think an increasing ratio and a larger basis of representation should be adopted in relation to the large cities and towns. There are three great interests in this Commonwealth: the commercial, the manufacturing and the agricultural. As to the commercial interest, the legislature of Massachusetts can do very little toward sustaining that. Massachusetts is not a nation, and she has surrendered jurisdiction upon the subject of commerce to the United States. Representatives, sitting here in general court, can do little in any way, towards sustaining or injuring that great interest.

Next, there comes the manufacturing interest. How is the city of Boston situated in relation to that? In 1845 or 1846, returns were procured from the assessors of all the towns and cities of the Commonwealth, showing the amount of the industrial products of each. By looking at those tables, you will find that Boston has but very little capital invested in manufacturing, in the city proper. While the population of Boston is about one-seventh of the inhabitants in the whole State, her amount of capital invested in the industrial pursuits of the Commonwealth in the city is only about one-fifteenth of that of the whole State. You find then that the manufacturing capital, which is to be protected by the general court, is not in Boston, but in the country. It is scattered all along your little streams; though, perhaps, owned to some extent by gentlemen residing in Boston and its vicinity; it is doing good there, is represented there, and the people there will take care of it. It is in safe keeping, and I venture to say it is where the owners of this property, and where the capitalists of Boston interested in that species of industry, wish to have it, and wish to have it represented, inasmuch as they have placed it there.

The same tables show the number of hands employed in these industrial pursuits of the Commonwealth, and how does the number of hands so employed in Boston, compare, with the number employed in the country? While she has one-seventh of the population of the State, she has, or then had, one-thirtieth of the number of hands thus employed. So it appears that she has only one-fifteenth of the capital and one-thirtieth of the hands employed, with a population amounting to about one-seventh. It seems to me that Boston must admit, that so far as the industrial products of the Commonwealth are concerned, they should be strongly represented from the country. They are then, and the representatives from the country can and will sustain them.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES. — HUNTINGTON.

Then there are other great manufacturing interests; the leather, and the boot and shoe manufacturing interests, more important, by far, than that of woollen and cotton manufactures. They are not situated here in Boston. The agricultural interest too, is not here; and I submit, that it is not competent for Boston to say, in relation to these three great interests, that she is entitled to be as fully represented as the country.

Something has been said in the progress of this debate, as to the superior intelligence, and wisdom, and sober second thought of the people in the country. I would not be understood as intimating or encouraging the idea that the voters of the country are more intelligent than the voters in Boston. I do not believe it. I believe that the voters in Boston are, as a class, as intelligent as those who reside in the country. By their schools and by the lectures and libraries to which they have access, they have the means of advancing quite as far in that direction, as the people of any part of the State, and if it were not so, to base any provision, which we may incorporate into the fundamental law of the Commonwealth, upon the idea that the voters of any one section of the State are more intelligent, and wiser, and better men than those of any other section, would be highly unjust. But, Sir, we have a right to look at the great interests which are represented in the legislature of Massachusetts, and we have a right, and it is our duty, to see that they are properly represented.

Another great interest of this Commonwealth is that of education; the interest of your common and public schools which are supported by taxation—not your private schools, supported upon the voluntary system, which are, I was about to say, detrimental to the great cause of popular education. If you take taxation as the basis of representation—as one gentleman from Boston, who has brought forward his tables here to show the wealth of Boston, as compared with that of the country, says you should—look for a moment at the amount which the small towns of the State pay towards the support of the public schools, and that paid by the city of Boston, and see where, according to that comparison, the representation would fall. That would give the country a higher basis of representation than is asked for by any body here.

Inasmuch as the Secretary of the Board of Education has shown what percentage of the taxable property of the Commonwealth is contributed towards the support of the common schools, in the different parts of the State, I had the curiosity to look at it, and I found this to be the result. The table is headed by the Secretary "Counties arranged according to the percentage of their taxable property, appropriated to the support of public schools for 1851 and 1852, expressed in decimals:—"

Barnstable,	2.53	Norfolk,	1.77
Plymouth,	2.26	Franklin,	1.74
Middlesex,	2.13	Bristol,	1.73
Nantucket,	2.06	Hampden,	1.66
Essex,	1.99	Worcester,	1.61
Dukes,	1.83	Berkshire,	1.53
Hampshire,	1.81	Suffolk,	0.94

Now here are nine counties in the Commonwealth, which exceed Suffolk two-fold, in what they contribute for the support of our common school system. The average for the whole State, is 1.54 per cent. upon the property of the Commonwealth, and you will see how far Boston falls below that, when she only contributes .94 per cent. Well, Sir, Boston does a great deal for public schools, a great deal for colleges, and a great deal for private schools. I do not mean to say, she does not do as much for the cause of education, including colleges and private schools, within her own limits, as any other portion of the Commonwealth. But I say, that so far as this great system of public schools, provided for by the legislature is concerned, which secures to every child in the Commonwealth, an education, at the public expense. Boston does not, according to her ability, do as much as the small towns of the Commonwealth, by one-half.

Mr. UPTON, of Boston. Does the gentleman mean to assume that the schools in Boston, are not as good, as they are in the small towns of the State?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Not at all. I believe the schools in the city of Boston, are rather above the average standard of schools in the community. I wish I could say that the public schools in every portion of the Commonwealth, were as good as they are in the city of Boston. Indeed, I think I should be safe in saying that the schools in this city, public and private together, are superior to the schools in the country. They are made so by their central position, by the wealth of the people, and by the interest which the people take in them. That is a safe calculation to make. I am willing to yield that point. But it is no purpose of mine in this argument, to make any odious comparisons, either against the city and in favor of the country, or in favor of the city and against the country. I am only considering such of the great interests of the people of the Commonwealth, as this Convention ought peculiarly to regard and protect, and I think this great system of public schools, comprises one of those interests, and in connection with that interest, I alluded to the fact, that the city of Boston, in proportion to its valuation lists, does not pay for the support of this system of public schools, more than one-fourth or one-half as much, as the people of the small towns.

Let me call the attention of the Convention, to another fact in connection with the subject of public schools. I find, from a cursory examination of the returns of the Secretary of the Board of Education, that the attendance upon these schools, considering all the disadvantages of distance and travel in the country, is much larger in the small towns than in the large. Notwithstanding many of the children are compelled to go two or three miles to reach their school-houses, they are there more regularly than in the large towns and cities. This shows the great interest which is taken in these towns, in our system of public schools. It is considered by the people of those towns as one of the most important interests of the community, and it is an interest which is to go on and increase hereafter. I, therefore, regard it as one which should be taken into great consideration by this Convention in establishing their basis of representation.

Then there is another subject which I also desire to bring to the attention of the Convention. Much has been said about centralization here. This doctrine of what is technically called centralization, I care nothing about. I cannot see that it has any proper application to this subject. The doctrine of centralization, as applied to the governments of the old world, we know nothing about, practically, here. What I understand by that term, as applied to government, is when that government itself is centered in the hands of the few. As our government is absolutely in the hands of the legal voters of the Commonwealth, no centralization can take place, so far as the government is concerned, except so far as the people themselves, in migrating from one place to another, or in gathering into large towns and cities, may collect in larger numbers in some one place more than in others. This we have no right to prevent in establishing a fundamental law. But so far as the administration of the government is concerned, there can be centralization, in the sense in which I understand the term. The people delegate the powers of government to their officers, state and county, and to representatives who meet here in the city of Boston, and to that extent the administration of the government is centred in the city of Boston. But the municipal institutions which prevail amongst us, and which, as they exist here, are unknown to the old world, are an effectual and perfect protection from this danger of centralization of the government, and therefore, I say, I care nothing about this doctrine, as applied to the government of Massachusetts. There is, however, a concentration of wealth, power, influence, and numbers combined, in the cities and large towns, and this is a fact entitled to consideration in the determination of this question. Take, for instance, the city of Boston, and compare its advantages for representation with the country. Boston is more strongly represented in the legislature than a country town is, because she is not only represented by her own delegates, but she is also, in a peculiar sense, which does not apply to country towns, represented by all the delegates from all the portions of the State, even by the country representatives themselves. Beside the general doctrine—and it is the true theory of our government—that a man who is elected from any particular place, is the representative not only of that place, but of all the towns and cities in the Commonwealth, and which will apply to the relative position of the city members towards the towns, as well as to that of the country members towards the city,—I say, besides this general doctrine, the country members, when they come here, do, in a peculiar manner, represent the city also; not in any illegitimate or improper sense, but they truly represent the interests of the city. While they are here, as they are, from all parts of the Commonwealth, they see what Boston wants. They go to her wharves, and her places of business of every description—they witness her public works. They are ready to investigate any plan which you will show them for public improvements. They visit your charitable and literary and scientific institutions, your private and public establishments for the poor and suffering, and see with their own eyes what are their necessities. Many country representatives are doing business here with their Boston constituents, are in their counting-rooms, shops, and banks, hear what they have to say by way of suggestion, and look to their interests in legislation. But the people of the country do not enjoy these advantages. If you would take the Boston representatives into the country, and give them the same opportunity of ascertaining the wants of the country, as the country representatives have of attending to the wants of the city, they would be quite as willing to give their aid. I do not mean to intimate that they would not do as much, and go as far to promote their interests and assist them, as do the representatives from the country, but it is impossible, from their situation, that it can be so.

It is an impossibility, from the very nature of things, that gentlemen who live in the city can understand the interests of the country as the country representatives do those of the city, so far as local legislation is concerned. For instance, suppose there is a question as to the alteration in a city or town line in this neighborhood, or a ferry, or railway, the members can go and examine and hear for themselves, and can administer to the public exigency from their own positive observation and knowledge. But suppose the question of the settlement or alteration of town lines, or any other local question, in the county of Berkshire, should arise, Boston gentlemen cannot visit Berkshire, for the purpose of obtaining the requisite information, but they must receive it second-hand. I do not mean to say that there is any disposition on the part of the people of Boston not to do justice to the people of the country, certainly not, but I do mean to say that Boston, from her position as the seat of government, has an advantage over the country, and that her interests are better represented than country interests, from the fact that they are not only represented by the members elected from the city itself, but also by the members who come here from the country. If Boston had not a single representative upon this floor, still her interests would be well guarded. The very fact that the State House is in the city insures that protection. Why, Sir, I venture to say that Worcester or Springfield would either of them give up half their representation for the sake of having this State House located there, because they would feel that by the mere presence of the legislature, their interests would be regarded and promoted, and better protected without a single representative elected by them, than they now are with all the representatives they are entitled to. In this respect, therefore, the people of Boston have much the advantage over the people in the other portions of the Commonwealth.

Permit me again to allude to the fact, that from the very nature of things the representative from Boston is in more immediate communication with his constituents than the representative from the country can be with his. He lives almost within a stone's throw of them, and can at any hour confer with them, or be conferred with in ten minutes' time. If absent when a question is to be taken, he is summoned in. But when any matter arises in the country, touching local interests, which require legislation, that representative is away from them and cannot consult with them. They must and do send down lobby members, or let the matter in hand go unrepresented.

Then there is another advantage which the representatives from Boston and the large cities always have. The members from the country are many of them obliged to go, or they do go, home towards the close of the sessions. It has always been noticed, that at these periods there is an undue number of absences among those representing the remote parts of the Commonwealth. They are also absent more or less during the session, and cannot be called in when a question is to be taken. These are not very consoling arguments I admit, but I think the fact is entitled to some consideration, and I present it for what it is worth.

The great interests in the Commonwealth, to be provided for by State legislation, are the educational, the manufacturing, and the agricultural. These interests must and will be fostered. The country and the city are both interested in them, for one is dependent upon the other. But they mainly are found and exist out of the city. Your agricultural products are necessary for the existence of the cities, and in return your agricultural communities are enriched by the cities. Our manufacturing interest, I think, is eminently entitled to the consideration and protection of the legislature of the Commonwealth, so far as it has control of the subject. I know that this interest is, to some extent, regulated and protected by the national legislature. But it is the great interest of Massachusetts after all. I do not, as some gentlemen do, rank it below the agricultural. There are as intelligent men engaged in mechanical and manufacturing pursuits, as can be found devoted to agricultural. My professional experience has brought me in connection with both, and given me some opportunity to judge in relation to this matter, and that is my conviction. Something has been said, in the course of this debate, about farmers as a superior order of men. I do not believe the agricultural portion of the people of the Commonwealth have any greater claim upon the protection or the power of the government, or to higher consideration, than have those engaged in manufacturing, mechanical, or commercial pursuits. I would not give one the preference over the other. An ignorant farmer is no better than an ignorant mechanic. An ignorant man is an ignorant man, and an intelligent man is an intelligent man, whatever his occupation, and without much regard to it, here in Massachusetts. I believe about the same number, proportionately, may be found in either, or in any trade or pursuit. I would not be understood as detracting from the importance of the agricultural interest of the Commonwealth. Far be it from me to speak a word against that interest. My closest ties are in that direction. I have always looked forward to a farm as a kind of land of Beulah, where, if I could dwell, I could almost fancy myself living in sight of heaven, and hearing celestial sounds. But I do not believe the farmers themselves wish to be set apart as a favored or superior class in the Commonwealth; or that they demand an undue amount of influence in the affairs of the government. I believe they are willing to take just what they are entitled to under a fair and equal apportionment of the powers of the government. I do not believe they desire to be treated as a superior order of men. I would not underrate any one of the great industrial interests of Massachusetts, but I believe, nevertheless, that if we were compelled to part with either the agricultural or the mechanical and manufacturing interests, that we could better spare the agricultural. We can supply ourselves with bread from abroad, but the products of the industry of our mechanics and manufacturers are essential to our prosperity, and we could not well live and flourish without them for a day. When I hear gentlemen talk of our farmers as a higher class of men, in whose hands the power of the government can be more safely placed than in the hands of the mechanics and the manufacturers, and, as if they were to be invested with the control of affairs, to the exclusion of other classes, I cannot sympathize with them in any such opinion. I think they are entitled to a just and fair representation, and that is all.

These are some of the reasons which induce me to advocate an-enlarged basis of representation for this city and the large cities and towns. In town or in corporate representation, this can only be attained by an increasing and enlarged ratio. These considerations would prevent my supporting a district system based on the equality of mere population, without regard to voters.

It has been said, and I know it is a controlling conviction in some minds, that the district system will introduce the convention mode of making nominations more extensively than it now exists. Well, Sir, I do not object to the district system so much on that account. Political conventions are already introduced, and have become almost a part of our institutions. They exist as a sort of political necessity.

If the people choose to nominate their candidates by means of a convention I do not know why they should not do it. I have seen as much mischief and intrigue, and petty jealousy at town caucuses as I have in any convention system. They are both in the hands of the people. If good men will attend your town caucuses they will nominate good candidates, and if good men will attend your conventions, you will have good candidates. There is no more danger in the one case than in the other, if they are under the influence of good men, and they may be. There are evils connected with the representation by the small towns which are not incident to an election by districts. A politician can go into a little town of three hundred inhabitants in a closely contested election and do a great deal more with a little money, than he can in a large city, towards effecting a particular result. I do not mean that the result is obtained by bribery or corruption, but merely by getting out the voters of the right stamp, and putting other machinery in motion. I do not mean that opinions or voters are to be improperly influenced by any such means, but it will require a great deal less money and exertion to change the result in one of these little towns, by getting out a few antique voters, who otherwise would not attend the polls, than it will in the large towns and cities. I have known caucuses held in small towns where a committee would be appointed to select the candidates of the party for which the caucus was held. The people have not permitted their committee to report to the meeting, but have appointed them, with instructions to report, when and where? At some time previous to the election, to the caucuses, for their ratification? No, Sir; but with instructions to report at the polls! In these small towns, the people are not always left free and independent to select their candidates for representatives; sometimes they do not know who is to be their candidates until they go up to the polls to vote, and they are compelled to take the candidate reported by their committee, without knowing even his name till they are called on to cast their ballots.

And it very often happens that in the small towns the election turns, and the representative is chosen upon merely sectional and small local considerations. A new religious society is formed in a small town—one man will not vote for this candidate because he belongs to that church, and another will not vote for that candidate because he does not belong to his own church. Various neighborhood feuds and jealousies creep into these small town nominations.

Now, Sir, this consideration, it seems to me, is one which should have some weight in determining this question as to district conventions and town nominations, and whether the district system is objectionable on this account.

These various views which I have presented, it seems to me, show the fallacy of the tables which have been got up to set forth the equality or inequality of the various plans which have been proposed. I contend that exact numerical equality is not necessary, nor is it consonant with exact political justice in apportioning the representation of the State. We do not want mere numerical equality in our representation. What we want is, that all the interests of the State should be fully and fairly represented. That is political justice and equality, and that is the system of representation which I hope the Convention will adopt.

I have presented considerations, tending to show, that you cannot take a mere numerical majority, based on population, as reliable in any system,—either in the district or the representative system. I wish to present a few controlling facts in relation to this particular branch of the subject. On looking at one of the documents, (No. 17,) which contains a list of the population and legal voters, you will find, that in the large cities and towns, the population runs much above the legitimate proportion between population and voters. I have looked through these tables, and I find, that what may be called a fair and healthy proportion between the population and the legal voters, is about five to one.

If gentlemen will examine these tables as to the small agricultural country towns, they will find that about one-fifth of the population are voters. In the large cities and towns, you will find, that in Boston, not one-seventh of the population are voters. I take twenty-one of the largest cities and towns in the order of their population, and I find, on an average, that only one-seventh are voters, instead of one-fifth. Just take this result, and apply it to the basis of representation. You have not done it in regard to the Senate. There you have taken the population. You find that this advantage is gained by the cities and large towns on their population, that it operates just like the representation of property, and it looks something like a return to the old system of the property basis, because this floating population always come in, where the property and the largest wealth are to be found. And when you permit this floating population to be represented, you in fact admit property in another shape and form to come in and be represented—not in name, but in substance. As I said before, apply this to Boston, and take the same ratio in regard to voters and population as you find in the country, and how does the case stand? Boston does not count over 138,788, by any reckoning; but by this mode, only about 107,000. Multiply her voters by five instead of seven, as that is the proper way to ascertain her legitimate population, to be represented by Boston representatives, and her population is only 107,000,—and when she gets twenty-four or twenty-nine representatives therefore, she gets them upon 107,000, and not upon 138,000. Apply this calculation to your county population, about which so much has been said, and where such apparent inequalities have been presented. Take the county of Hampshire for instance,—her population is 34,290 by the tables. Multiply her voters by seven, and bring them up to the same ratio or standard which exists in your large cities and towns, and you find that her population should be reckoned at about 42,000, instead of 34,000, in determining her proportion of representation. Hampden has about 70,000, instead of 50,000; Franklin has about 43,000, instead of 30,000; Berkshire has 68,000, instead of 48,000, expressing it in round numbers. Take the tables as furnished us yesterday by the gentleman from Lowell, (Mr. Butler,) and apply the principle. Reduce the population in your large cities and counties by that scale, and you leave a basis for a fair representation. You may give Boston a representation of one for every 6,000 of population. Based on voters, it would be one for about 4,815. Where is the great injustice and inequality in that? Above all, considering the other great interests which predominate and prevail in the country, I submit that we should be doing ample justice to Boston and the large towns, by putting them upon this basis of 6,000 as to population.

It is to be borne in mind also, as to much of this floating population in large cities and towns, that it is made up of transient persons,—emigrants, foreigners not naturalized, male and female operatives,—persons whose interests can be as well protected, and as rightfully belong to the country, as to the city.

The country is quite as much interested as the city, in a cargo of destitute emigrants just landed, when the question arises as to what almshouses shall receive those that cannot take care of themselves.

For no other purpose, unless it were to swell and inflate the basis of population, would the large cities be likely to claim them as their peculiar constituency.

This excess, therefore, of population, found in cities and large manufacturing towns, beyond the healthy and legitimate ratio of population and voters, should, for the purpose of determining the representative basis, be distributed among all the cities and towns of the Commonwealth.

To recapitulate, then, in conclusion. As to a basis of 1,200 population for the small towns, to entitle them to an annual representation, I am willing to adopt it as a compromise, if you please to call it such, already sanctioned by the people, as it was in 1840. I am willing to agree, that the smaller towns shall be secured there. As experience shows, that these smaller towns do not increase as the large towns and cities do, and as a constant and advancing ratio is to be applied to them, I am willing that every town up to 1,200, shall be secured in having one representative every year, and that they shall stand as well as ever they stood. This is the basis which was sanctioned by the Convention of 1820. It had the sanction of two-thirds of the legislatures of 1839 and of 1840, and was adopted by almost unanimous consent. I think it will fully secure the smaller towns in their rights. While the large towns and cities have increased in wealth and numbers, they have, most of them, remained stationary, and thus fallen behind in the race. Our Commonwealth, like the solar system, has been advancing towards some distant and unknown centre of centres among the constellations, but the smaller planets have been somewhat thrown from their orbits. I would restore them to their appropriate paths and balance-power in our political system. Give them full, and ample, and generous security on the old recognized and established basis of twelve hundred, but below that basis, in my judgment, we should not go.

As to towns entitled to more than one representative, I submit, the ratio ought to be increased, to meet the additional strength gained by the general ticket system, so far as it is adopted, so that if 3,000 is the additional number required for one representative, four thousand should be the additional number required for two, and five thousand for three.

Then, beyond that, I would adopt the district system, on a basis still higher, for the reasons already assigned. Such a system of corporate representation, with a limit as to the number of representatives, and a proportionally advancing ratio that shall not affect small towns, I can defend here, or before my constituents, and the people.

Mr. HASKELL, of Ipswich. Notwithstanding the diversity of opinion, upon the subject now under consideration, I suppose we shall all agree to one proposition—that unless some plan may be devised, which shall be more just, equal, and more acceptable to the people than the present system, it will be better for us to retain the old system as it is. Most of the gentlemen who have addressed the Convention, seem to have taken it for granted that the present system is obnoxious, in a great degree, to the people, and that there is no danger of our framing a worse system. I do not concur in that view, or in the opinion which has been so frequently expressed, that there is great injustice and inequality in that system. I propose now to make a very brief examination of the plan proposed by the gentleman from Lowell, (Mr. Butler,) compare it with the existing system, and see if it obviates any of the objections which have been urged by the gentleman for Erving, (Mr. Griswold,) against the existing system. The first objection to the present system, which was suggested by the gentleman for Erving, if I recollect aright, was, that it was too complicated. Is it as complicated as the proposition now submitted by the gentleman from Lowell, (Mr. Butler)? I contend that it is not.

By the present basis, one sum is given as the number to entitle a town to one representative; another sum is fixed as the mean increasing ratio for additional representatives, and another sum is given, by which the population of towns not entitled to one representative, is to be divided, and the quotient thus obtained determines the number of representatives they are to be entitled to in each ten years. We have, then, three fixed or certain numbers given for these purposes, and the provision is, that for every 70,000 increase in the population of the State, (10 per cent. on the census of 1840,) 10 per cent. is to be added to each of these given numbers. I submit, there is not any great complication in this matter, and that any man can sit down with the census and Constitution of Massachusetts before him, and operating with the simple rules of arithmetic, can apportion the representation in a very short time. Can it be done as easily by the plan of the gentleman from Lowell? I must confess that I have given this subject a careful and candid attention, and I am hardly able to see the results, which the gentleman from Lowell is inclined to think will be realized, from the adoption of his system. The provision of the first resolution in his plan is, that every town of a less number than one thousand inhabitants, shall be entitled to five representatives in each ten years, &c.; then there are four degrees of the sliding scale in the ratio of increase, by which the representation increases, not by any regular percentage, according to the increase of population in the State, but by an arbitrary rule, in which the town is in some measure deprived of its power in proportion to the increase of its population.

The second resolution in the plan of the gentleman from Lowell, (Mr. Butler,) is a very complicated one indeed, and I would defy any gentleman of this Convention, except the gentleman from Lowell, to sit down and tell me what the result will be ten years hence, of the sliding-scale part of the basis laid down there. It provides, that "in all apportionments after the first, the numbers which shall entitle any city or town to two, three, four or more representatives, shall be so adjusted in proportion as hereinbefore provided, that the whole number of representatives, exclusive of those which may be returned by towns of less than one thousand inhabitants, and towns incorporated after this provision shall be adopted, shall never exceed three hundred and seventy."

Now, Sir, there are various ways in which this apportionment may be "adjusted." I have found that it might be "adjusted," (not proportionately increased,) as "in the manner before specified," so as to present very different results. There are two or three other elements which must always enter into the apportionment of the House, upon the plan proposed by the gentleman from Lowell. The date of the incorporation of a town must be ascertained; the population of towns subject to loss, on their representation, must be computed, so as to have the ratio increased to such an extent as to keep the number below the maximum. It is more complicated—infinite more so, than any system we have yet had, as experience will show, if it is adopted, and decidedly more complicated than the present system.

Again, it is suggested by the gentleman from Erving, that there is a great loss by fractions under the present system. He made out the loss to be 140,000. Now, I take it for granted, that we do lose by the present system, and I am willing to take the estimate at 140,000. I have made an estimate of the loss by fractions under the system proposed by the gentleman from Lowell, and I find that the loss by fractions is nearly double what it is under the present system. I have all the details, and they are more surprising than the aggregate. I find that, according to the proposition of the gentleman from Lowell, the loss, in the aggregate, will be 277,060, nearly double the loss by fractions under the present system.

But I ask the attention of the Convention for a moment or two to the details of this comparison. Where does the loss chiefly fall under the system now proposed? In general terms, I may say that two hundred and eleven towns, entitled to one representative each will lose in the aggregate 205,089, making a fraction of nearly one thousand on an average, for each town; while the city of Lowell, which sends eight representatives, loses only a fraction of six hundred and twenty. If this is equal representation I must confess I have not been able to understand it. Lowell seems to be entitled to the lion's share in the system proposed by the gentleman from Lowell, as the county of Franklin was in that proposed by the delegate for Erving. Lowell loses by a fraction, only 620, while the two hundred and eleven towns which send only one representative each, lose nearly one thousand each, or almost double what is lost by Lowell, which sends eight.

To carry the matter further;

Boston, having	28 Reps.	has a fraction of	1,788
Lowell, "	8	"	620
Salem & Roxbury,	5	"	3,264
Five cities, having	4	"	15,877
Seven towns, "	3	"	11,635
Thirty towns, "	2	"	38,787
Two hundred and eleven towns one each,			205,089
			277,060

The Convention will see that the middle sized towns, sending but two representatives, and those smaller, sending only one, lose almost the whole. They lose, in the aggregate, more than 240,000, more than 100,000 above the amount lost by the present system, in all the Commonwealth, according to the statement made by the delegate for Erving. And yet this plan is put forth on the ground that there is a great loss by fractions under the present system. Gentlemen will see that there is nothing gained by the system proposed by the gentleman from Lowell, in respect to losses by fractions. Nearly all the loss will fall upon the small towns, and it will greatly exceed the present loss. I submit, that it is no improvement over the present basis in this particular.

Then there is another objection to the present plan, suggested by the gentleman for Erving. I refer to his objections because he stated them with more particularity than other gentlemen have stated theirs. The objection is, that all the towns are not represented. This, I think, is a very serious objection to any system. I agree in what has been said as to the right of every portion of the community to be represented every year. I believe it is their right, and I think it is the duty of this Convention to make such a provision, that every portion of the Commonwealth shall be represented on the floor of the House of Representatives every year. I do not know by what right the majority of this Convention may prescribe that any portion of the people shall not be represented half the time. I do not see the philosophy of the principle, or the justice of the doctrine upon which such a system is supported. But does the proposition, submitted by the gentleman from Lowell, obviate the objection to the present system entirely, in this respect? I do not know the precise number of the towns which are entitled to representation by their fractions; I know, however, that under the present system it is larger than it would be under the system proposed by the gentleman from Lowell. But, if the principle is bad in one case it is just as bad in the other. The plan submitted by him does, perhaps, obviate the evil in a measure, but it permits the pernicious principle still to remain as a portion of the Constitution of the Commonwealth. As a member of the legislature in 1839, when the present system was discussed and adopted, I voted for it; but it was under a sort of necessity and as a matter of compromise. I am not now prepared to vote for any system, either that proposed by the gentleman for Erving, or that proposed by the gentleman from Lowell, which shall deprive any portion of the Commonwealth of representation every year. I think the basis of representation ought to be so arranged, that the right of every person to representation, every year, shall be secured.

The proposition of the gentleman from Lowell, does, in a measure, correct that evil in the present system; but it still leaves some 45,000 inhabitants unrepresented half the time. The same objection exists, then, to the proposition of the gentleman from Lowell as to the present system, and I do not see that the amendment is any better in principle, in this respect, than the present system.

Another objection is, that the votes of the people do not have an equal force. The same remarks, just now made, with regard to the objection that all are not represented, apply here. The amendment now proposed, contemplates that there shall be a provision in the Constitution by which one man may vote for two or three representatives, and another, in the small towns, may vote for only one, and that a citizen of a fractional town shall only vote for a representative once in two years, or for half a representative each year, if the power is distributed over a term of ten years. It seems to me there is an inequality here; and though the proposition submitted by the gentleman from Lowell, lessens this evil in some degree, it is still permitted to remain. He proposes that in the cities districts shall be formed, and the voters have the right to vote for two or three representatives. Under this system, as now, there will be a very unequal power exercised by the voters. One person will have a right to vote for three representatives, another for two, and another for only one, and another for one every other year. I think the present system is obnoxious to this objection, and that a citizen of Boston ought not to have a right to vote for forty-four representatives, while I have the right to vote for but one. I know of no rule of logic or mathematics by which these capacities can be reduced to an equal power. But the objection applies to one system as well as the other, and if the principle is wrong in the present Constitution, it is equally wrong in the system proposed by the gentleman from Lowell; and, although his plan reduces the evil, it is still objectionable in principle.

Then, again, it is objected that by the present

Wednesday,]

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.—HASKELL.

basis all the power will be absorbed by the large towns and cities. Why so? Not because the principle is wrong? The gentleman from Northampton, (Mr. Huntington,) and others who have stated this objection, have complained of the result, but have not objected to the principle or claimed that it is not equal, for if it is unequal it is clearly so to the disadvantage of the large towns only; and, Sir, when it was adopted in the legislature of 1839, the gentleman from Boston, whom I do not see in the hall, (Mr. Gray,) objected that it was prejudicial to the rights of the city.

But it is said that the results are different from what was contemplated, and that its operation was not understood by its framers. I believe the legislature that passed it discussed it for a long time, and I think that they understood it as well as gentlemen here who have condemned it so severely. It was before that legislature for several months and thoroughly considered; and it was finally carried, as the gentleman from Northampton (Mr. Huntington) has said, as a compromise between the opinions and wishes of the city and country members.

But it is said that, by the present system, the large towns will absorb all the electoral power. Why so? How? Only by the increase of population. Well, ought not the power to go where the people go? I have been used to hearing the doctrine taught, and especially by the teachers of democracy throughout the Commonwealth, that the power resided in the people, that it is inherent in the people, and derived from the people. I do not know what consistency there is in conduct which undertakes to exclude the people from the exercise of that power, or how the action of any political party, which professes to act in accordance with this principle, can prevent the power from going where the people go. If it is inherent in the people, it must go where the people go, and dwell where they dwell, whether it be in town or city. By the very great increase of population in the cities and large towns, it seems to be feared that they will absorb all the political power in the Commonwealth, and acquire a majority of the representation in the House of Representatives. There is a limit to this. Boston cannot double her resident, domiciled population. Her limits forbid it. Already she begins to overflow. A large portion of her population is already seeking its abode in the surrounding towns, not only in the suburbs but in more remote localities.

Almost all the future increase of the population in the Commonwealth must be in the middling sized and small towns. By the basis adopted in 1839 there is an inequality, and it is against the cities. By the basis then adopted, a town of 1,200 inhabitants was entitled to one representative; one of 3,000 inhabitants was entitled to two, and so on. Thus, by a sliding scale and different ratio for the small and large towns, the disparity of representation increases, to the disadvantage of the large towns as the population increases.

It starts with a disparity of 1,200 to 3,000, (one to three,) and these numbers are to be increased together by a uniform percentage. It must follow, that as these numbers of 1,200 and 3,000 are augmented the disparity increases.

Suppose that in 1860, or 1870, or 1880, the population of the State should be double the amount that it was when the ratio was fixed in 1840. Then twenty-four hundred will be the number which will entitle any town to one representative every year, and seventy-two hundred to send a second representative. The small town must gain 1,200 to retain its one representative, and the large town must gain 3,600 to retain its two representatives, and so on. That is the only inequality after all. A large town will have to gain two inhabitants to get an additional representative, or hold its number; whereas a town which has only one representative, or a fractional representation, has to gain one inhabitant only to retain its representation. The large towns and cities will have to increase twice as fast as a small town to maintain their relative position. How is this objection, as to the absorption of power, obviated by the proposition of the gentleman from Lowell? He limits it so that there is no danger of the large towns gaining too much power. That is effectually guarded against. But the predominance of the small towns is just as effectually secured. The proposition as to the large towns is, that "in all the apportionments after the first, the numbers which shall entitle any city or town to two, three, four, or more representatives, shall be so adjudged, in proportion, as hereinbefore provided, that the whole number of representatives, exclusive of those which may be returned by towns of less than one thousand inhabitants, and towns incorporated after this provision is adopted, shall never exceed three hundred and seventy."

Now, Sir, what will be the effect of this provision? Will it prevent the accumulation and absorption of power in some portions of the Commonwealth, at the expense of other portions? I find, upon the basis submitted by the gentleman from Lowell, that forty-six cities and towns, entitled to more than one representative, will send one hundred and forty-seven representatives, according to the first apportionment; and there are sixty-four towns which will, at first, be entitled to but thirty-two representatives, but which will, undoubtedly, become large enough in population, before long, to entitle them to one representative each; which result will take them from the exception as to the maximum, and it will require thirty-two representatives more to supply their constitutional quota; and then there are seven towns, incorporated since 1850, for which no provision is made, as I understand, in the proposition submitted by the gentleman from Lowell, and which are not in the exception as to the maximum of three hundred and seventy. That will make thirty-nine rights of representation hereafter to be provided with representatives, and the representatives to supply which, must be taken from the three hundred and seventy now granted to the large towns and cities. But the provision is, that they must be taken from towns entitled to two or more, and these thirty-nine must therefore be taken from the forty-six towns and cities having one hundred and forty-seven representatives; and that will cut down the number, one hundred and forty-seven, to one hundred and eight, leaving to such towns and cities, having more than one-half the population, but little more than one-fourth of the representation. The large towns and cities will then, in the course of time, and that not far distant, be deprived of a large amount of their representation, and it will be awarded to the smaller towns which have succeeded in mustering one thousand inhabitants. The objection of the gentleman for Erving, that by the operation of the present system, the power is to go to the large towns and cities, where the population has been tending for many years past, is, after all, more than counterbalanced by a similar objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Lowell. The political power, by that system, is going to the small towns, and the injustice will be done to the large towns and cities, which may have increased in a greater proportion than the small ones. I submit, that there is no improvement here; that the political power is going from the many to the few, from the large towns to the rural districts, and the very small towns, which contain only one thousand inhabitants. It is more unequal, in my opinion, than the present basis can ever be.

But, Sir, the objection that the amendment submitted by the gentleman from Lowell, will be ineffectual to obviate the difficulties which exist in the present system, is but a small part of the objection which I have to this amendment; this is a trifling objection, compared with the objection which, to my mind, will be, of all others, the one that will have most influence against that proposition in the minds of the people; and that is, it does not reduce the size of the House. Now, Sir, I think I know something of the desire and expectation of the people in that part of the country in which I reside, both of the large towns and the small towns, as well in the rural districts as in the cities; and although I do not wish to make any prediction with regard to the matter, as the gentleman who sits near me, (Mr. Keyes,) often does—and if I could succeed in making predictions as well as he does, I certainly would make the attempt—yet I may be permitted to express the opinion, that whatever basis of representation may be adopted by this Convention, and submitted to the people, if it does not reduce the number of the House materially, it will be rejected by them. I think there is danger that we shall lose other desired reforms in our Constitution, if we adopt some of the propositions which have been submitted here, by a failure to meet the expectations of the people upon this point. I must confess, Mr. President, that I have been surprised by the remarks which have fallen from some gentlemen here, as to the advantage of having a large number of members in the House of Representatives. I think that those gentlemen who express that opinion cannot have been here when we have had such large houses, as I have sometimes seen; for, on some occasions there has been a great deal of inconvenience experienced from this cause, upon this floor. I have been here when there were five hundred and thirty-nine members in the House, and I would not want to come here again, if I come at all, to sit in a House of that size. There has been a change in the accommodations since that time, and the seats have been enlarged and widened, so that gentlemen do not now sit so close and crowded, by a great deal, as they did then. As to the despatch of public business, I cannot agree with those who think that it was more expeditiously or properly performed in a House consisting of five or six hundred members, than it would be in a House of only half that number. I think, Mr. President, that it is a very serious objection to the proposition now before the Convention, that it increases the number by reducing the basis. By the present existing provisions of the Constitution, the number is necessarily limited; I do not mean that there is any

Wednesday,

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.—HASKELL.

express provision on the subject, but as the ratio is fixed, it is impossible that the number should exceed certain limits. The ratio will increase just in proportion to the increase of population, which must necessarily keep it down to just about the existing number. Or, if anything, it tends to keep down the size of the House, because, as the ratio entitling a town to representation increases, the fractions may be larger, so that under the existing system the tendency is to reduce the House. But the proposition now submitted will increase the number of members something like one hundred—ninety-four—I believe; and not only that, but it prevents its indefinite extension hereafter, at least so far as the thirty-nine members from the new and fractional towns may be entitled to seats. I must confess that I not fully understand the practical operation of the sliding scale in the proposition of the gentleman from Lowell; but one thing is clear, it does not diminish the House of Representatives, or confine it to anything like the present number, but it positively increases it to something like ninety-four over the present basis. I think it is a very serious objection, when we are undertaking to make a new basis, that it should increase the number of members instead of reducing them.

There is another objection to his proposition, and that is, that it will put the government into the hands of a minority of the people of the Commonwealth. I suppose it is too late in the day—that it is quite unnecessary—for me to say, that the minority who reside in the rural districts ought not to have the whole power of the Commonwealth; no one claims that they should have it, expressly; but this system will give it to them. This plan which is proposed by the gentleman from Lowell assuredly puts the power into the hands of the minority of the people. I have looked at it carefully, and I will give the Convention the result of my investigation. I find, as I have already said, that there will be forty-six cities and towns which are entitled to more than one representative each, and which, in the aggregate, contain a population of 511,870, and which will be entitled to one hundred and forty-seven representatives. Then, Sir, if we add forty-seven to that number, for forty-seven towns which contain a population of 143,420, and which are entitled to one representative each, we shall have one hundred and ninety-four representatives for a population of 655,290. Here is more than two-thirds of the population of the State, and they would have just one less than half the representation of the State; while sixty-four small towns having a fractional representation, and one hundred and sixty-four towns choosing one representative each, with a population of only 318,426, would choose one hundred and ninety-six representatives, being a majority of the House of Representatives; and thus, as I have stated, the majority of the House would be chosen by less than one-third of the people of the Commonwealth. But I need not extend my remarks on this point; I will simply re-state these facts, in order that they may be impressed upon the minds of gentlemen of this body. I want every member of this Convention to remember that if we adopt this proposition, 318,426 of the inhabitants of the Commonwealth will choose a majority of the House of Representatives, while 655,290, or more than double that number, will choose less than half of the members of the House. This is not the whole inequality of the system, that it effectually puts the whole control of the House of Representatives in the hands of a minority of the people of the Commonwealth. I find a still greater inequality when I come to ascertain the ratio by which these different parts of the Commonwealth will be represented. Forty-six cities and towns, which choose one hundred and forty-seven representatives, will only have one representative for 3,482 inhabitants, while two hundred and twenty-eight towns, which will choose one hundred and ninety-six representatives, will have one representative to every 1,114 inhabitants. The towns which thus hold the control of the House of Representatives, and which choose a majority of its members, will thus have a representative to every 1,114 inhabitants, while the forty-six cities and towns, embracing more than half the population of the State, will only have one representative to 3,482 inhabitants—less than one-third their equal proportion with the small towns! Now, I do not wish to argue to an intelligent body like this, that such a proposition is unjust, or that it is unequal. There is no reason, I apprehend, that gentlemen can assign for such a proposition, unless it is designed to base the power of government upon something else besides the people. Unless such a principle is assumed, there is no reason whatever in giving the control of the House of Representatives to a minority of the people, and of giving the representatives of the country three times as much political power as you give those who represent the cities and the large towns.

There is another objection to the proposition,—that it violates the true democratic principle—the principle upon which the government and the institutions of our country are recognized as being founded. And in order, Mr. President, that there may be no misapprehension as to what I understand to be the democratic principle, which is the foundation of all republican institutions, I am happy to have the authority of several gentlemen upon this floor, who have laid down what I conceive to be the correct doctrine upon this subject. I am not, therefore, compelled to go back to those “fossils,” who have been alluded to as yet living among us; but I am very happy in being able to find authority for the position which I take, among the progressive democracy in this body. It has been said, Sir, upon this floor, “that the principle of republicanism is that the majority shall govern. The moment you depart from that principle and place the government in the hands of one man less than a majority, you have no republican government.”

I consider this good doctrine, and I quote it, not for the purpose of making objections to it, but I adopt it as embodying my own views and opinions upon this matter.

We have heard it said here in different quarters, that the majority should govern, and the idea has been often repeated in different forms, that the moment we depart from this principle, and place the government in the hands of one man less than a majority, we have no republican government. I believe that, Sir; and now I would inquire, if this system of representation which is proposed by the gentleman from Lowell, illustrated as I have endeavored to illustrate it by a reference to figures and to the facts, does not conflict with this principle? I cannot reconcile it with this principle at all. It appears to me that any fair exhibit of the proposition of the gentleman from Lowell will show that the adoption of that system would place the government in the hands of more than a hundred thousand less than a majority of the people of this Commonwealth; and by so doing it would be “departing from the very fundamental principle upon which a republican government is based.” There is the declaration, and I hold it to be incontrovertible, that “if we adopt a rule which puts the power into the hands of one man less than a majority, we have no republican government,” because the fundamental principle upon which it rests is departed from and abandoned. Now, Sir, I ask, whether this Convention, which claims to be a reform Convention, is disposed to take a step backwards and give this power to a minority of the people, although they may be landholders? We have more agriculturists in the town I represent than any other class; we have no manufacturing corporations there—not one, Sir; and that place has grown all that it has grown (which is very little, I admit) within the last ten years, it has managed to keep along at any rate, through the farming interest, and to send abroad its products—not of manufactures but minds—to fertilize and enrich other fields of human thought and action. I come from one of the rural districts, where, if the power is to be placed in the hands of the few, I agree it ought to be put; but is it right to give it to the few even there? There is no desire, in my judgment, in the rural districts, to have a system perpetuated which is to war with the fundamental principles of republican government; and which, as I believe, would be the tendency and effect of the introduction of any system similar to that which is proposed by the gentleman from Lowell. Another branch of the same doctrine of republicanism is as eloquently and ably laid down in the argument of the gentleman for Wilbraham, (Mr. Hallett,) before quoted. He said, “that the people may prescribe that less than a majority shall rule, is not a republican doctrine.” I agree to this. And it is a direct answer and refutation of the position taken by the gentleman for Berlin, (Mr. Boutwell,) the other day. Now, Sir, suppose that this Convention should adopt a rule that the minority of the people of the Commonwealth, living in the rural districts, and in the small towns, should have a predominant influence and vote in the legislature of the Commonwealth, and suppose that a majority of the people should assent to it; if the principle here laid down is correct, it could not be a republican government, because it is not a republican doctrine that the representatives of a minority may exercise the power to make changes in the laws even if the majority should consent to give the minority power to elect them. The executive and administrative functions of government are, of course, performed by a small part of the people; but it is the exercise of power delegated by a majority of the whole, and not a minority. But when you come to organize a body whose powers and acts affect the rights of all within the State by the exercise of sovereignty in the institution of laws for the government of all, I apprehend that that can never be justly done by less than the will and choice of a majority of the people; and that a majority of the people can not now deprive any future majority of their rights by saying that any minority may govern by the institution of laws. But that is not the only authority which I can produce among the able and eloquent speakers of this body, to prove that the system of representation which is proposed by the gentleman from Lowell conflicts directly with the principles of democratic government and our republican institutions. We have the same doctrine laid down by the gentleman from Natick, as follows:—

“Government exists by the consent of the people—the majority of the people—who alone can give their consent.

“Whenever or wherever we depart from that idea, whether we adopt the plurality rule, or any other rule which allows less than a majority to rule, we depart from that fundamental democratic principle—that American idea—underlying all our American institutions. Nor would the assent of the people to have a minority of the people govern make it any the less anti-democratic.”

I cordially agree to that doctrine; and I ask if it is not the effect of the proposition of the gentleman from Lowell to “allow less than a majority to rule?” Does not that basis depart from “the American idea underlying all our American institutions?” I have stated that the doctrine quoted is my belief exactly; and now all I ask is, that gentlemen in this Convention who have advanced such views will adhere to that principle when they come to vote upon this question. But in order to get rid of this difficulty, gentlemen tell us that if the people adopt what we do, no matter whether it places the power in the hands of a majority or of a minority, it is democratic, because the majority of the people assent to it.

I deny this proposition, Sir, altogether. Suppose we should choose an emperor, and submit our action to the people, and the people assent to it and agree to his authority, that would be a democratic and republican institution and government! That is just what the argument amounts to. The principle leads to that conclusion. Now I think that the inference based upon that argument is wholly unfounded. I fully agree with the propositions which have been again and again repeated here, that the government must rest in a majority of the people; and I ask those gentlemen who have advanced this idea, to act in accordance with it, and show, by their vote on the proposition of the gentleman from Lowell, that they mean to abide by their professions; or, at any rate, if they do not concur with me in my deductions, as to the effect of that proposition, I wish them to show how the principle and proposition can be reconciled, that we may have the benefit of the rule of their action to aid us. As it seems to me, it conflicts directly with the democratic principle “underlying” our form of government, and it cannot be denied that it gives the government to a minority of the people. I believe the most of us claim to be reformers, (and I have been classed with them); we have come here to reform the Constitution, and I believe this is one of the points where a reform is needed; and I hope, therefore, that in the formation of the fundamental law of the Commonwealth, we shall not take such a long, disproportionate stride backwards, as to let the minority of the people have the control of the legislature. I am not ready for that. I object to the proposition of the gentleman from Lowell, upon that ground, and I hope it will be rejected.

There is still another objection to it, and that is that it is unjust. It is well, Sir, for communities as well as for individuals, to look occasionally—once in a while, at least—at fundamental principles, that we may direct our steps aright, and shape our course in wisdom. If we neglect to do so, we soon wander in darkness and doubt.

Now, we all know that, owing to the peculiar constitution of this Convention, having come here, as we have, on the basis of valuation year, the small towns hold the balance of power, and control the proceedings of this body; and let me appeal to gentlemen representing those towns—is it right and just for us, from the small towns, having the power as we have here, to say to our neighbors from the cities and large towns, “you shall not have as much power in the legislature of the Commonwealth as we have?” For one, Sir, I am not ready to say this. I think the interest and prosperity of the large towns and cities are infinitely more connected with, and dependent upon, the legislation of the State, than the interest of the small towns is. We care but little if you do reduce the representation of the towns to its just and fair proportion, if you leave us the township system in all its integrity and power. And I do not consider the choosing of a representative a necessary function of a town, or a right of a municipality, as I understand it. Let all the power which we have in the legislature, be that which justly belongs to us, and it is all that we ask. For if we have the township system we can get along very well without any legislature. All the great interests of the social state would be protected, without the aid of a legislature. The country towns are not so much affected by the action of the legislature as the cities are. Indeed, we are in the habit of boasting—or I am—of our independence of the legislature of the State, and that it makes but little difference to us what they do or undo. We do not care much what goes on here generally. Now and then they pass a liquor law or a railroad loan, that excites us a little; but, with few exceptions, the proceedings of the legislature affect us but little, either for the better or worse. The great and general amount of legislation, (and a great deal too much,) is for the interest and business of the inhabitants of the cities and large towns, which are a great deal more affected by the results of the legislation of the Commonwealth in their welfare and their pursuits, than the inhabitants of the rural districts can be. Is it then just or right, for us from the rural districts, to control the legislature? Can any member from the rural districts reconcile it with his conscience, to say that these small towns shall hereafter hold and exercise the power of the House of Representatives, and that the large towns and cities shall have only one-third their equal right and power? I do not know how he can justify himself in so doing; I cannot justify myself for my part. As I said before, I hope our friends from the rural districts will look at the principles of justice and equity, rather than to political considerations and expediency, in matters relating to the important business we are now doing. I think, Sir, that it is a serious objection, that the proposition of the gentleman from Lowell will deprive a large part, the majority, of the inhabitants of the Commonwealth, according to the census of 1850, of two-thirds of their just and equal proportion of power in the legislation of the Commonwealth, when their interests are so much more affected by it than the interests of the rural districts.

But, Sir, although I am disposed to vote to make the plan submitted by the gentleman from Lowell, as perfect as possible—and for that purpose I shall vote for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Northampton, (Mr. Huntington,)—I shall vote against that and every other scheme submitted which does not tend to reduce the House, and which will not give every voter in the Commonwealth an equal power at the polls, and every part of the Commonwealth representation every year.

Mr. BUTLER. I desire to ask the gentleman if he is in favor of the present plan.

Mr. HASKELL. In preference to any other system which has been proposed, except the district system. There is another reason why I think we ought to adhere to the present system. I have already alluded to some of the proceedings and views of the legislature of 1839, upon the subject, and if the Convention will excuse me, I will detain them a single moment in regard to the manner of the introduction of the present system before that legislature. I think I am correct in the facts which I shall state, for I have referred to a memorandum which I had, to see if my memory was correct; and if I am incorrect, the gentleman from Boston, before me, (Mr. Gray,)—who was a member of that legislature—can set me right.

In 1839, it was found that the county of Suffolk had increased so enormously in wealth, that it was found to be entitled to nearly one-third of the senatorial representation of the State. The amount which it paid for public purposes, according to the valuation, entitled it to that number. The first proposition that was submitted to the legislature, in either of its branches, was one which proposed that the basis of representation in the Senate should be altered before the next census should be taken, in 1840, upon the ground that Suffolk was then, in 1839, entitled to one-third of the whole senatorial vote—thirteen or fourteen out of forty; and because, according to the estimated increase of her wealth, at the next census, in 1840, she would show a constitutional right to one-half of the Senate. I have in my hand the report of the committee on that subject, and the majority reported that it was inexpedient to alter the basis of the Senate; and the minority reported that upon the then constitutional provisions, Suffolk would have a senator for every six thousand inhabitants, and that Barnstable, with a population of thirty thousand, would not be entitled to one senator. The matter then, after having been referred to a committee, came before the House upon the report of a majority of that committee, against any change, and the report of the minority, adverse to the report of the majority. The minority reported that the basis ought to be changed in order to prevent the county of Suffolk from being entitled to nearly one-half of the whole number of senators at the next valuation. In the action of the legislature upon this subject, the proposition was brought forward, that the basis of the representation of the House of Representatives, as well as of the Senate, should be changed, and that both should be fixed upon the amount of population. This proposition was referred to a new committee, who were instructed to consider the expediency of placing both the Senate and the House of Representatives upon a population basis. I shall not attempt to go into the details of what transpired after the matter was referred to the new committee, of which the gentleman from Boston, (Mr. Gray,) I believe, was the chairman. The majority of the committee reported in favor of a system of districting—in favor of dividing the State into forty-seven districts, for the choice of as many representatives each as the number of two thousand and five hundred should be contained in the number of the whole population of the district. No town lines were crossed, and no county lines, except that the town of Chelsea was annexed to a part of our county of Essex. And both the majority and minority reports proposed a population basis for both branches. That system of districts was not acceptable to the House, and the present system was introduced by the recommendation of the minority of the committee. I will not trouble the House with any details on that point. The result of it was, that, in consideration that the county of Suffolk was deprived of more than one-half of her senatorial force, a proposition was made and adopted, that the towns should be regarded as representative districts, and that representation in both branches of the legislature should be based upon population.

The minority of the committee which reported the present system, say:—

"In advocating town representation, we have nothing to say of corporate rights. It is the people whom we would have represented, and not corporations. If our districts ought to be small—and the little we have said shows plainly that they should be—towns, on every consideration, ought to constitute those districts."

The minority of the Committee then go on to say:—"The amendment proposed by us, so far as relates to the House of Representatives, is nearly the same with that of the Convention of 1820. That highly respectable assembly, second to none which ever convened in this Commonwealth, in either talent or intelligence, in their address to the people of Massachusetts, used the following language: 'We are all agreed that representation should be according to population, in this branch.' It was the general opinion that the number should be reduced, that town representation should be preserved; &c. And again: 'We will not say that this system is the best that could be; but we may justly say that we have spared no exertion to form, and to present to you, the best which we could devise.'"

That Convention substantially recommended in 1820 the same system which now exists, with the single exception that towns not having population sufficient to entitle them to one representative, (1,200,) should have a representative each other year and be classed in two divisions, and that the House should not exceed two hundred and seventy-five. The whole tenor of the argument contained in that report of the committee in 1839, is to show that the large towns ought not to complain that they were deprived of a part of their power. They did, however, complain at the time, and there was some reason for it, though the system was not as unjust as either of the plans which are now before us.

Now, Sir, I submit that it is hardly just to say that the present system is so full of iniquity and injustice as some seem to think, when it has had the deliberate sanction of the Convention of the 1820, and of two legislatures, and of the people of the State. True, it was at first rejected by the people when submitted in 1820, but it has since been ratified by them, with a slight modification.

The point to which I particularly desired to call the attention of this Convention was this, that according to the principles upon which the Commonwealth of Massachusetts had before acted, the right of representation in the Senate according to taxation had, up to 1839, been recognized, and under it, Suffolk was entitled to one-third of the senators, and the counties of Essex and Middlesex absorbed a good proportion of the rest. It was found necessary, therefore, that the basis should be changed from valuation to population, and Suffolk, Essex and Middlesex fell in with the proposition upon the ground that these corporate rights, as they have been termed—though I take a different view of the matter from some gentlemen—were relinquished in some degree by the small towns. I, therefore, think it unjust to undertake to deprive the large towns of their right to representation according to population, since we have heretofore taken from them their rights under the old system, upon the ground that population was the proper basis.

I do not justify or defend the ancient basis of the Senate. I do not say it should have been preserved. But it was the "practice of the fathers," and was sanctified by the "usage of centuries;" it had been a part of the policy of the government from the earliest settlement of the Commonwealth, to base representation, in part, upon taxable estates; it was, in 1839, the right—the constitutional right—of Suffolk, and the wealthy counties to insist upon that basis. They held it to be as sacred as that of town representation, as it exists under this present, or as it had existed under any prior Constitution; they surrendered it for a population basis in both branches; and is it just that we should now deprive them of the benefits which fell to them, and claim those which accrued to us, under the basis thus established? I think not.

Now, Sir, I prefer the present system, in answer to the question of the gentleman from Lowell, (Mr. Butler,) unless we can have an equal system, which shall materially reduce the House—which shall give to every voter a representation every year, and a right to vote for an equal number of representatives, and by which each representative shall be the representative and exponent of the political power of the same number of population, or legal voters. Do this, and for one, I am indifferent whether these results are secured by a town or district system, or whether the districts are large or small, or whether representation is based upon population or upon legal voters; though, I think, the latter the proper basis for representation in both branches of the legislature.

Mr. HUNTINGTON, of Northampton. I merely wish to say, that when I was upon the floor before, I expressed an inclination to withdraw the amendment which I offered last evening. I assigned the reason for it, and that was, that in the first place, when I offered the amendment I thought it might present a test question as to the number which should be required to entitle a town to one representative, whether it should be one thousand or twelve hundred. Upon reflection, as there are plans before the Convention which contemplate a higher number than twelve hundred, as it is more parliamentary to take the question upon the highest number first, and as I have another proposition, which is in the hands of the Convention, and which I may offer hereafter, I have concluded to withdraw the amendment, and leave the question to be taken upon the Report of the Committee.

Mr. MARVIN, of Winchendon. I have a proposition which I desire to submit, but I do it with a great deal of diffidence, because I am entirely unused to the course of legislative proceedings, and because I am surrounded with men of such great experience and reputation, that anything which they offer will be received with a degree of respect, which cannot be hoped for in relation to anything which may come from me. I may, however, ask for the candid attention of the Convention for a few moments, although what I have to offer may not be recommended by experience or influence acquired in public bodies.

A very distinguished teacher, Dr. Dwight, being asked what his rules were in governing the schools and higher institutions under his care, answered that he never had but one rule, and that was to meet every case as it came up, and deal with it in the best way that he could. His rule was to use his common sense, and do right in every case. That was the only general rule. Now we have gentlemen here, who have some great rule or principle which they wish to drive through, and regulate every thing by. But I believe that it will be found here, and in legislation generally, that there is but one general rule never to be departed from, and that is, in moral questions, that we should do right, and in practical matters, when we cannot do exactly right, do as nearly right as we possibly can.

Some wish to have the State districted, because there is a great principle involved in it; but that principle subjects the small towns to the larger. Others wish to have all the towns represented every year, because there is a great principle at stake; but that principle gives the towns uncontrolled power and swamps the cities. I suppose both of these great principles, so called, have already been rejected by the Committee, and the conclusion we have come to, is, that there must be a compromise, while the great principle upon which we shall be compelled to act, is, to do as nearly right as possible.

I now wish to introduce an amendment to the amendment now before us. It is, one, I may say, which has been seen by several gentlemen who represent the small towns, and it has been examined by some gentlemen, in whose judgment this Convention has great confidence, and they say it is a proposition which will be more just in its operation, than any before us.

The amendment which I propose to submit is the following:—

Strike out from Mr. Butler's amendment all the paragraphs before the word Resolved, except the second, and insert the following:—

Each town having five hundred inhabitants and less, shall be entitled to five Representatives in ten years.

To all towns having between five hundred and fifteen hundred inhabitants, an additional Representative, every ten years, shall be given for every two hundred additional inhabitants.

Each town having between fifteen hundred and four thousand inhabitants, shall have one Representative annually.

Each town having between four thousand and eight thousand inhabitants, shall have two Representatives annually.

Each town or city having between eight thousand and twelve thousand inhabitants, shall have three Representatives annually.

Each town or city having between twelve thousand and sixteen thousand inhabitants, shall have four Representatives annually.

Each town or city having between sixteen thousand and twenty thousand inhabitants, shall have five Representatives annually.

Each town or city having between twenty thousand and twenty-six thousand inhabitants, shall have six Representatives annually; and each additional six thousand inhabitants shall entitle any town or city to an additional Representative.

Each town having less than fifteen hundred inhabitants, shall have one additional Representative every ten years, for valuation year.

Giving to these 129 towns an additional representative, valuation year, would give an annual average addition of thirteen representatives, nearly. The total annual representation from 129 towns having less than 1,500 inhabitants would amount to 100½.

Allowing each of the 146 towns containing between 1,500 and 4,000 inhabitants, to have a representative annually; it would give 146 representatives. The ratio of increase is 2,500.

Allowing each of the thirty towns containing between 4,000 and 8,000 inhabitants to have two representatives annually, it would give sixty representatives. The ratio of increase is 4,000.

Let each of the seven towns or cities containing between 8,000 and 12,000 inhabitants, have three representatives annually; that would give twenty-one representatives. The ratio of increase is 4,000.

Let each of the four cities containing between 12,000 and 16,000 inhabitants, have four representatives annually; that would give sixteen representatives.

Let each of the three cities containing between 16,000 and 20,000 inhabitants, have five representatives per annum; that would give fifteen representatives.

Now, I submit, that this is a fair plan, substantially like that we have adopted, but improved a little in detail; and if this matter is to be recommended to a Committee, and if the whole of these plans which have been proposed are to go there, I want to go with the rest. This plan, it will be perceived, will be favorable to the small towns; but I think it is the policy of the Convention to give them some advantage in the House of Representatives, because the cities have much advantage out of the legislature.

There is one point bearing on this general question which I desire briefly to notice. It has been several times brought up here, and I have never heard a reply. As I have not heard all the debate upon this question, it may be that I shall go over the same ground that others have in advertising to it. The plan of town representation has been compared to the rotten borough system in England. Now, Sir, I want to know what system this Convention could possibly adopt which would reduce the towns of Massachusetts to a system of rotten boroughs, like those in England, or which could bring them within the range of comparison? And if it were true, would gentlemen accomplish any object by making the comparison? Would such a comparison do any good, or have any tendency to conciliate? What is a rotten borough in England? Does it require a few people, or many, to make it a rotten borough? Is a small borough rotten while a large one is sound? I understand, that a rotten borough, in England, is one where the lands and houses are in the hands of a single person, or a few persons. When one of the ancestors of William Pitt returned from Madras, with his great diamond, he bought up two of those boroughs, and by controlling the electors, was enabled to return himself to parliament from one, and to secure a seat for his eldest son, his brother, or his creature, from the other. Lord Clive, who came home rich from India, bought up several of these boroughs, and thus secured a strong parliamentary interest. Many other nabobs followed his example. Besides, many of the peers, and other landed gentlemen, owned boroughs by hereditary right, and thus controlled those electors who were their tenants.

Such is the rotten borough system in England. Now, is there anything like that in Massachusetts? Is there anything like that in this country? Are the towns of Massachusetts rotten boroughs in this sense? Are they owned by any one or two individuals who control their elections? Are they similar, by any manner of means? No, Sir, they are owned by the people who live in them; by the farmers, the mechanics, the merchants, and others. They are generally divided off into small farms, and every man, almost, owns one of these farms, and the elections are controlled by the free choice of a majority of the people. There is, therefore, no sort of resemblance between the two. But if there was a rotten borough in Massachusetts, I will venture to say it would be owned in Boston. This remark is not made to provoke any gentleman from the city of Boston. If such a state of things should take place, it would be no fault of her citizens, it would rather be to their credit. The wealth of the city is increasing very disproportionately to the increase in the country. To this increase there can be no objection. With an increase of wealth will come an increase of influence, and there can be no objection to that; and when I say, that if there is now, or ever will be, a rotten borough in the State of Massachusetts, it will be owned in the city of Boston, I do not say it for the purpose of creating a jealousy between the city and country. However, I do not believe the delegates from Boston, who are so ready to defend their city, have any strong objection to these comparisons being made between the relative wealth, influence and prosperity of the city and the country, as it gives them such a fine opportunity to set forth the praises of Boston. I am reminded of a picture, with a bit of description to it, which was hung up in our print shops a few years since. It represented a French girl who had a beau. There were several other girls around, teasing her about him, at which she affected great indignation. Seeing this, they left off their banter, when she cried out, "tease me more!" [Laughter.] I very strongly suspect that such would be the result with the Boston delegates, if we should cease talking about the wealth and influence, and political power of their constituency. Sir, I hope Boston will go on increasing in wealth, in population, and in power. I hope her new library will increase, until it becomes the largest library in the country, and rivals the great libraries of the Old World. I hope the Athenæum, with its galleries of painting and of statuary, may increase, until it shall attain sufficient attractions to keep our young men of genius at home, and attract the sons of genius from other countries here. But what is the effect of this great increase of wealth, learning, and population? The greater their increase, the greater will be the political influence and power of Boston; so that it is necessary for the small towns to secure their interest in the legislature, before there is an overwhelming power to prevent them. And there can be no just cause for jealousy against the country towns, because they desire to secure for themselves a proportionate power and influence in your House, in respect to representation. They think it is only what they are justly entitled to, and therefore they come forward in this Convention and claim it as their right.

Again, if you will allow me, Sir, to allude once more to the comparisons which have been made between the city and country, I think there is at least as much intelligence and democratic spirit in the country as in the city. Gentlemen have said that there was more of the democratic spirit in the city than in the country. It is not so in our country, however it may be elsewhere. In England, the princes, the barons, and the rich men, who live in the city, have country residences and estates, and it is there that they exert their influence; and therefore, so far as politics are concerned, there is more of aristocracy and less of democracy in the counties than in the city. But it is not so in Massachusetts. The Boston merchants and bankers cannot go out into the country and buy up large estates, and live upon them, and control the elections in the places where they live. There are but few of the princely men, doing business in Boston, who live in the country. So that there can be no comparison in this respect, between the state of things in England and in Massachusetts. In England, there is more of the democratic spirit and principle in the cities, and more of the aristocratic spirit and principle in the country; but here the case is precisely the reverse. It seems to me, therefore, that there is no occasion to draw comparisons of this description between England and Massachusetts, unless it is by way of contraries.

Now, Sir, I hope the plan I have indicated will commend itself to the good sense of this Convention. As I remarked before, there is no substantial difference between it and the plan submitted by the gentleman from Lowell. It is only a modification of that plan. It seems to me that it need give rise to no jealousy upon the part of the people of Boston. The very fact of the presence of the legislature in Boston gives that city a very great advantage over the other portions of the Commonwealth. The people of Boston are in constant communication with the members of the legislature, and in this way they are constantly modifying their opinions. They are constantly shaping the opinions and the course of the country representatives by means of the press, and their means of diffusing information through the State are much greater. Here in the city you can tell what towns will be likely to return majorities for any particular party, and you are able to send out lecturers into every part of the Commonwealth, and you have the money to spend in bringing out the voters to the polls whenever it is desirable to change the result. So that although you did not elect a single representative from Boston, you would, perhaps, have fifty members returned from other parts of the State devoted to its interests. I do not mean that this result would be secured by bribery, but through your influence, nevertheless. I, therefore, hope that all jealousy between the city and country, if there be any, will be discontinued and will be left out of the question in the settlement of this subject.

Mr. WHITNEY, of Boylston. There has been much said in this Convention, and many speeches made by various gentlemen, in favor of reducing the House of Representatives. Now, Sir, I want to say a word in favor of a large House. Some gentlemen think that the House should be reduced to one hundred and fifty or two hundred members. Now, Sir, it seems to me that this proposition is to reduce the representation, here, of your farmers and mechanics, and to increase the number, relatively, of the lawyers and professional men. I would not say precisely that there should be no attorney elected to the legislature, as was provided on one occasion in the early history of our institutions, but I certainly do desire to provide that the attorneys shall not predominate in the House.

By the way, it has been taken for granted here, that if you provide for small Houses, you will secure a greater proportionate amount of talented men there; that although you will have less in number the material will be fewer. Well, Sir, I am afraid it would be in this case very much as it is in our business transactions, if you get fine material you will have to pay a high price for it. You cannot expect to go to one of your stores and get cloth worth ten dollars a yard for two dollars a yard. And to carry out the comparison, I think the expense would be about the same to have one hundred and fifty members at four dollars a day, as it would to have three hundred members at two dollars a day.

Now, I want to ask the representatives from the large towns—and you can always tell whether a man represents a large town or small one, by the speech he makes. Every man calculates the effect every proposition will have upon his own particular town, and favors or opposes it in proportion to the number of representatives it will give that town. I say I want to ask these gentlemen how they will demonstrate to us that the small towns will be the gainers on the whole by a small House? They say we shall be compensated by a larger relative power when we are represented. Well, Sir, we do not regard that as compensation. I happened, not long since, to call upon an old gentleman in the town in which I live. Said he: "I am glad you have called. I hope you will not agree to any system of district representation. I had rather be represented three times in ten years than not to be represented at all." Now, Sir, here is a proposition brought in, to give each of the small towns three representatives in ten years, and if we are to yield that, I see not why it will not go further, and that we shall have a proposition brought in by and by, by which we shall be represented once in ten years. I tell gentlemen that is a compensation that we do not like. It may be true that it is better to be represented three times or once in ten years, than not to be represented at all, but I do not think we should submit to either. Mr. President, are we to surrender at discretion? I ask the farmers in this Convention if we are to surrender at discretion. In my opinion we had better have your system of representation as it is, and preserve what we already have.

I desire to say one word about centralization. We have been challenged to give any definition at all of centralization. I do not know that I can define it better than by saying that it is the absorbing of power by large masses in central governments. It is the power by which the government will send out and seize upon whatever men they choose to take and send them into interminable slavery without trial by judge or jury. That is what I call centralization of power. It is the absorption of the powers of small towns by the large ones, as in Boston for instance. By this, I do not mean to say that Boston shall not have its fair chance in the representation of the people, but this large mass of 150,000 people here can do as they please, no matter what the law is. They will have their own way, and the rights of free speech and the free press have been trampled under foot time and time again, in this city. I have been present at meetings when my rights were trampled under foot. I considered that I had a right to come to this city and hear one of the most eloquent men that ever ventured to speak upon great national subjects, and yet I could not hear one word of what was said by this most eloquent man on account of the clamor and noise made by those who were endeavoring to suppress free thought and free speech. I say that such an influence is centralization of power, for it does what it will, despite the law. The legislature of Massachusetts have passed a law regulating the sale of intoxicating liquors, yet it cannot be enforced here. I say then let us not yield what little power there remains to us. The danger which I fear the most proceeds from this centralizing influence. I say that I fear it, because if men can come in here and take whom they will they can come in and take me. I thank the eloquent gentleman from Boston, (Mr. Choate,) for introducing a principle which is not often introduced into political matters, and that is, "that we should do unto others the same which we would that they should do unto us." Some of us know no other rule than this. We should all look with abhorrence, and only abhorrence, at the fact that another man who may be a little whiter or blacker than we are should be taken from Massachusetts and consigned to everlasting slavery, without being tried by twelve men good and true, to say whether or not he has a right to have a place as a freeman upon the soil of Massachusetts. This is what I call centralization, and what I fear. It is the great question that now agitates the nation and the world, and we must use our best endeavors to guard the Commonwealth against the danger to be apprehended from this centralizing influence.

I hold we can do that better by standing where we are upon our present representation than to be absorbed in districts, where I take it we can be easily managed. I hope therefore that the farmers, the mechanics, and all good men upon this floor will stand by their rights, and manfully maintain them. If we must be absorbed let it be done inch by inch, and let us contend every inch of ground.

Mr. FRENCH, of New Bedford. I have listened to this debate with a great deal of interest. Certain gentlemen have discussed this subject most ably and eloquently, and from the opinions expressed on all sides I am inclined to think that we may very soon come to a result. There are a great number of propositions in regard to this matter of representation now before the Convention, and some of them differ widely from each other. I cannot subscribe to the proposition of the gentleman from Lowell, (Mr. Butler,) now under discussion. I am satisfied, though very many gentlemen might vote for it, that a better plan might be submitted to this Convention than that—one that would unite a larger vote, prove more satisfactory to ourselves, the country, and the large cities and towns. The plan proposed by him seems to be unequal. We must expect some inequality, for I am greatly in favor of town representation. I could wish that every town in this Commonwealth might have a representation every year, were it practicable. The present system of giving twenty-six representatives to a county having 30,000 or 31,000 inhabitants, and only twenty-eight representatives to a county having 75,000, seems to be a little unequal. Besides, one county having 30,000 or 31,000 inhabitants has twenty-six representatives while another, having 31,900 inhabitants, has fourteen representatives. It seems to me, that it would be well to recommit this whole subject, with all the various plans which have been submitted. Farther discussion upon this subject can do no good, and will bring us to no better result. It seems to me if we will simply refer this whole subject with all the plans to a Special Committee consisting of one from each county, with instructions to report at an early period, no matter how early, to-morrow if they please, that they will be able to devise a plan which will be more satisfactory to us and the Commonwealth. I therefore hope that this motion will prevail, as such a Committee would have before them all the plans, tables, and figures which have been presented before us, and they would have the benefit of the able and lengthy discussion that we have had to guide them in the discharge of their duty. I intend to make the motion to recommit this subject to a Committee of one from each county.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.—GILES.

Mr. GILES, of Boston. I favor the object of the gentleman from New Bedford, (Mr. French,) if it be the sense of the Committee to recommit at this time. I thought he took his seat without making the motion he intended, and that was the reason why I arose. But as the floor has been yielded to me, I say now that I should be in favor of a recommitment of this subject to a special committee of one from each county, or a committee formed in any way agreeable to the Convention, who should consider all the plans and endeavor to reconcile and eliminate such an one as should receive the approbation of a large majority of this Convention. While I have the floor, I will say a few words upon this subject, and before I am done, if the gentleman from New Bedford desires it, I will make the motion which he intended to make. Until yesterday, I had made up my mind to listen in silence during the progress of the discussion, and watch, in a friendly spirit, all the propositions that should be offered, intending to vote for anything that I conscientiously believed to be an improvement upon the present system. The district system which I approve, was rejected by so decided a vote, early in the debate, before I had an opportunity to speak upon it, that I concluded not to speak upon the subject at all. I adhered to that conclusion until the vote yesterday, by which the proposition of the gentleman from Lowell, (Mr. Butler,) was adopted. That vote encouraged me to hope for some substantial improvement of the present system in a direction towards the district system. The speech of the gentleman from Ipswich, (Mr. Haskell,) has increased my disposition to say a word upon this subject, and increased my hope of a good result. We are not in a position to reject everything, unless it meets entirely our approbation, because we have a system now to which we all object, and which we all desire to improve, and we must vote for something as an improvement, or adhere to the present system, and, therefore, we are not in that position which will enable us, as between two evils, to do according to the old maxim, naturally to choose neither; but we are compelled, between two evils, to choose the least. Therefore, if the amendment of the gentleman from Lowell, (Mr. Butler,) which has been adopted, shall eventuate in anything which I can deem a substantial improvement upon the present system, I shall go for it, though it does not square entirely with what I believe to be right and desirable. I am willing to do so. I would say that I think it is the duty, and I am happy to see that it has been the disposition thus far, on the part of the Convention, to receive all these propositions made by various gentlemen in a friendly spirit. I believe all the propositions have been offered with a sincere desire to make,—and a belief on the part of the gentlemen who have offered them,—that they made a substantial improvement upon the present system, and, therefore, they have all been received in a friendly spirit. At the same time, I wish to be at liberty to express my views and principles, without being thought to criticize harshly any plan before us.

What is the evil which now exists in regard to this matter, and what have we to do in reference to it? For what have the people sent us here in regard to this matter of representation? The first evil complained of, is that the House of Representatives is too large. The maximum now may be 445. Large and small are relative terms; but, I think, it is a fixed fact, that a House, the maximum of which may run up to 400, is, in the judgment of the people of the Commonwealth, too large a House. That is the first evil which is, to be feared, and we must devise a plan that shall remedy that defect. No plan is perfected to that extent which I believe it should be, until it does remedy that defect. What is the second evil? It is this, and it touches a matter of principle, that, under your present system, at this moment, one hundred and thirty-nine of your towns are disfranchised. They have not a constant representation which of right they are entitled to have. I say it is a right of every inhabitant in Massachusetts to be constantly represented. This is a thing which the people want and which they will have. It is a thing that they ought to have, and which we are bound to give them. Through the kindness of the officers in the treasury department, I have a list, taken from the pay-roll of all the towns that have failed in representation for the last thirteen years. I do not feel at liberty to ask the Committee to print it, though it affords information, which is worth printing. It is a formidable list, making seven large folio pages of tables and columns, and it shows that there were 1,035 towns which failed in being represented from 1840 to 1852, inclusive.

But, at the same time, the friends of the district system may say, you are taking the representative power from us and locking it up. Our friends in the country do not use it, and it is lost to them now, practically, to a great extent. I would rather have the power used by the yeomanry of the country, even if they do it in derogation of my right, than not to have it used at all. I believe the power of representation to be good in itself, to be beneficent, and that it is to be exercised so as to improve and bless the community. Therefore, I do not wish to lodge this power in dead hands, under the mortmain principle, where the land of England once went. Now I accord to the plan which the Convention adopted in Committee yesterday much merit. I believe it to have been made, in good faith, to improve the present system; I believe it does improve the present system; I believe it accomplishes all, or nearly all, that can be accomplished upon that principle; but the principle I do not assent to.

Now, Sir, what does it accomplish in reference to the first evil, to wit, a large House? It does reduce the large House from its present maximum of four hundred and forty-five, to a possible maximum of four hundred and twenty-five. It does that. Practically, three years out of ten it would do more. But it does not remove that first difficulty, to wit, the large House sufficiently, in my judgment, to go before the people and say to them: we have remedied that evil. I think the people will turn upon us and say that we have not, that they sent us here to reduce the House and we have not done it. Therefore, I wish to see that plan, if it is to be adhered to, so far perfected as to reduce the possible maximum. I am willing that the House should range somewhere near three hundred in number, and I should be glad not to have it go beyond three hundred and twenty. I think that eight representatives to one senator would make things safe, and sound, and pure.

In reference to the second evil: does it enfranchise all your towns which are now disfranchised? Does it give to every man who is an inhabitant of Massachusetts a constant representation? No, Sir, it does not. Of the one hundred and thirty-nine towns now disfranchised it will enfranchise all but sixty-four, and leave them in precisely the same predicament in which the one hundred and thirty-nine are now left. It does not, therefore, completely cure that evil, and that is an evil, in my judgment, of principle. One word upon that principle. As far as the future growth of the population is concerned, the plan, as it now stands,—and I understand my friend from Lowell is in favor of improving it, if it can be done in his judgment, and therefore he will not take my criticisms in an unfriendly spirit, for they are not meant so,—the plan, as it now stands, says, that as to future growth, every inhabitant in sixty-four of your smallest towns is but a sixth part of a man, as compared with the inhabitants in two hundred and twenty-two other towns; and it says to the inhabitants of twelve of your largest towns and cities, that five of them shall count as only equal to three, as to future growth; that five of their future increase of population are only equal to three in the medium towns. Therefore, I say, that we fail, in the first place, to remove these two evils to a degree which I wish to see them removed, and to a degree which I believe the people of the Commonwealth demand that they shall be removed, and to a degree which they have a right to require at our hands that they should be removed. And, Sir, it cures these evils to the extent that it does go, at the expense of your twelve large towns and cities. And the question which arises in the mind is, whether that is not a greater evil than that which it removes, in enfranchising so many towns, now deprived of representation?

Now, Mr. President, in a friendly spirit, I wish to say one word upon the principle. I will not call things by party names. I wish to use the word democratic, but I wish to use it in that sense in which we are all, every man of us, democrats; to wit, in the sense that the people have the right to govern themselves, to which we all agree. Now, I cannot assent to the plan of my friend from Lowell, as it stands at present, nor unless it can be amended so that these sixty-four towns which are now disfranchised, shall be released from that inequality. I want every inhabitant of Massachusetts represented constantly. I do not look upon any one as a full man until he is. Therefore, I say, you must adopt a system to accomplish that. What is the matter, Mr. President? Are you afraid of the people? Are we, democrats, every man of us, to the back bone, in the sense I have defined the word, afraid of the people, unless they are landholders? Are we afraid of the people when they are aggregated in numbers, as in the cities? Does not your Bill of Rights say that the people have a right to aggregate themselves anywhere, at any time, expressly to address and influence the government? I go for the people, and with my friend, (Mr. Haskell,) I say I will let the people go where they please, and the power shall go with them, and the blessing of God upon it. And because they choose to live in a city I will not sunder from them the power of self-government, or because they must live in a small town, I will not sunder from them the power of self-government. My friend has said that these small towns may be represented if they will unite. True; but it takes two to make a bargain; and town A. may desire it, and its neighbor, town B., may decline; and though that power of uniting was in the Constitution of 1778, and in the amendment of 1836, and in the amendment of 1841, the towns have not availed themselves of it, because, practically, they cannot. This is the very thing we are sent here to do for them, to district them into representative districts, so that they may enjoy this right. A waiver, in law, is when a man has the sole right to decline and he does decline. That is not the case here; it requires an agreement to accomplish anything. Now, are we quite ready, Mr. President, to say that the increasing population in your large towns, your twelve largest cities and towns, and in your sixty-four smallest towns shall be considered in the ratio of five to three in the other towns. That is an ominous ratio.* Look at congress. Representation in congress is for the purpose of taxation; and the apportionment of representation among the States is based upon population; but in some of them, in making up the number of the people, there is an ominous ratio. What is that ratio? Why, that "three-fifths of all other persons shall be added"—so that five men of a certain color are equal to three, and shall be counted as three, of a certain other color.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES. — GILES.

Mr. BUTLER. If the gentleman from Boston will allow me, I would like to ask him where he finds a ratio of three to five in my plan?

Mr. GILES. I allude to the growth in the population of the towns containing between one thousand and four thousand, compared with the growth in towns containing fifteen thousand. I am treating of it in that way for the purpose of not going over the ground which has been gone over so ably by my friend on my right, (Mr. Haskell). I am considering the matter looking to the future growth, and I take round numbers because fractions are not suitable to public debate.

Now, I do earnestly desire a plan, and will, with all my power, labor and coöperate with the most benevolent and yielding disposition, for any plan, coming from any quarter, that shall reduce the House to the neighborhood of three hundred members, and shall secure a constant representation to every inhabitant of this Commonwealth. I want this Convention to go before the people with a plan which shall accomplish those two objects, and if they do so, that plan will be triumphantly adopted. I greatly apprehend that if they do not, any plan will be rejected. Though, as I have said, condemning now, as I did in 1841, the existing plan, because it disfranchises a part of your citizens, and as I am compelled to choose between two evils, I will go for the plan of my friend from Lowell, if I shall conscientiously believe it, when perfected, to involve the least of the evils, but I should, naturally, choose neither of them. Now my friend has said, and with great cogency—I hope the gentleman will not suppose that I wish to criticize his plan or the plan of any other person—that it is an easier matter to pull down than to build up. It is so. And that is the "facilis descensus" to which our republican policy is tending. It is hard to build up, I admit; and if a proposition has been adopted without reason, it is very difficult to change it by reason. A custom which has grown up inch by inch, day by day, and year by year, must be changed in the same way. All that I admit, and yet I respond to my friend when he says, "Before you condemn, produce your plan; do not say this will not do unless you have something that will; do not cry out stop in that direction unless you can point to a better course." That is just; he is right to say so.

Now, I have not turned my attention to the production of a plan until within a very short time, but I will indicate in the shortest possible outline what I would wish to see, and what I think will meet some of the desires expressed in this Convention, and avoid some of the evils. It is this: I would limit the House to three hundred and twenty. That should be a maximum, above which the House could never go. I would apportion your representation according to the inhabitants; or I am willing to say, as at present advised, according to legal voters; and I would district the State for that purpose, with no limit, except it is that you should not divide the towns having less than twelve thousand inhabitants. These should be the principles embraced in my plan, and it would not require this long agony of mathematics which we have had for three weeks past, striving to conceive and bring forth an impossibility. I say, limit your House and limit it so as to cure that evil and fix the limit so that the number shall never again rise. Then apportion your representation either upon the basis of inhabitants, which is a definite term in the Constitution, or upon legal voters. I can conceive an advantage in some instances in taking legal voters; for the people seeing that their power is apportioned upon legal voters, will take care that proper persons and none others are legal voters. Then, to save the town lines, I would put a limit incidentally, that no town having less than twelve thousand inhabitants should be divided, and that would secure your towns which have not a right to become cities, and the instant they became cities they will district themselves into wards and vote upon the principle of a general ticket.

Now, one word upon the size of the districts; and I believe these three principles, if we district the whole State, would preserve every town line, would give a convenient number of inhabitants in each district, and apportion the representatives to the entire satisfaction of the people, and to the entire justice of the case. I speak now of the substantial terms, for there always will be fractions of a hundred or so, perhaps more, in fixing the numbers. But, in looking at this document, if it should be printed, or if it should not, you will notice one or two things, which, in my judgment, have an important bearing on this matter. We have these 1,035 towns which have failed to be represented within the last thirteen years; and how has that failure ranged? I have counted up, and I will state the result very briefly. In 1840, there were thirty-nine towns which failed; in 1841, there were ten; in 1842, there were fifty-seven; in 1843, there were forty-four; in 1844, there were seventy-seven; in 1845 there were one hundred and seventeen; in 1846, there were one hundred and twenty-two; in 1847, there were one hundred and forty; in 1848, there were one hundred and twenty-six; in 1849, there were one hundred and thirty; in 1850, there were one hundred and ten; in 1851, there were thirty-three, and in 1852, there were thirty. And why did they fail? There were three causes, as I judge from these statistics, which I have had but a limited time to examine. The first and the general cause is, because the Constitution forbids them to send; it forbids a large number of these towns to send, and they cannot do it. That is an evil to which I object, and that is an evil which we must remove—we are under a political and moral necessity to remove it. The next reason why these towns have failed to send, so far as I can judge, is, that many of them voted not to send. That is a town right, but, is it one which the towns wish to preserve? Will you preserve the power of a majority of those who happen to be present in town-meeting at the moment such a vote is put and carried, to deprive the minority, or it may be the majority, of the actual voters of that town, of the right to be represented? I wish to see the Constitution so amended, that no citizen of this Commonwealth shall, behind my back, take from me the right of representation. That is wrong, and it is unjust in practice. My friend, (Mr. Wood,) shakes his head as though he thinks it is not unjust in practice. But the principle was established when the towns paid their representatives themselves, and it seemed to be no more than just, where they paid the expense themselves, that they should have the right to refuse to send if they saw fit, and thus save the money. The question was merely whether the money should come out or stay in their purse. To be sure, the towns might be fined if they refused; but that is not material to this point. Now, a district cannot disfranchise itself in that way, nor any of its members.

The other reason was,—for I find I must condense my remarks as much as possible,—that they could not elect. They tried to and could not succeed. Why could they not succeed? Because your small towns, which make up most of that roll of towns which failed to be represented; failed, before they were called upon to vote, to do certain things which must be done in order for them to have representative action. Public opinion must be conciliated and concentrated upon one man, in order to secure an election; and this must be done before the day of voting as well as at the polls. If you mean to elect a general ticket, you must conciliate and concentrate public opinion upon your candidates. If you have but one candidate, it is not so easy a matter to do that; where there is a general ticket, people of every class in the community are represented as far as possible by men of their own class, but in a small place every class wants its man, and thus they break up and divide upon so many candidates that it is a hard matter to elect a single ticket. A town which is large enough to district, is large enough to have two or three representatives; and your nominating caucus can concentrate and conciliate public opinion upon that ticket so as to carry it. Do you find Boston in that list? No! Here is a ticket of between thirty and forty. Here we go to the other extreme, from an excess the other way, because the ticket is too large, and the delegation is liable to have weak timber in it. My principle of districting, therefore, would be, to arrange it so that a ticket should not be less than three nor over five. That would give scope to arrange, and to concentrate, and to conciliate as much as was necessary before election; and it would very generally secure the success of the ticket.

I have thus hastily thrown out these views; and I think if I have accomplished nothing more, I have demonstrated a good disposition to get rid of these evils and to achieve this great boon for the people, viz., a reasonably sized House and constant representation; and I will strike hands with my friend from Lowell or any other gentleman who will submit a proposition that I can conscientiously believe involves an improvement, to any extent, upon our present system, which I do condemn, and feel a moral necessity to the extent of my power to amend. I should be in favor of recommitment, but I certainly do not desire to deprive any gentleman of the same privilege of which I have just availed myself of; and, therefore, unless my friend from New Bedford requires me to make the motion which he intended to make, I will leave it to the sense of the Convention to renew the motion for recommitment, whenever any gentleman pleases, and I will vote for it.

Mr. FRENCH, of New Bedford. If I was not understood to submit the motion, I will submit it now, that this whole subject be recommitment to a Committee of one from each county in the Commonwealth.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair did not understand the gentleman to make the motion before. The question is now on the motion to recommit.

Mr. HATHAWAY, of Freetown. I would inquire of the Chair, whether that motion is debatable?

The PRESIDENT. The motion is debatable, but the Chair will suggest, that it does not open the whole merits of the question. It is merely a motion to recommit the subject.

Mr. HATHAWAY. I will endeavor to confine my remarks to that point. I hope, Sir, that the motion of the gentleman from New Bedford will prevail. We have been almost drowned and smothered with propositions in reference to the basis of the House of Representatives. There are so many propositions, that I confess I am at a loss to know which of them all is the preferable one; but, Sir, I feel the force of a remark that was communicated to me by a friend, a few days since, which a distinguished individual, formerly President of the United States,—I allude to John Quincy Adams,—made upon a certain occasion. I feel that remark pressing upon me at this moment. Here, Sir, as to this very proposition before this Convention, I feel that there are a majority of the delegates who are opposed to us—that any proposition which may come from the small towns can be pressed here and carried, no matter how unjust. Yet here is a minority, Sir; and upon that topic I am happy to say, that a minority of delegates represent the majority of the people, and we have eternal justice upon our side, in reference to the matter of equal and fair representation. But yet I know what the vote is to be upon this question. Let me say, Mr. President, to gentlemen who press this motion to have the vote now taken, that there is behind us a power greater than them, or us; and let me say to them, that although a majority of the delegates upon this floor represent only about two-fifths of the people of this Commonwealth, while a minority here represent the other three-fifths, if this matter is pressed upon us, and a more unjust proposition in reference to representation than even the one before us is adopted by the Convention, the people have yet to pass upon it, and it is for them to judge whether it shall form a part of the Constitution of this Commonwealth or not.

Mr. President, the "Old Colony" has not been very forward in this debate. I have never before opened my mouth in reference to this subject; but, Sir, I wish gentlemen to be reminded that the "Old Colony," or Plymouth and Massachusetts Colony, which now constitute the State of Massachusetts, were once independent of each other. Jacob and Esau, however, were brethren in one family; and we happened to be the older brother. If gentlemen are disposed to press this proposition upon us to a vote now, however unjust the Commonwealth may have been towards us heretofore, they must remember that we shall not be content now to take up with a mess of pottage. I say it in a spirit of kindness, however, and a spirit of brotherly love towards other portions of the Commonwealth—I mean those which belonged to Massachusetts Colony. If this proposition is pressed upon us with too much severity, I give gentlemen notice, that all the blessing of Isaac upon his son may turn back upon them, and the yoke of Jacob may be broken. I hope, Sir, that this proposition will be recommitment, and at the same time, in reference to this matter, permit me to turn to my distinguished friend for Berlin, (Mr. Boutwell,) and refer to his argument the other day, that, although the present mode of representation and the principle upon which it rested, were unjust and unequal, yet that is no reason under heaven why it should not be continued. I am aware, Sir, that under our present Constitution it is unjust and unequal, but that is no reason why the inequality should be made greater; and unless I have very much miscalculated the proposition of the gentleman from Lowell, it carries us a step or two beyond the wrong which we are now suffering in that section of the State, so far as representation is concerned. Permit me to say, in short, that if a fair basis of representation can be adopted, upon which you will have your representatives approximating to equality,—for I do not expect that it can be entirely equal; that is impossible in the nature of things,—I shall be content with it, and will vote for it. But I shall vote against any system which, instead of approximating to equality, make it more unjust than the present system under our present Constitution.

There is one other thing which I wish to say now, as, perhaps, I shall not have another opportunity. I go against increasing the number of the members of the House. I am satisfied, however other gentlemen may feel in regard to that matter, that so far as the southern section of the Commonwealth is concerned, a large majority of the people of that section are opposed to increasing the number of the House of Representatives; and the proposition of the gentleman from Lowell does increase it.

Mr. BUTLER, (in his seat). That is a mistake.

Mr. HATHAWAY. The gentleman from Lowell says that I am mistaken; but I think I can prove that I am correct. If gentlemen will turn to document No. 12, they will find that 299 towns in this Commonwealth are entitled to send representatives annually; and of course, in ten years, if they are fully represented, they would send 2,990. The towns which are entitled to send fractional representatives, or in other words, those which are not entitled to send a representative every year, would have a right, in ten years, to send 737. Then, according to my arithmetic, if you add these two sums together, 2,990 and 737, it makes 3,727, which is the maximum of representation in this house for ten years. I am aware that the valuation year is excluded. Then, if you will just divide it by ten, you will find that the representation, annually, from all those towns, averages 372.7. All that is perfectly plain and simple. Now, the proposition of the gentleman from Lowell, as I understand it, gives us 391, and gives us somewhere about 32 or 34 more in the valuation year. I am opposed to that, for I think that the people of this Commonwealth, generally, just as much believed that the number of the House of Representatives would be reduced, as they believed that this Convention was to come together. I am confident that such was the feeling in the southern section of the State.

If this matter is recommitment, as I hope it will be, gentlemen will have an opportunity to examine the practical operation of these systems, and to offer other propositions to remedy their defects. I have a proposition which, in that case, I shall wish to submit. I have eliminated it, and drawn it up, but I have no disposition to lay it before the Convention, to take its chance with the numerous others that have been submitted, upon a question of amendment. I know what the fate of it would be; it would stand no chance at all. My proposition, if carried out, would be this—to fix a general basis, and set the maximum of representatives at 320. I confess, that if it had been left to my own judgment, I would not have gone quite so high; but, yielding to what appeared to be the sense of the Convention, I should put it at 320, and have the House based upon the qualified voters of the Commonwealth. After basing it upon the qualified voters, I would have the representatives elected by districts; and I should have left it to the Convention to say whether there should be eighty or more. I would have proposed, however, if you intend to preserve the general ticket system, that it should be general throughout the Commonwealth; and no district should ever have a right to vote for more representatives than one district should vote for in common. That would be the basis of the proposition; for, to preserve the general ticket system in certain towns, and not in others, would be manifestly unjust and unequal.

The hour of one o'clock, P. M., having arrived, the Convention adjourned until 3 o'clock.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The Convention reassembled at three o'clock.

Motion to Print.

On motion by Mr. WHEELER, of Lincoln, it was Ordered, That the list of towns, not represented for the last thirteen years, as presented by Mr. Giles, of Boston, be printed.

Upon the motion of Mr. UNDERWOOD, of Milford, the Convention proceeded to the consideration of the Orders of the Day.

Wednesday,

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.—HATHAWAY—ALLEN—EAMES.

[June 29th.

The PRESIDENT stated, that the pending question was upon the motion of the member from New Bedford, (Mr. French,) to recommit the Majority and Minority Reports on the House of Representatives, and the questions connected therewith, to a select Committee, consisting of one from each county, upon which motion Mr. Hathaway, of Freetown, was entitled to the floor.

Mr. HATHAWAY. Mr. President, when this Convention adjourned, I was saying that there were other propositions to be presented, and among the rest, I had one in reference to this matter, which, at the proper time, I proposed to submit. It is not necessary for me to state that proposition here. If this matter is recommitted to a committee, I shall take occasion, hereafter, to submit it to the Convention, in order that it may be referred to the same committee. Let me say, however, to this Convention, that quiet as we, from the Old Colony, may have been in this discussion, it has not been because we have had no anxiety upon this question, for we have been, and are exceedingly anxious that justice should be done. I stated, when I had the floor before, in alluding to remarks made by the gentleman for Berlin, (Mr. Boutwell,) he admitted that there had been a great inequality in representation, and in the distribution of political power in that branch of the government, under the present Constitution, and if so, then it follows as a matter of course, so far as the distribution of political power is concerned, that great injustice has been done to various parts of the Commonwealth; and is that injustice still to be continued, under the amendment now under discussion, and to a greater degree? Sir, it is in order to remedy that injustice, that I want a recommitment of this matter. I would by no means take a proposition still more unjust, and adopt it because it is more unjust than the provisions in the present Constitution.

Ever since the charter of 1691, under which these twin-brothers, as I called them this morning, the Massachusetts and Plymouth Colonies, were united, injustice has been done to the Plymouth Colony, and I hope it will not be continued. Let me say to gentlemen, that under the Charter of William and Mary, there were, I believe, twenty-eight assistants or magistrates to be elected. Massachusetts had at least eighteen, the Old Colony at least four, and what is now the State of Maine three, and Nova Scotia one—for the territory of all these places were included in the Charter of the Province of Massachusetts.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair would suggest to the gentleman, that the motion to recommit does not open the merits of the question to discussion.

Mr. HATHAWAY. I did not intend to go into the merits of the question generally, but to apply these remarks to show why the matter should be recommitted.

The PRESIDENT. The question is as to the propriety or impropriety of the motion to recommit. If debate upon the merits is allowed, it would be interminable, and when the Convention came to a vote, they would decide nothing.

Mr. HATHAWAY. I did not intend to trespass upon any rule of this Convention, in the remarks I was about to make. I have said something in reference to the injustice under which the Old Colony has suffered, and under which she would continue to suffer, if this proposition should be adopted, but I will restrain further remarks upon that point, if it is a subject which should not now be discussed. But, Sir, for reasons that have been stated, in the course of this debate, I feel that great injustice has been done to us, and I am exceedingly anxious that it should not be continued, but that justice should be done. Therefore I am in favor of recommitting this subject, hoping that the committee to which it shall be committed, will elaborate, as has been said, a proposition, from the light which has been thrown upon this matter, that may be acceptable to all of us, at any rate, one that will approach nearer to the principles of justice, than the one from which, under the present Constitution, we are suffering great injustice.

In reference to other matters, I restrain myself here, though I may hereafter have something to say upon the propositions which have been submitted, and upon the remarks made by the gentleman for Berlin, (Mr. Boutwell.) I had hoped that a portion of the eternal principles of justice would be dealt out to us, and that no one, living either in this or any other section of the State, would wish to ask of us of the Old Colony, that which is unjust, or require us to yield to them that which they would not be willing to yield to us. Hence, I hope the matter will be recommitment, and that all the propositions which may be presented up to the time when that Committee shall report, will be committed to them.

Mr. ALLEN, of Worcester. I cannot see that any good will result from the recommitment of this matter, which has been the subject of debate for so many days before this Convention. It will throw the whole subject back, and at some future day, when the committee shall have reported, we shall commence discussion upon it "de novo." I suggest to my friend from Freetown, (Mr. Hathaway,) that some other mode of meeting this question should be adopted. I do not belong to either of the four western counties of the State, which, it is said, will obtain an undue share of representation by the adoption of some one of the plans which have been proposed. I am disposed to examine the propositions which come from different portions of the State, and finally to accept the best scheme which may be offered. If no better plan of representation is brought forward, than that which has been offered by the gentleman from Lowell, (Mr. Butler,) I certainly may adopt his; and it seems to me, that our friends who belong to that part of the State from which the gentleman from Freetown comes, instead of intimating, as he did, that which sounds so much like nullification, should give to every scheme that may be presented here, and to those which have been already presented, that consideration to which they are entitled, and should present their own more perfect plan.

Mr. HATHAWAY. I would inquire of the gentleman what statement I made which approached at all to nullification. Surely, I intended no such language.

Mr. ALLEN. I am glad that the gentleman had no such meaning. I referred to the antagonistic position which he represented the "Old Colony" and "Massachusetts Bay" to occupy, and the intimation of some desperate remedy. What that remedy was to be was only fearfully shadowed forth, and we who were listeners, were obliged to draw from it such inferences as we could.

Mr. HATHAWAY. I ask if what I said was not true, that the majority of the delegates upon the floor of this House were not the representatives of a minority of the people?

Mr. ALLEN. Certainly, I would not question the truth of any assertion which the gentleman would make upon this floor. I know his regard for truth too well not to know that every statement which he makes is intended to be perfectly grounded in that respect.

Let me say that it is easy to object to any scheme of representation which can be offered, come from what quarter it may; but much more difficult to present a more perfect plan. I have been looking, for days, to the direction from which the gentleman from Freetown comes, for the presentation of a scheme of representation which shall be more acceptable than those which have been offered; and I now ask, that instead of recommitting this matter, they will now offer their matured plan. We will, I am sure, go into Committee of the Whole, if the gentlemen desire it, and examine the scheme which they may have to present, as a substitute for that which is now before the Convention.

Let me say one word upon the subject of the injustice of which the gentleman from Freetown has complained. He knows very well that whatever basis of representation we shall adopt, must be a matter of compromise, unless we resort to the district system, which I hope we shall not do in any event. If the gentleman will take the amendment which was offered by the gentleman from Lowell, (Mr. Butler,) and which is now before the Convention, and will take his pen and paper, he will find that that amendment gives to Plymouth County, to which he has referred, a greater proportionate representation than the county of Middlesex, almost equal to that of the county of Worcester, and more than its proportion of the representation of the whole Commonwealth if the representation were based upon population.

Without trespassing further upon the time of the Convention, I commend these suggestions to the consideration of the gentleman from Freetown, and ask him not to complain of injustice, when, as yet, no proposition coming from him, or from his friends, has been rejected, for they have given us no opportunity of passing upon them.

Mr. EAMES, of Washington. I am opposed to recommitting this subject to a special committee. I have sat here a number of days patiently, to hear what might be said for and against it. There must be some time for us to bring our deliberations to a close. It is now a little more than eight weeks since we commenced our duties in this Convention for revising the Constitution, and I cannot see that we are any nearer to the close of our labors here, unless it is that we are nearer the end of time. Now, Sir, I am willing that any person who has a plan, shall propose it, and to sit here and hear it discussed, but we gain nothing by a recommitment. This matter is as well before us as it will be before a committee. If it is recommitted to a select committee all these subjects which have been discussed in the Convention must be brought forward and discussed in that Committee, and whenever it comes into this Convention upon the Report, the whole ground will be gone over again. I hope for these reasons that we shall not recommit it, but proceed, in this Convention, to do what we have to do in regard to it.

Wednesday,

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.—BUTLER—HATHAWAY.

[June 29th.]

Mr. BUTLER, of Lowell. I trust I shall not infringe the rules of this House, so well and properly put to the Convention by its presiding officer. Although I may be strongly tempted to say a word in regard to the discursive remarks of the gentleman from Freetown, (Mr. Hathaway,) I will endeavor to make them exactly fit to the question in some one of their bearings.

He says it is best to recommit this subject to a committee of one from each county, in order to get at an equal basis of representation, or, as he expressed it, to get "eternal justice." Well, then, he says there is apparently a kind of conspiracy—for that is the fair import of his language—on the part of what was Massachusetts proper and the Old Colony.

Mr. HATHAWAY. The gentleman may use my language, but if he says that is an inference of his, and not my language, it is all very well. But if he undertakes to make the charge that I used the word "conspiracy," I should thank him to point it out.

Mr. BUTLER. I was afraid to use the gentleman's language, lest I should travel out of the rule. But as he wants his language, I will tell him what he did say. He said that the Old Colony was the elder brother Esau, and Massachusetts was the Jacob that got the brother's birthright for a mess of pottage. I remembered that Jacob and Rebecca, by a hotch-potch of kid skins and kid soup, defrauded Esau of his birthright, therefore, I came to the inference objected to. That is all. [Laughter.] Now I was not aware that Massachusetts had given any goat soup to the "Old Colony."

But what does the gentleman want? He says he wants "eternal justice" for the Old Colony, and that the various portions of the Commonwealth should be equally represented, and therefore he wants this matter recommitted to a committee composed of one from each county, in order that each portion of the Commonwealth may be equally represented in population. Now, the proposition of a committee of one from each county is much more unjust than any proposition that I have introduced here, for he proposes to put this question of representation into the hands of a committee, one of whose members shall represent the county of Dukes with a population of only four thousand, and one, and one only, of whom shall represent the great county of Suffolk, with a population of 145,000 inhabitants. He proposes to have that committee fix a basis which he expects we shall adopt, and he means that that committee which fixes the basis of "eternal justice" shall represent different portions of the State in the ratio of 4,000 to 145,000.

Now, Sir, again, he proposes that the county of Nantucket, with 8,000 inhabitants, shall stand upon this committee which is to consult upon the "eternal justice" due to Bristol, with the same power as the 74,000 inhabitants of Bristol itself.

But why did the gentleman choose counties for the basis of his committee? For the same reason that I chose towns, because they were in the habit of going together. He proposes that we should commit to a committee of fourteen, eight of whom represent only 300,000, and six of them represent 600,000 population; he proposes to give them the entire control of the eternal principles of justice, and if that is not done, why then the gentleman hints at something which sounded very much like nullification. But as the gentleman seems, by his reply to the gentleman from Worcester, (Mr. Allen,) to have forgotten after dinner what he said before, I will ask him what he did mean when he said that if they did not get "eternal justice," Esau would break the yoke of Jacob? It sounded to me amazing strange. I ask him what he is going to do with the Old Colony? Is he going back to the old colonial state? Are we to have another Hartford Convention upon a diminutive baby-like scale? Does he speak for the reform men of the Old Colony? I trust in God, not, because I do not believe there is any such feelings between the various sections of the Commonwealth.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair must remind the gentleman that he is travelling somewhat beyond the question.

Mr. BUTLER. I confess it, mea culpa peccavi, but, Mr. President, I had very strong temptation.

Now, Sir, I trust that this subject will not be recommitted. What will be the effect of it? There is this radical division between the parties in this Convention, and I hope the division is, by no manner of means, in the middle. One division is that to which my friend from Boston, (Mr. Giles;) my friend who addressed the Convention this morning from Ipswich, (Mr. Haskell,) and to which my friend from Freetown, (Mr. Hathaway,) also, are wedded; and that is the district system. A small House, and the district system, is the one side. On the other side there seems to be a disposition to stand by town representation. Here are the two extremes. Now send this subject to the Committee, and what do you get? On the one side you will have more or less of those who believe in a small House, and a basis of voters upon population. On the other side, you will have those who are in favor of town representation. Well, Sir, where are we?

This Convention, by a vote which seemed to settle the matter, if it meant anything, have determined that they will not adopt equal districts as a basis of representation, and then, on the other hand, without the offensive language of having "it crammed down our throats by the small towns," there seems to be a disposition by what I hope, is the reform party, the party of progress, in this Convention, to give town representation a prominent place in the system which we shall adopt. That is the state of things; these are the feelings of gentlemen upon one side and upon the other, and what will you gain by your Committee. That Committee will represent the same dispositions, the same feelings and views which we have here in the Convention, and why cannot we settle the matter here as well as there? I have had some little experience in this matter of compromising an important subject by means of a committee—by your kindness, Mr. President. One would not naturally suppose, that upon a committee of thirteen, there could be more than thirteen minds, still there may be. I was somewhat amused the other day by a proposition indicated by the gentleman from Lynn, (Mr. Hood,) in relation to this subject, and I suppose I may allude to it by way of illustration. He says send this subject to a committee composed of the sixteen gentlemen who have offered propositions in relation to it. Why, Sir, you might as well send sixteen babies to their mothers, and get them to make a unanimous report upon which was the prettiest. [Laughter.] One could be done as soon as the other. It is utterly impossible.

There would be no hope, no chance of agreement. And it will be precisely the same in a committee composed of one from each of the counties. You will have the same number of different minds and the same difficulty in getting them to agree upon any plan.

I listened with pleasure upon the one hand and with pain on the other,—because I knew his disposition to advance his argument upon a correct data,—yesterday, to the argument of the gentleman from Duxbury, (Mr. Weston). I concur with him entirely when he says he desires to see equal and exact justice done to all sections of the Commonwealth, and I think he will concur with me, when he comes to look at this table, that it will be of no avail to send this matter to a committee, because so far as the county from which he comes is concerned, he cannot complain of a want of a proper proportion of political power under the plan which I have proposed.

Now, Sir, I repeat, what will you gain by sending this matter to a committee? You cannot take any system that will insure perfect equality of representation, unless you take the district system, and no man believes for a moment, that the Convention will take that. Sir, I believe my friend from Boston, who spoke this morning, was wild, when he said our constituents sent us here to make a district system of representation. But, I repeat, you cannot take any system that will be exactly equal as regards population, unless you take the district system, and on the other hand, you cannot make any system that will be accepted by the people of the Commonwealth which is not commended to them by long usage, by their knowledge, by their tradition, if you please. Now, Sir, here is a system before you, for which I have no feeling of partiality, except, that I believe it is a system of compromise which will unite all the opposing and conflicting minds upon this subject that can be united by any plan. The moment you step farther than this will carry you, you will abandon town representation and adopt the district system. The moment you step farther, you have the small towns without representation, and I feel that I have a right to speak for the small towns. I am ready to yield this much to them, and in this, I know I represent the wishes of the people whom I have the honor to represent upon this floor. The people of Lowell are willing to concede this much for town representation; and the city I have the honor to represent is not by any means one of the small towns. It is as large as Freetown, if you please, or any other of your towns. And I say, to the gentleman from Freetown, and those who think with him, upon this matter, you cannot expect any support or comfort, in this Convention, or out of it, from those persons who believe in, and who are in some degree wedded to town representation. And when I say this, I trust I shall be understood as uttering no threat to any one.

Sir, I am wedded to no particular view of this matter. Give me a plan which shall seem to be better than mine, and if my scheme is not taken by the Convention I will go for it, heart and hand. I am not going to nullify and vote for somebody else, if my scheme is rejected. I have no threats to make. If my scheme is not acceptable to the Convention, give me another that shall prove a more acceptable one, and I will be found instant in season and out of season, pressing it forward. But, Sir, when I see the glistening satisfaction which I saw when this motion to recommit was brought forward; when I see such satisfaction as I saw glistening upon the face of my friend from Suffolk, (Mr. Morey,) I shall very much distrust any such proposition. I shall very much distrust it when I find that we are threatened if we undertake to carry this scheme forward, with a "power" behind us. Where is that power? Show me that power and I will vote for the motion to recommit. But I am not to be frightened by this "power" that the gentleman (Mr. Hathaway) talks of in Bristol. Sir, I repeat, what power is it? Where has it been felt? Is it that "power" which elected two governors from Bristol? Sir, we have grappled with that power, and have throttled it, so there is no trouble to be apprehended from that quarter, and therefore, I do not think I shall vote for this recommitment for fear of that "power." I am led almost to digress into the expression of a feeling of hostility towards Bristol, because of the aggravations we have had from that quarter; but, Sir, I make no such expression, for I have no such feeling.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES. — BUTLER — DAVIS.

Mr. President, as a member of this Convention from the county of Middlesex, I have laid down, I have given away more in my proposition, from the county of Middlesex, than is given up by any other proposition, from any other county in the State, and will your committee do more? Gentlemen have said that we have taken the lion's share for Lowell. Judge ye when ye look at the votes. I have given away much of the power which Lowell might justly have claimed, and will your committee do more? Sir, I will do anything for compromise and harmony, except to be threatened or to be bullied, but I will not do that, nor will I suffer it. I will not be frightened from my propriety by any such talk, and I trust gentlemen will find that it is not the best course to gain favor for their motion to recommit, by telling us that if we do not do such and such things, there is a power behind us. There is a power behind us? Aye, Sir, there is a power above us, which has watched over us day and night.

Now, Sir, I trust this subject will not be re-committed, because we have no time for it. If you appoint this committee a week or a fortnight hence, they will bring forward a proposition and the whole subject will again be opened. We shall again have the same fight for the district system on the one hand, and for town representation on the other, and we shall find ourselves, upon this subject, back where we were when we commenced. No, Sir, let us not recommit it; let gentlemen who have propositions which they desire to offer, offer them here; let us try the question, and I trust we shall find that there is no disposition upon the part of any one to do injustice.

I am glad to have my attention called to one consideration in connection with this subject. It was said, when this motion to recommit was made, that there was a disposition upon the part of the friends of town representation, to force a vote. Sir, I have admired the course which those who are the most deeply interested in town representation have taken upon this subject. The gentlemen who represent the small towns upon this floor have sat quietly and allowed every-body to talk but themselves. We have waited in Committee as long as any body would speak, or as long as any one would offer propositions, and there is certainly no occasion to recommit on that account. We have waited until no man would speak upon the question, and until we had reason to suppose there was no one behind, who would bring forward any other proposition, and could we have done otherwise under such circumstances than to have taken the vote? Sir, I do not desire to cheek discussion upon this subject. I am glad to hear any discussion upon the subject. I am glad to see any proposition brought forward, and I hope no gentleman who has a proposition which he prefers, will hesitate to bring it forward for fear it will not get votes enough. No, Sir, let us have all the propositions brought forward. "In a multitude of counsellors there is safety," and in the multitude of propositions we shall be more likely to arrive at the true one. Again, I say, let us have all the propositions brought forward. Let us not vote in the dark—but above all things, let us not recommit this subject to another committee, for fear that there is still some proposition yet undiscovered which will be brought to light and which will unite the conflicting views of the members of this Convention. I trust we shall go on with our business, otherwise the long days of summer will be over and find us here in this hall, no further advanced than we are now.

Is there a gentleman here who has not made up his mind upon this subject? If there is such a man, that is a reason why it should be re-committed. But if there is not, then I take it we have settled upon either the town or district system of representation, and what shall we gain by a recommitment? It is my most earnest desire that no man, who is favorable to this Convention, or who is opposed to it, either one or the other, will support this motion.

Mr. DAVIS, of Plymouth. It seems to me that I am called for, in some measure, as one of the members of this Convention from the Old Colony, to say a few words. I regret very much that any particular portion of the State should have been brought before the Convention, and especially so at this stage of our proceedings, upon this subject. I regretted the motion made by the gentleman from New Bedford, (Mr. French,) this morning, and I regretted more that it should have been supported by the gentleman from Freetown, (Mr. Hathaway,) in the manner in which he saw fit to press it this morning. I have no sectional interest to represent in this Convention. I hold no member responsible for the statements of another from the same, nor from a different section of the State. And for one, I did not consider, until called out by the gentleman from Lowell who has just taken his seat, that another member from the Old Colony was called upon to disclaim the threats, for I could consider them nothing else, announced to the Convention this morning by the gentleman from Freetown, (Mr. Hathaway).

The PRESIDENT. It is hardly in order for the gentleman to use that phrase. The Chair understood no threats to have been made.

Mr. DAVIS. Well, Sir, I am merely repeating the language of the gentleman who has just taken his seat, (Mr. Butler). But, Sir, I will not call them threats, I only say that to me they had very much that bearing and appearance.

I said that I regretted that the gentleman from New Bedford felt called upon to make this motion to recommit this morning, but after the motion has been made, after what has been said, and after the feeling which cannot but have arisen, to a certain extent, in the minds of the members of the Convention, I think it would, perhaps, be well that the motion should now prevail.

It has been asked by the gentleman who last spoke, and by the gentleman who spoke before him, why those who were opposed to the Report of the majority of the Committee, and opposed to the proposition put forward by the gentleman from Lowell, did not submit another proposition? Well, Sir, I have to say for one, that I have not yet been convinced that it is proper, that it is expedient, that it is honest, or that it is right to submit this proposition to the people; but, notwithstanding that opinion, I have sat here in accordance with what I yesterday announced as the plan under which I came to this Convention, to say nothing unless it should become absolutely necessary—to make no set speech if I could help it. I have been willing to sit here day after day, and week after week, and hear others, and to draw what light I could from their experience and reflection. I am willing to acknowledge the fairness with which the debate has been conducted. I have seen no evidence of a disposition upon the part of the majority to limit the discussion or to force a vote upon any question connected with this subject. But I do believe that the small towns ask too much. I believe the people of Massachusetts—the good sense of the people of Massachusetts—is more ready to sanction a plan which shall secure equality of representation than they are to see the distinct representation of the towns preserved. But, Sir, if I believed, as many members of this Convention seem to believe, that whatever we do, whether right or wrong, the people are ready to sanction, I should have much less respect for the people than I have now. I do not believe the people are going to follow the dictates of this Convention without regard to the measures it recommends.

But, Sir, as I said before, having, with others, sat here without saying a word, but willing to see the Report of the majority of the Committee perfected as much as possible; willing that the friends of that Report should make what amendments they should think advisable, from time to time, as the discussion continued, rather than drive their friends into opposition to it; having deemed that the question would soon be taken; having seen that no scheme was to be presented by the friends of this Report; being satisfied by the course of the gentleman from Lowell, (Mr. Butler,) who has just taken his seat, and from that of the friends of his plan, that there was no disposition upon their part to force this amendment through, and not having seen any plan or scheme presented by which the different parts of the State—the different counties of the State—could secure anything like equal representation in the House of Representatives, it seems not improper to me that this whole subject should be committed to a committee consisting of one from each county. And without intending to endorse or to argue the views which have been presented by any of the various gentlemen who have spoken upon one side of this question or the other, in support of the country against the town, or town against country, and, without overlooking the arguments which have been presented to show why town representation should exist under our Constitution, or that exact numerical equality is impossible, and perhaps, not desirable, I would suggest that whatever may be the principles or the policy of gentlemen upon this floor, I do believe that this Convention have got to see to it that between the different sections of the State there is something like equality of representation, in proportion to the population, preserved. Gentlemen must look at this as a principle which cannot be left out of consideration, whatever their feelings may be with reference to separate town representation. They must look at it as a fact, and as a practical consideration. It is a principle that still exists, and if the Convention keep it out of sight, in the determination of this question, the people will not overlook it.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES. — DAVIS — HOOPER — BATES — GARDNER.

But allusion has been made to the county of Barnstable —

The PRESIDENT. It is not in order for the gentleman to discuss that subject.

Mr. DAVIS. I merely call the attention of the Convention to it as a reason why the subject should be recommitted. I am not arguing anything fully. I am only going to state, that under this proposition the county of Barnstable, with about thirty-three thousand population, is to have fourteen representatives in a year, while another county, with three thousand less, is to have twenty representatives. I ask gentlemen of the Convention whether this is not a fact which people will look at; and whether they believe that the people of the county of Barnstable or Bristol are to be blinded for the next six months. If that be the case, if there is an inequality apparent, I say that it is a reason —

The PRESIDENT. The Chair must remind the gentleman that he is not speaking strictly to the question.

Mr. DAVIS. I say that the reason I have given is a sufficient one for submitting this whole question to a committee, consisting of one from each county. I will trouble the Convention with no further remarks.

Mr. HOOPER, of Fall River. For one I am not in favor of the reference to the committee as proposed by the gentleman who made the motion, and before I sit down I shall move to amend that motion. It will be recollected, that on the very first day of the session of this Convention, a similar motion was made to raise a committee of one from each county, to which I then objected, and moved an amendment which was not adopted, and a committee of one from each county was adopted by an overwhelming majority. That set a precedent for committees to be raised here, and I presume my friend from New Bedford, (Mr. French,) acted in conformity to the precedent established upon that occasion. I am in favor of recommitting this subject to a special committee, for this reason, among others. In looking at the amendment of the gentleman from Lowell, (Mr. Butler,) I am unable to comprehend to its full extent precisely what it means, and I think that it should be recommitted in order to bring out precisely what the gentleman intends, so that we may all understand it. It seems to me that the language of the first paragraph is exceedingly obscure, so that it appears to be as capable of one interpretation as of another. Several amendments have been adopted, but I do not know really what they are, and for that reason, among others, I should hope that this subject might be recommitted. Gentlemen say that they have sat here day after day, waiting for a plan to be proposed from others as a substitute for this. What have we seen here? Have we not seen every individual proposition voted down as it came in, simply because it was an individual proposition? Every man in this Convention may propose a plan and it will go through the same process. It will amount to the same thing.

The PRESIDENT. It is not in order for the gentleman to refer to the proceedings in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HOOPER. I think I am in order—as the Chair will see when I come to make the application.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair suggests to the gentleman that the remark made by him, that the Convention will vote down any plan, is not strictly in order.

Mr. HOOPER. The object of the recommitment of this subject is this. It is not likely that any other plan will be presented which will change the views of the Convention. It will be seen that every plan has been voted down, and I have no reason to doubt that this will be the case with all the individual plans which may be presented. A report made by a special committee may possibly combine the views of a larger portion of the Convention, and that is one reason why I think this subject should be recommitted. I am exceedingly anxious that some plan should be presented upon which we can all act together—some proposition with which I can go home to my constituents and give them good and sufficient reasons why it should be adopted in preference to the plan already in existence. I should like any gentleman, just to show me what kind of an argument I can present in favor of the proposition which the gentleman from Lowell, (Mr. Butler,) has presented here, and which I can furnish to my constituents as a reason why it should be adopted in preference to the existing system. I believe, if gentlemen will suffer this subject to be recommitted, that a plan may be so combined out of the various propositions presented here, that it may be carried almost unanimously. The gentleman from Charlestown, (Mr. Thompson,) has presented a plan much more just and equal in every respect than that of the gentleman from Lowell, and I believe, if it can be presented by even a minority of the committee, would command the assent of a large portion of the members of this Convention. It is for this reason that I wish to see this matter recommitted, but I hope, if recommitted, it may not receive the fate of another matter, which I had the honor of reporting, and which was recommitted to a committee. I move to amend the proposition so as to refer this subject to a committee of one from each congressional district.

Mr. FRENCH, of New Bedford. I accept the amendment.

Mr. BATES, of Plymouth. Contrary to my determination not to address this Convention, I wish to say a word upon this question. For one, I hope that none of these representations with regard to the Old Colony, will have any effect upon this Convention. I assure the Convention that the Old Colony is a very harmless place, and the people there are a peace-loving people, and there need be no apprehension of danger from that quarter. In answer to the inquiry of the gentleman from Lowell, (Mr. Butler,) whether the representation of the gentleman from Freetown, (Mr. Hathaway,) is a representation of the reform members of the Old Colony, I say, emphatically, no. I have only a few words to say upon this point, and they are strictly to the question. I will try not to trespass upon the rule. In the first place, it is proposed to recommit this whole question which has been under discussion three weeks, to a committee of one from each congressional district. How is that committee to be constituted? By the Chair, without doubt, and in two or three days we shall have that committee appointed. So much time has been lost. Then the different projects which have been presented here will go to that committee, and as many other propositions as individuals see fit to present. The result is, that after a deliberation of some week or two, the committee present a plan to the Convention. What course does the Convention take? The report is ordered to be printed, and then it is referred to the Committee of the Whole. We then go through the same process which has been repeated here for the last three weeks, and each individual case comes up in its turn to be considered, and be adopted or rejected. Then we are precisely in the situation in which we find ourselves at present. I hope that we shall go on with this matter now. This Convention is as ready to decide upon this question now, as at any other time. If this project is right or that one wrong, this Convention is just as competent to settle upon the one which is right, at the present, as at any future time. I regret, exceedingly, the course which this debate has taken within the last two hours, as it seems to be of a strictly sectional character in regard to the Old Colony, whether, under the Charter of William and Mary she had a certain proportion of her rights or not. This is a question which may be discussed at some future time. As it regards these intimations that there is to be any danger from the Old Colony if this subject is not recommitted, I can assure the Convention, that no fears need be apprehended upon that subject, and if any difficulty is anticipated from that section of our Commonwealth, those apprehensions have no foundation in fact.

Mr. GARDNER, of Seekonk. The other day, when the question of loaning the credit of the State was before the Convention, my excellent friend on my right, (Mr. Hooper,) entertained one opinion in regard to it, and the gentleman from Taunton, (Mr. Morton,) precisely an opposite opinion. Both of these gentlemen are from the same county as myself, and both of them represent, as they suppose, the views of the people of that county, and yet their opinions upon that question seemed to be entirely different. With regard to the question now before the Convention, I do not know the opinions of my colleagues from the county from which I came, any farther than they have been expressed by the gentleman on my right. I presume that they do not wish to obtain any advantage which the people have not in other sections of the Commonwealth. I believe that they are a free and liberal minded people, and the people of Bristol County and the Old Colony, in wishing justice done to them, would like to see the like justice done to the whole Commonwealth. I believe, notwithstanding the remarks of the gentleman from Freetown, (Mr. Hathaway,) that the county of Bristol would sooner lose a representative from that section of the State, than gain one surreptitiously or improperly from any other section of the State. Therefore, I cannot fully agree with the remarks which have been made by the gentleman from

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES. — PHINNEY — GRISWOLD.

[June 29th.

Freetown. I do not believe, that generally speaking, there can be the feeling manifested among the people which the gentleman supposes there will be, provided this amendment of the gentleman from Lowell shall be adopted. With regard to this proposition for recommitting this subject, I am rather in favor of such recommitment. I support it for the reason which has been expressed by other gentlemen upon this floor, because I have a sort of pet proposition of my own to offer. I submitted it the other day, but it happened to be at a very unfortunate hour, just before the Convention adjourned, and there was no time for any gentleman, if so disposed, to look at it all and see if it contained any merits. It was voted down instantly. For the sake of having that proposition referred to a committee, I would be in favor of the recommitment of this subject, if for no other reason. I hope, therefore, that the whole subject may be recommitment to a committee; but it seems to me it would be better to refer it to a committee of one from each county, instead of one from each congressional district, as proposed by the gentleman from Fall River, (Mr. Hooper).

The PRESIDENT. The gentleman from New Bedford, (Mr. French,) has accepted the amendment.

Mr. GARDNER. I think the first proposition was the best, because the committee would have been larger.

Mr. PHINNEY, for Chatham. Mr. President: I rise to oppose the motion of the member from New Bedford, (Mr. French,) because I believe it will greatly delay the business of the Convention to recommit the subject now under discussion to a Special Committee. Should the motion of the gentleman prevail, some days would be required by the committee to prepare another report, and then the whole subject of representation, which has been under discussion nearly ten days, will be presented anew, and it will be necessary to go over the whole ground again. And permit me, Mr. President, to say a few words about the great solicitude which seems to be felt by certain members of this Convention for the injustice done to the Old Colony, and more especially that portion of it which I have the honor to represent. I see no cause for the alarm manifested in the plan submitted by the gentleman from Lowell, (Mr. Butler,) and I shall support it, after being slightly modified.

My long and intimate acquaintance with the citizens of Barnstable County, convinces me that they are, first, in favor of town representation; and second, that their strong objection to the district system would compel me to oppose it as their humble representative, although it has received the support of some of the ablest members of this Convention. If the system of town representation cannot be agreed upon by a majority of this Convention, I hope some system will be adopted which will approximate the nearest to it. Very much of the sympathy which has been manifested for Barnstable and Plymouth, in comparison with Franklin, comes, it seems to me, from members representing the large towns and cities of the Commonwealth, and is not entitled to very great weight, while it has, apparently, for its object, the uniting the small towns into representative districts.

Mr. President: I am aware that I have not confined my remarks strictly to the subject under consideration, which is that of recommitment; but I had reason to believe the Convention would indulge me in a few words, as I have not previously spoken upon this subject. I have much preferred to be a listener to the eloquence of others and profit by their experience. I shall therefore be content, for the most part, with giving a silent vote upon the great questions which are to be submitted to the people for their final decision.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair must remind the gentleman that he is not strictly in order, and that he should confine his remarks to the question immediately pending before the Convention.

Mr. PHINNEY. I rose merely to say that I was opposed to the recommitment of this subject, and that I believed the Report, as presented by the gentleman from Lowell, will meet the views of the section of country from which I come.

Mr. GRISWOLD, for Erving. The question immediately before us is, upon the recommitment of this subject to a Special Committee. Having had the honor to be chairman of the Committee to which this subject was referred, I thought it proper for me to say a word or two at this time. I wish to say here, so far as I am personally concerned, as a member of that Committee, or as chairman of that Committee, I am entirely indifferent upon this subject of the recommitment. I should like to have this matter take that course which will develop, by the discussion here, whether it goes to one committee or the other, the plan which will be most acceptable to the people of all portions of the Commonwealth. I have no other feeling or motive in this matter. But is it best to refer this subject to a new committee, the original committee, or any committee. It seems to me that such a course would not be advisable. The original committee, as is well known, had this matter under discussion some two or three weeks, the result of which was the presentation of the two Reports which have been under discussion here for two or three weeks. If this matter is sent back to a new committee, or any committee, in what situation will it be? Why, here are some seventeen propositions which have been liberally discussed by this Committee, either in Convention or Committee of the Whole. Now, I undertake to say, that this Convention will never be much better prepared to express their judgment upon this matter than they are today. Not that I am in favor of cutting short any debate; not that I am in favor of forcing one proposition beyond another; but there must be an end to this matter somewhere.

This is a great subject, confessedly the most difficult one which is to come before this Convention, and it must be met by us at some point, in some manner; and when and where are we to meet it? It is proposed, I suppose, that we shall, at some period during the summer, bring our discussions to a close and adjourn. Sir, if this subject goes back to a committee, and the various propositions come before that committee, they must either have time to examine and discuss these propositions, or they must send in a Report within one or two days. If they send back a proposition, without taking time to look over these different plans, and mature the best one they can from the whole, what advantage is gained from the committee? Nothing whatever. If that committee are to take these seventeen plans, which are now well and clearly understood by every member of this Convention, and to take them up and discuss them, and eliminate from them some plan which will be acceptable to this Convention, how long will it take? Sir, in that committee you cannot prevent speech-making and discussion. We could not do it before; and in that committee men must be permitted to speak their half hour, or their hour, if they desire it. When are they to do that? Are they to hold sessions of the committee when the Convention is in session? I suppose it cannot be expected that they will do that? The Convention sits here from nine o'clock in the morning till nearly dark; and is it to be supposed that the committee will sit after the adjournment of the Convention? Most certainly the committee will not do that. Is this Convention to stop its labors to give that committee time to mature their plan? And even if the committee had full time, it would require a week to present a plan, unless you stop all discussion in that committee.

Then, again, where is the probability that they will unite on any plan? You find no two plans at all alike among those which have been submitted here, and your former Committee could not agree on one. The committee must then either bring back a divided report, or this proposition which they had before. Then where shall we find ourselves ten days hence? Just where we were when this Committee reported, and we shall have to commence and go over all this discussion again, and when the last day of July comes round we may find ourselves discussing this question.

That is the way the matter presents itself to my mind. If I supposed this proposition could be sent back to the Committee, and that it was in the power of fourteen or any number of men in this Convention, in a reasonable time, to mature a plan which would meet the approbation of this Convention and of the people, I would go for it most heartily. But I apprehend that after any labors which that Committee may expend upon this subject, we shall find ourselves precisely where we have been before, and all this matter must be gone over with again, and we shall not understand the subject any better than we can now.

This subject has been narrowed down to a few simple propositions. In the first place the question is between town representation and the district system. Is that question settled? If it is, one proposition is laid out of the case. Then the only thing left, if the district system is settled and out of the case, is, how much can you do for the small towns? It seems to me that the subject is narrowed down to so small a compass that it is unnecessary to go back to the committee. I started, in the proposition which I had the honor to submit, with a plan which I contend is based upon principle and on the entire practice of this State for two hundred years. But my friends have thought we must adopt the district system so far as cities are concerned, and that as an equivalent for this, the small towns must yield something, and I suppose we must do it although I dislike to. Is it necessary to go to a committee for that? We are balancing upon a narrow point to-day, and it seems to me that this Convention can meet the question as well to-day as at any other time. I do not know but gentlemen in this Convention are willing to take the responsibility of sending this question back to the committee, which must, I apprehend, result in at least two week's delay, if not in breaking up the Convention altogether.

Wednesday,]

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.—STETSON—MORTON—KEYES.

[June 29th.]

I want to do what is best in the premises; I want to do what is nearest right, if I know what that is, and what is nearest equal and fair to all portions of the Commonwealth. I may have occasion, when it is in order, hereafter, to make some reply to some statements which have been made in reference to the different counties in the Commonwealth; but I will not go out of my way to do it now, if I do it at all, as it may be anticipated by others.

But it seems to me that as a matter of business, if we will give ourselves to the consideration of this matter, we may settle it in Convention in three days as well as to send it to the committee again. There is no charm about a committee. The trouble is in the question itself, it being the most difficult of all questions upon which the mind can be brought to bear. Gentlemen must yield something and they must meet this question like men, because it must be met in some shape or another, at some time or other; and I apprehend it may be done, after the discussion we have had and the publication of the report we have had, in the course of three days here, by continuing the discussion; and that will be better than to jeopard the whole matter, and possibly jeopardize the whole question upon which the attention of the whole people of the Commonwealth is so intensely directed to-day.

Mr. STETSON, of Braintree. I will not detain the Convention long. My purpose in rising is to state, that if this question is recommitted, I wish the committee may be requested to report in a certain number of days—say two or three days. And as the plans which will be proposed, or may be proposed to this committee, are all matured, I trust that it will not, in the nature of things, occupy the time of the committee but a very few days, and that they will bring in a proposition which will meet the acceptance of a majority of this Convention.

Now, Sir, the gentleman for Erving says it will take two or three weeks. I think that if he will consider and reflect upon it, that he would not, in his judgment assert that it could take so long a time, and that the committee would not be able to report to this Convention in three days, as well as in three weeks. Now I trust that some plan—I would not have the Convention understand that I have one to offer, because I had one killed at its birth a few days since—which has not yet been acted upon in this Convention, will meet with the views of that committee, and that they will bring to its support a majority of this Convention. And if I may be pardoned, I will say that the Old Colony, to which allusion has been made in this discussion, is not alone in this issue. Sir, the county of Norfolk will sustain and support, so far as I know—I speak of the southern part of the county—what is right and just, and nothing else, whether the basis of representation be twelve hundred or any other number. I can only say I am in favor of the recommitment of this question, and I am in favor of having the committee ordered to report back a plan within three days. I think that since we have had a Majority and a Minority Report fully discussed here, the Convention may well be assured that after all these plans have had a fair hearing in the committee, and are reported back again to this Convention, there will be no debate of any consequence arise upon that report. The question has been argued fully, and I believe that when such a report is made, the majority of this Convention will settle down at once upon what they would carry through and support after it is submitted to the Convention.

Mr. MORTON, of Taunton. Mr. President. Knowing the impatience of the Convention to take this question, I will assure you I will detain them but a very few minutes, and I will endeavor not to deviate from strict order, in the consideration of this subject.

I should not have arisen but to reply to a personal remark made by the gentleman from Lowell, (Mr. Butler). When he was addressing this Committee, and speaking of the delay of gentlemen in one section of the Commonwealth in presenting any plan for consideration, he referred to me, and said I had a plan, and that I had kept my mouth shut on the subject. Now, if any one imputes to me any intention to keep anything back, sick or well, I repel it. I profess to act in all cases with openness and frankness. I did intend to address the Convention on this subject long ago; but I was providentially prevented from doing it, and I think the gentleman knew it well; and that so far from withholding any plan, I presented it to as many members of the Convention as I could, and among others to the gentleman from Lowell himself. Now, when he alluded to me as keeping my mouth shut, I think he departed from that kindness and suavity, if not from that parliamentary decorum, which belongs to every gentleman in this Convention; and I presume he would be as unwilling intentionally to do it, as any body else.

Having made these remarks, and being up, I will say two or three words in reference to the motion to recommit this subject to the committee; and in that I trust I shall deal with perfect frankness. I believe my views on this subject are known, and it is supposed that I am in a minority. But I have come to the conclusion that there are but two courses which this Convention can pursue. One, I think, is founded in justice, equality, and righteousness. Other gentlemen have their opinions differing from me, I have no doubt. The other, I think, is founded on an artificial system, on a contrivance—I do not mean to use the word in any improper sense at all—to accomplish an object indirectly; an object which they, doubtless, think right. These subjects are before the Convention, if the district system is not repudiated, as I hope it will not be; and we have only left the town system, and it is said we have some ten or fifteen propositions distinct and separate in relation to that subject.

Now, a motion has been made to submit all these to a committee; and if I understand the question which we are now to act upon, with a view to a proper transaction, and the speedy transaction of business, it is whether a committee of eleven men, selected to compare and examine these several plans, exchange views and bring the plans together so as to form a system, can do it better than four hundred individuals sitting here. It seemed to me very plain, that the small number, who could, if you please, sit around a round table, and have the plans all before them, and make suggestions one to the other, would be more likely to bring their minds together and make the necessary concessions, and hit upon some plan among them, or form one out of all those submitted to them, that would be acceptable to all, and satisfactory to the whole Convention. I do not suppose that I shall vote for any plan which they will recommend; but if they wish to get up this patch work system, I wish to give them an opportunity to exercise their taste and skill in endeavoring to present to us the most beautiful piece of Mosaic work they can accomplish.

The Old Colony has been alluded to, and it is a subject about which I feel a little sensitive, and I feel desirous of doing justice to them on all proper occasions. I shall not enter into the inquiry whether the gentleman from Plymouth, or the gentleman for Chatham, have known the Old Colony longer or better than I have; but I profess to know something in relation to the subject, and perhaps I should not differ from them. I think they are a pretty honest, intelligent, and very peace-loving community, and I think they have practised a Christian virtue for a good while; and that was, when smitten on the one cheek, they turned the other. But if my young friend, (Mr. Davis,) who, supposing that some injustice impended over them, got a little zealous, it is not very remarkable; but I think if they had had the experience which I have, they would have been a little more cautious, and it would be very apt to be supposed by every gentleman about us, who has seen us and known us, for many years, that we had been so used to being skinned, that we should not squirm under the operation. [Laughter.]

Mr. KEYES, for Abington. It occurred to me, Mr. President, that when this motion was made in the Convention this morning, it was a very proper one; but notwithstanding this, if it is believed by the gentleman for Erving (Mr. Griswold,) that it is a more expeditious mode to settle the matter in the Convention than in Committee, I shall coincide with him. I labor under this difficulty: I voted for the proposition of the gentleman from Lowell, (Mr. Butler,) in order that some one subject might be selected for consideration, upon which amendments might be submitted, and arguments be made, with some degree of certainty, as to their effect. Now the first reason which would induce me to favor the recommitment of this subject to the Committee, would be that we should thereby obtain a plan, not only showing the operation of the amendment upon the present census, but upon the future census. I am certainly contented with the gentleman's plan, so far as the present census is concerned, but I have not figured it out, nor do I know that it has been figured out by any one, to ascertain what will be its operation hereafter. In making a Constitution, we are to provide not only for the present, but for the future. For that reason I am, as yet, undecided how I shall vote upon it. I voted in favor of it in Committee of the Whole, because I was aware that I should have an opportunity to consider it when it should come up in Convention. I may be compelled, from the circumstances, to vote against the amendment, and I do not doubt but such will be the case with many other gentlemen.

A great deal has been said about inequality, but I submit that this is a matter which has nothing to do with the subject at all, and if the whole question on this point had not been entirely demolished by the able remarks of the gentleman from Northampton, (Mr. Huntington,) I would have endeavored, myself, to have said something about this great humbug of inequality. I could show where there are men in this Commonwealth who have had sixty-six times the power that I have had, notwithstanding what our Constitution says to the contrary.

The reasons which were stated by my friend for Erving, (Mr. Griswold,) upon this subject, have been perfectly conclusive to my mind. He says that the question of districting has been entirely done away with. That is my opinion. That was the only ground for the long speeches which were made in his Committee; it was this that caused the division, and having been once settled I take it that no man is going into that Committee to try and establish it again.

The attention of gentlemen must, therefore, be confined solely to the making of some system by which towns will be represented as much as they can be, and in as equal a manner as possible, throughout the Commonwealth. With these various propositions before them, it strikes me that the committee to which the subject is referred would require but a very short time to accomplish an object so desirable. But whoever that committee may be, let me suggest to them in the consideration of each plan, to show its operation not only under the present census, but also its operations under the two succeeding censuses, according to the prospective increase of the population as it has been stated in the public documents. Then we can know whether we will adopt such a plan for the present as well as for the future. On looking at the Orders of the Day, I perceive that there is plenty of business to engage the attention of the Convention while all this is being done; and if it should happen that we should have disposed of all the subjects before us before that is reported back, we shall then have plenty of time to consider it and nothing else. I do not believe it will consume the time unnecessarily or unprofitably, but, on the contrary, it is my opinion that such a course, if pursued, will save several days of hard labor in the Convention.

Mr. ABBOTT, of Lowell. I did not intend to say a single word upon the question which has been mooted here to such an extent, whether the Old Colony has had justice done her in times past, or is to have justice done her in all time to come. It seems to me that it is a question which really has nothing to do with the matter now before the Convention. And if I may be permitted to speak of that section of the Commonwealth which I in part represent, I can assure the gentleman from Taunton, that it is the furthest from any desire in the vicinity where I live, to do injustice towards the Old Colony. I presume it is the feeling and the wish of the Convention, to have right done to all, though we have all come to the conclusion, I apprehend, by this time, that it is exceedingly difficult to get at and ascertain where that right is, that has been so greatly encroached upon; as is represented. Having trespassed upon the time of the Convention heretofore, I shall perhaps not have occasion again to allude to this matter, but I desire to call the attention of gentlemen to this subject for a moment, in a practical point of view.

Let us see, before going any farther, where we are historically, in regard to this matter, because we have been considering the details of this question, of the basis of representation, so long that it has really become a matter of history. It was originally, I believe, submitted to a committee, consisting of twenty-one gentlemen, and that Committee, I have no doubt, brought to bear upon the subject all the learning, and knowledge, and industry which they possessed. They gave us two Reports, both of which have been considered in Committee of the Whole, and by the Convention, for two weeks or more. One of these systems reported by that Committee, after having been debated with all the learning and eloquence which could be brought to bear in favor of, and against it, in so large a body as this, after being amended, has been finally adopted in Committee of the Whole. And I may be permitted to say, in this connection, that during the entire deliberation of this body upon the subject, no human being in the Convention can say that he has been debarred from the privilege of suggesting such plans, and introducing his figures and results, as he may have deemed would meet the difficulty which existed. Why, Sir, I was surprised to hear my friend for Abington complaining that there had not been figures and results enough. Figures and results! I had begun to think that for the last ten days, we had resolved ourselves into a convention of arithmeticians, for we have been almost smothered in figures. One would almost suppose, from our transactions here, that we had assembled to settle questions of statesmanship by the rules of arithmetic. Every man who has desired it, has brought his plan, and submitted it, either to the Committee of the Whole, or to the Convention; nobody has held him back; no restraint has been exercised, but, on the contrary, he has been allowed to present his view and make his explanations, which have been entertained and considered by this body. And now I submit, if I may be permitted to use the expression without trenching upon the rules of order, whether it does not look very much like boy's play, after we have had the subject under consideration for so long a time, and after the Convention have gone into Committee of the Whole upon it, have discussed it there, and adopted, and rejected the amendments, and plans, and suggestions which have come from all directions and now, when it has been reported back from the Committee after being discussed over and over again, to send it again to be reconsidered and reported upon once more by a committee. After all this deliberation, let me ask where we are? Have we made an advance, have we made one step forward? No, Sir, we have arrived at the point from whence we started? And now it is proposed to send it back to another committee, and see if we cannot get from them something different from the very able Report which we received from a Committee of twenty-one, before we commenced the consideration of this question.

Sir, I apprehend that this body can just as well settle this matter in Convention, as a Committee of eleven, or any other number, can do it. If my friend from Freetown, (Mr. Hathaway,) has any plan which he desires to propose, in God's name let him have an opportunity to propose it. And if it should prove any better than the plan which has been submitted by my colleague from from Lowell, (Mr. Butler,) I, for one, will go for it with all my power.

If it is a plan that will do more justice to the part of the Commonwealth from which the gentleman comes, and do no injustice to another, I will go for it with pleasure. I do not believe there is any disposition in this Convention to prevent any gentleman who desires to do so, from bringing forth any plan, or that there is an unwillingness to listen to any arguments that may be introduced in favor of such plan and its operation, and I believe, Sir, that we are capable of appreciating those arguments at this time. I think the Convention will bear me out in the statement, that no proposition has been submitted, that has not received its due consideration.

We have had on the one side, the Report of the majority of the Committee in favor of town representation, a plan that has certainly the past history of the Commonwealth in reference to this subject, in its favor, and which is based and founded upon the very political existence of the people of this State.

Then again, on the other side, you have the plan introduced by the minority of the Committee, a system which is based on another great principle of our government—the principle of political equality; this has been called the district system. The third plan submitted by the gentleman from Lowell is, I apprehend, a compromise, between the two. It is giving up something asked for by the gentleman for Erving, (Mr. Griswold,) and those who go for the towns, and it is taking something from the proposition of the minority, yet not detracting materially from the great principle of either. I think the Convention will bear me witness that I have stated the matter substantially as it now stands—a compromise and the two extremes. And, Sir, is it to be urged here, that after having brought to bear upon the question, all the learning and eloquence and industry of the many members of this Convention, that we cannot bring into shape in some way or other, either of these propositions? What we want to do is to come to some definite understanding in regard to the details of one or the other of these plans. I am not in the habit of making predictions, nor will I predict what conclusion the Convention may come to in the consideration of this subject, but I will say what I believe will be the course taken by certain gentlemen who are in favor of town representation; and it is this, that if the compromise of my colleague from Lowell, (Mr. Butler,) goes much further in a direction away from town representation, or much beyond it, I apprehend that the tread of many gentlemen in this House will be broad enough and long enough to stop over to the other extreme of district representation. I think we are as well able to decide upon the matter now, as we ever shall be, and I hope we shall be allowed to do so. But, suppose that we recommit it to the hands of a committee. That committee will, in all probability, take a certain plan, and comparing it with the history of the past in relation to this question, will decide it in accordance with that history. And do you believe when that system is reported back from the committee, that there will not be this man, and that man, and another man, where it happens to hit his particular town or section of the Commonwealth, who will not jump up and present another plan more in accordance with his feelings and interests? And shall we not, therefore, have to go over this same discussion again?

Laying these considerations aside, however, if this subject is to go into the hands of a committee again, I am in favor of allowing them all the time they desire to discuss and consider it, and I should be sorry to have any iron rule imposed upon them, as has been proposed, that they should report in three days. But when that report is made, whether it be sooner or later, depend upon it, Sir, the fire will break out anew. Gentlemen who have made speeches before will make them again. I, myself, may be a sinner, and yet the circumstances may warrant it; and in this way another fortnight will be consumed. I ask the good sense of the Convention, whether they believe we shall have any more real light after pursuing such a course than we have at present? I trust that we shall go on and finish this business now. If my friend from Freetown, (Mr. Hathaway,) as I before remarked, has a plan which he desires to submit, let him submit it in Convention, and I can assure him it will receive due consideration. If it is what we want we shall adopt it; if not, it will go down, where other plans have gone before it.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.—WEEKS—HATHAWAY.

Mr. WEEKS, of Harwich. A great deal has been said in regard to the old counties of Plymouth and Barnstable. And it was just now remarked, by the gentleman for Chatham, that the people of Barnstable County were in favor of town representation; I should like to ask that gentleman what indications he can find to warrant this assertion. All of its representatives, with but one exception, have, I believe, voted for the district system, and they are all good democrats. The people of that county desire equal political rights with their neighbors in the other counties, and it is all they ask for. When compared with the people of the county of Franklin, we are, in fact, but half men, since that county possesses just double the political rights that we possess; and it is this of which we complain.

Now, Sir, a word in regard to the district plan. It is, in my opinion, the only plan that can be adopted by which equality of representation can be secured to all. And, although the people of Barnstable County have been represented to be in favor of town representation, yet if this district system is submitted to them for their decision, they will one and all unanimously vote to sustain that principle.

Mr. HATHAWAY, of Freetown. After the sharp rebukes, and the severe criticism to which I have been subjected in this debate, I beg the indulgence of the Convention for a few moments, while I shall, at once, reply to the gentleman and make an explanation. Sir, the gentleman from Lowell, let me say to him in starting, shall never place me in a false position, either before this Convention or the people, however much he may endeavor or desire so to do. But, to commence aright, it will be necessary for me to go back a little and repeat in part what I before said, and see whether I uttered any threat, as has been intimated. And in the first place I will say, that I did not threaten, nor did I, in the refined and parliamentary language of that gentleman,—for it was undoubtedly parliamentary, as it was permitted to be used,—talk about bullying; nor did I use any language of that character, because I deem it not only unparliamentary, but ungentlemanly, in the highest degree. But, to be strictly parliamentary myself, I ought not to say whether the gentleman used it or not; the Convention can decide upon that point. But let me examine the position in which I was placed, and what I said.

When I first addressed the Convention upon the question, whether this subject should be recommended to the Committee or not, I stated that my mouth had been closed, heretofore, and I had remained silent upon this question, and that it was the first time I had spoken upon the proposition as to the basis of the House of Representatives. In the next place, I said, that I desired to have the subject recommitted to the Committee, because I felt that injustice would be done to certain parts of the Commonwealth, and especially to that part of it called the Old Colony, if either the original Report of the majority of the Select Committee, or the amendment of the gentleman from Lowell should be adopted. I felt the peculiarity of the position in which we were placed, who happened to be opposed to these propositions—to wit: that the small towns, that had but about one-third or two-fifths of the population or voters in this Commonwealth, had, on this floor, a majority, at least, if not three-fifths, of the delegates, and that the remaining three-fifths of the population or voters, had, on this floor, but about two-fifths of the delegates, and would, of course, be here in a minority, and if a vote upon the propositions was forced, they must yield to the three-fifths of the delegates, who, in fact, represented but two-fifths of the population or voters. I did tell an anecdote of a distinguished son of Massachusetts, but so far from intending any threats thereby, it was merely for the purpose of illustrating what would be his sense, if he now was living, of the great injustice which would be done, if either the amendment or Report shall be adopted. I went still further, and said, there was a power behind us, and that the three-fifths of the delegates who were elected, and who are now here, represented but about two-fifths of the population or voters, and that that power, which would see that no injustice should be done, was the people. The gentleman from Lowell, in his remarks, appealed to a higher law or tribunal, than the people. In my view, the people are the legitimate tribunal for making their organic law, without appealing to a higher power or tribunal.

The gentleman said, also, that I had intimated there was a conspiracy in this matter. I, Sir, made no such intimation. He went on, learnedly, to instruct us in reference to the conspiracy of Rachel and Jacob, and the goat skins with which they deceived Isaac, and the goat soup with which they fed him. But I can tell the gentleman from Lowell, that if he intends his proposition as one of the goat skins, we, of the Old Colony, shall not be misled or deceived by it; nor am I, or will the people in that part of the Commonwealth, as I believe, be deceived by, or in the least be inclined to sup with him any of his odoriferous goat soup, which he so highly prizes, and which is so palatable to his taste. He may have the whole of it; I do not choose to be a partaker of it with him, or from his hand.

The gentleman, also, in the course of his remarks, perhaps in a perfectly proper and parliamentary manner—I mean no disrespect to the Chair—

The PRESIDENT. The gentleman from Freetown will recollect that the Chair checked the gentleman from Lowell in his observations, and that the Chair said to the gentleman from Lowell, that he did not understand the gentleman from Freetown as having uttered any threats.

Mr. HATHAWAY. I am aware of that, Sir, and it was not to that I was about referring; but, in the course of his remarks, he took occasion to appeal to the “reform party” of the Old Colony, and to refer to the reform democracy.

Mr. BUTLER. I rise to correct a statement—will the gentleman yield the floor?

Mr. HATHAWAY. Certainly, Sir, for that purpose.

Mr. BUTLER. I said not one word in relation to the reform democracy, in any portion of the Commonwealth; I called upon the reform members of the Convention from the Old Colony.

Mr. HATHAWAY. The gentleman says he called upon the “reform members” of the Convention from the Old Colony, and thus limits his language. I appeal to the Convention, as to the correctness of that statement. But I should like to know, in the first place, what the gentleman means by “reform members;” I should like to have him tell me, if there is any member of this Convention who does not go for reform, provided it be the reform of a vicious or imperfect system. If there are any particular persons in this Convention, to whom he alludes, as being opposed to reforming or amending a vicious or imperfect system, I should like to have them pointed out. I have supposed that all the members in this Convention, whether from the Old Colony, or any other part of the State, were all for reforming everything that is wrong, and which had worked, or might work, disadvantageously in a community, or any part thereof, and that all of us were for introducing that which is right and proper, instead of that which was working evil and injustice to a part, if not the whole, community.

But the gentleman from Plymouth, forsooth, is the man who constitutes the “reform party” in the Old Colony, and who rises here, and claims to be the sole representative of the reform members or party from the Old Colony; for, when the gentleman from Lowell appeals to the reform members or party from the Old Colony, the gentleman from Plymouth arose, and said, in an emphatic manner, and in his peculiarly dignified tone, “I pronounce that the gentleman from Freetown is not one of the reformers, or of that party.”

Mr. BATES, of Plymouth. I rise simply to make an explanation. I made no such statement. When the question was asked by the gentleman from Lowell, if these were the sentiments of the reform members of the old colony, I answered emphatically, no! That is all.

Mr. HATHAWAY. I recollect very well, and the gentleman from Lowell recollects very well, the language that was used, and the Convention recollect whether that was the language of the gentleman from Plymouth, but even if it was, as the gentleman says, who set him up here as a judge in Israel? Who appointed him to answer for the Old Colony, or the sentiments of its members—will he tell me?

I expected, and therefore am not disappointed, Mr. President, when the gentleman from Lowell threw up his kite and called upon the “reform party” from the Old Colony to come to the rescue, that before it found a landing, I should find the gentleman from Plymouth attached to its tail, as a bob, or a tag, and dangling in the air. [Laughter.] Well, Sir, he has had his aerial flight in that position, which is his true one, and if he is satisfied with his exhibition of himself, I think no one will envy him in such an honorable exhibition and position, and the enjoyment he derives from it. He knows very well that I did not come here to bandy words with him or with any body else, and I never intend to do so; but I do protest against the authority of that gentleman, in setting himself up here, and with all the gravity of a pope, issuing his bull and reading us out of the political church, and declaring, with all papal pomp and dignity, that I "do not represent the sentiments of the reform party" as well as himself. There is a better place than this to test that matter, when this proposition shall go before the people, if ever the Majority Report, or the amendment of the gentleman from Lowell, in its present form; shall take that course. Nor am I at all disposed to bandy words with the gentleman from Lowell; it is not congenial with my tastes. I suppose, from the remarks of the honorable gentleman from Worcester, that he did understand my language as somewhat threatening, for I do not believe he would intentionally misrepresent me, but I will state, as I have already stated, that I used no threats or language that could be fairly tortured into a threat, but that he unintentionally and undesignedly misunderstood me. In reference to the figures alluded to by that gentleman, I understood from him, that if I would make the calculation, I should find that it required either more population or more voters for the election of a representative in the county of Middlesex or Worcester than it required in the county of Bristol.

Mr. ALLEN, of Worcester. I will explain to the gentleman what I meant.* I remarked, in the course of my observations, that he would find that the representation of his county was greater in proportion to the population than that of the large county of Middlesex, and not far from the representation of the county of Worcester, and further, that it afforded to the county he in part represents a greater representation in proportion to the population than would be allowed under the system submitted by the gentleman from Lowell.

Mr. HATHAWAY. Then I did not misunderstand what the gentleman said. Mr. President, I hold in my hand a paper, the correctness of the figuring on which I cannot, however, vouch for, because I have not carefully examined it, purporting to be a table showing the practical operation of Mr. Butler's plan. I will read from it, and I will take the counties named by the gentleman from Worcester, although there are other counties where the inequality is much greater. "He proposes to give a House of three hundred and ninety-one members, and distributes them as follows:—" The county of Middlesex, for instance, is allowed one representative for every 2,552 persons, whether voters or the population generally I do not know. The county of Worcester requires 2,127 persons for every representative, the county of Bristol requires 2,609 persons for every representative. Now, if 2,609 be less than 2,552, or 2,127, then, I confess, I have learned subtraction in vain, and forgotten the first rudiments in mathematics.

Mr. ALLEN. If the gentleman will examine the subject for himself, he will find no such results as are figured out in that table.

Mr. HATHAWAY. I cannot say whether the statement is right or wrong. I read from the paper which a few moments since I found in my seat, or rather, as I think, delivered to me, and the other members of the Convention, by the page or one of the document distributors of this House, though I am not positively certain that it was so distributed. It purports to be a table showing the practical operation of Mr. Butler's amendment.

Mr. BUTLER. I rise to a point of order. I understood the gentleman to say that he was reading from a table that had been prepared by me.

Mr. HATHAWAY. The gentleman misunderstood me. I said I was reading from a paper which had been printed for the use of the Convention; and I read precisely what that paper contained. Whether the gentleman prepared it, or who under Heaven prepared it, I do not know or care.

Mr. BUTLER. I don't think Heaven had anything to do with it.

Mr. HATHAWAY. Probably not. I can only say it was distributed. I found a copy in my seat. But, Sir, as I before said, I have no disposition to bandy words with the gentleman from Lowell, he is so courteous, gentlemanly, parliamentary, and chaste in his language. But I must be permitted, however, to say that when he uses the word "bullying" in reference to me —

The PRESIDENT. The Chair heard no such remark.

Mr. HATHAWAY. The expression was used by him nevertheless.

Mr. BUTLER. I would ask if the gentleman refers to me as having used it.

Mr. HATHAWAY. I do.

Mr. BUTLER. I said I would not be bullied. That is what I said.

Mr. HATHAWAY. That, Sir, is a very nice distinction, and the gentleman is welcome to his extra refinement in this matter.

Mr. BUTLER. It is the distinction between the gentleman and myself.

Mr. HATHAWAY. I understand it, Sir. There are many ways of defining that distinction, and gratifying that extra refinement of the gentleman's taste. But let me tell the gentleman if he wishes to keep up this sort of discussion, I assure him he will find one that will meet him, and that he will not obtain a victory without first having a conflict and a struggle. Give us "a fair field and a clear sky," and if the gentleman wishes to try the temper of his steel, or shiver a lance, he will find an opportunity; but, Sir, I desire peace and not warfare within these walls, and especially during the time we shall be engaged in a work of so much importance to the public as that upon which we are now entered. Mr. President, I repeat, that I used no threatening language. Sir, I should deem that I was doing injustice to myself if I was to do so in the presence of this honorable body. I am not in the habit of using language that is objectionable, much less threatening; and I believe that gentlemen around me, and nearest to me, and who had the best opportunity to correctly hear me, will bear me witness that to-day, and during the time when I first addressed the Convention in reference to this matter, I used no threatening language, nor anything approaching to it. I may have shown some warmth in the discussion, for I feared that injustice was to be done to the Old Colony, and I now fear it, but I only intended to state the position of the Old Colony in reference to this matter as a reason why this whole subject should be recommitted to a select committee. No injustice by me was intended to be done to any one, much less to myself, as I should have done if I had used language that could have been justly tortured into a threat.

The question was taken on the motion to recommit, and upon a division, it was—by ayes, 116; noes, 178—decided in the negative.

Mr. BOUTWELL moved to amend the second resolution by striking out all after the word inhabitants.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I desire to state that this, to some extent, removes the limitation which the original resolution contains, and which operates of course against the large towns. That was a subject of conversation in committee, and it has been the subject of debate in the Convention, and I think very justly a subject of some complaint. If this amendment prevails it will, to be sure, to some extent, make an addition to the size of the House of Representatives, but it will relieve the provision from the charge of inequality which has been made against it in relation to the representation of the cities and large towns of the Commonwealth. It provides for an addition of ten representatives in each decennial period after the year 1860, and it seems to me from the examination I have given the matter that it is upon the whole a reasonable provision.

Mr. BUTLER. I wish simply to say that I was opposed originally to the amendment which was submitted and adopted to allow all small towns of fifteen hundred inhabitants which should be hereafter created, to be excluded from my proposition. I am in favor of the amendment, however, because I think that this provision for the increase of the House will relieve the proposition of the difficulty which my friend from Lowell, (Mr. Adams,) found in it. I cannot say that I accept the amendment, as that is for the Convention to decide, but I fully agree to it in principle.

The question was then taken on the adoption of the amendment and it was decided in the affirmative.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Charlestown. If in order, I desire to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Lowell. I move to strike out all after the word "Resolved" and insert the plan contained in Document No. 74, which I had the honor to submit to the Convention a few days since.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair desires to state that the amendment moved by the gentleman from Charlestown, presents to the Convention, a second substitute, which is not in order, as two substitutes for an original proposition cannot be entertained by the Convention at the same time. If no objection is made, however, the Chair will state the amendment moved by the gentleman from Charlestown.

Mr. BUTLER. I wish simply to say that I hope no objection will be made to the consideration of this amendment, as I am desirous that all propositions shall be fully deliberated upon before the final question is taken.

No objection being made, the amendment was read by the Secretary, as follows:—

Resolved, That the Constitution be so amended as to provide for an apportionment of the House of Representatives, as follows:—

1. Every town having less than fifteen hundred inhabitants, may elect one Representative every alternate year, or any five years in ten years; also each of said towns may elect one Representative on the decennial or valuation year.
2. Every town having fifteen hundred, and less than four thousand inhabitants, may elect one Representative annually.

Wednesday,]

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.—THOMPSON—BRIGGS.

[June 29th.]

3. Every town having four thousand inhabitants, may elect two Representatives annually; the mean increasing ratio shall be four thousand.

The foregoing apportionment to be made upon the census of 1850, and at, or after each succeeding decennial census, the ratio of towns, and the mean increasing ratio, shall be so increased as to retain the same number of members of the House of Representatives as herein proposed.

Resolved, That each city entitled to more than three Representatives, shall be divided into Districts of as nearly equal number of inhabitants as may be practicable: provided, however, that no District shall elect more than three Representatives.

Mr. THOMPSON. In presenting this amendment to the Convention, I shall not think of making a speech or going over the ground which has been so well traversed by every gentleman who has preceded me in the consideration of this question. From the course which the subject has taken, it seemed to me very clear that the idea of adopting a system by which the Commonwealth should be districted in an equal manner throughout, the basis of representation being the people or the voters, was a foregone conclusion, and that any proposition of that character would not be entertained in this body. Hence my attention was turned to the necessity of attaining some end that should approximate nearer to equality than any one which had been proposed to the Convention. I have thought a considerable upon the subject, and having a strong desire to render to the small towns all that could be conscientiously conceded to them, it occurred to me that by starting from the medium towns, it would render more equal justice to all portions of the Commonwealth than had been proposed by any preceding system. And after stating the effect of the plan which I have submitted, and its operation upon the different sections of the Commonwealth, if it does not at once commend itself to the judgment and discretion of the Convention, I certainly have no desire to press it farther. My only wish is to attain to a system which shall combine the plan of corporate or town representation with the system of districting—the two extremes, the smaller towns and the large cities—in such a manner as to present to the people ultimately, a plan that will commend itself to their approbation when it shall be submitted to them.

It will be seen that my amendment proposes a smaller number of representatives than the plan of my friend from Lowell which has just been under discussion. It proposes a maximum, excepting in the valuation year, of three hundred and sixty-four and a half representatives; and the mean increase in ratio being about four thousand inhabitants, it carries an equal line throughout the population of all the towns of the Commonwealth.

Hence it gives a more just proportion to the denser and more thickly settled portions of the Commonwealth than any of the preceding plans, and will therefore be more liable to be accepted by the people than any other system which has yet been introduced here.

It will be seen, if gentlemen will examine the accompanying table, that the number of the representatives throughout the Commonwealth is much less than is provided for in other propositions, the difficulty of which is mainly in regard to the small counties. By comparing the number of inhabitants in the various counties who are entitled to a representative, it will be seen that the smallest number of inhabitants entitled to a representative is in Dukes County, which requires but 1,766 persons; while the largest number will be in Suffolk County which requires 3,939 inhabitants to elect a representative. The other counties range between these extremes. On looking at the amendment submitted by the gentleman from Lowell it will be seen that the extremes are much greater, one extreme being the county of Suffolk which requires for the election of a single representative 4,690 inhabitants, and the other extreme being the county of Franklin which requires only 1,544 inhabitants to elect a representative.

So that the difference in the basis of representation between the extremes of the plan proposed by the gentleman from Lowell, and the extremes of the plan proposed by myself, is nearly one thousand. I think that my plan will therefore work much more equally in the distribution of political power in the House of Representatives, than the system of representation at present existing.

I have drawn up a few figures to show the difference between the system of the present day, and that proposed in this plan. By my system the representation in the county of Suffolk will be reduced from forty-four representatives to thirty-five, in the city of Lowell from ten to nine, in the two next larger cities from six to five, three towns of the next size being reduced from five to four, two towns of the next size from four to three, and one from three to two representatives.

Under the proposed apportionment,—

1 city that now has 44 rep's will be reduced to 35
1 " " " 10 " " " " 9
2 cities " have 6 " " " 5
3 " " " 5 " " " 4

146 " " " 1 rep. annually
Average number 364½.

Giving to the rural towns an addition of thirty-five representatives annually over the number they are entitled to under the present system.

As I have before remarked, the distribution of the representation among the people of the Commonwealth approximates nearer to an equality under my plan than under any other which has been submitted; but if there should be any other presented which will attain the object in question, or approximate nearer to equality under the conflicting views and feelings of the Convention, I shall go for it with pleasure. I proposed this plan with the hope that it might assist us in arriving at some understanding in regard to this much vexed and mooted matter of representation, and I trust that I may not be disappointed. With these remarks, I submit my amendment to the Convention.

Mr. BRIGGS, of Pittsfield. I would inquire of the Chair if it is order to offer an amendment to an amendment of this character.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that it is in order to perfect an amendment before it is adopted. The Chair would state, however, that when the amendment of the gentleman from Charlestown was submitted, being a substitute for a substitute of the original proposition, it was not in order, but on question being put directly to the Convention, it was admitted by unanimous consent.

Mr. BRIGGS. I was not aware, Sir, that you could amend an amendment beyond the second degree.

The PRESIDENT. The gentleman is correct in that, but he does not take into consideration the exact state of the various propositions which are now before the Convention.

The first proposition is the original plan reported from the Committee; the second is that which stands as an amendment, in the nature of a substitute for the Resolves of the Select Committee, and by general consent the gentleman from Charlestown, has had leave to introduce another proposition which he designs as a substitute for both. The Chair understands that it is competent to perfect either the plan reported by the Committee of the Whole, as a substitute, or that proposed by the gentleman from Charlestown; otherwise, being forced to a vote, the Convention is led into the difficulty of agreeing to or rejecting a proposition which cannot be amended either before or after the vote.

Mr. BRIGGS. I understand the proposition of the gentleman from Lowell, was offered as an amendment, not as a substitute. And that the proposition of the gentleman from Charlestown, is an amendment to that amendment. The Committee of the Whole rose and reported that they had adopted the proposition of the gentleman from Lowell, not as a substitute for the original resolves, but as an amendment. But if the Chair is right in calling it a substitute, then my objection goes for nothing. If it is an amendment, then the rule applicable to amendments applies to it.

The PRESIDENT. The proposition of the gentleman from Pittsfield, is perfectly correct; but the distinction which the Chair makes is this—and to this point the attention of the Convention was called, because the difficulty that would arise was anticipated—the amendment was reported to the Convention as an amendment in the nature of a substitute, that is, striking out all after the enacting clause, and inserting an entire and a different plan. The parliamentary law recognizes no such thing as a substitute, but treats all propositions to amend as amendments. The Chair therefore states the question to be on agreeing to the amendment as a substitute for the original resolves. When the gentleman from Charlestown submitted his proposition, the Chair stated that it was not an amendment to an amendment, but an amendment which was in the nature of a substitute for both the other plans, and that it could not be entertained without general consent.

It is by no means an agreeable duty which devolves upon the Chair to determine points of order, either in regard to motions, or amenities of debate, when such decisions are unsolicited, and the Chair is reluctant to enforce a rigid adherence to parliamentary rules governing motions, unless in accordance with the general wish. In regard to the proposition reported from the Committee of the Whole as an amendment, it is to all intents in the nature of a substitute for the original resolves, and the Chair holds that a motion to amend so as to perfect that proposition or the proposition of the gentleman from Charlestown, that being admitted by general consent, does not contravene the parliamentary law in regard to amendments in the third degree.

Mr. FRENCH, of New Bedford, moved that when the question on the amendment be taken, it be taken by yeas and nays.

The motion was agreed to, and the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. THOMPSON moved that the Orders of the Day be laid upon the table.

The question being taken, the motion did not prevail.

Mr. CADY, of Monson. I moved to amend the amendment by striking out of the third paragraph the word "four" wherever it occurs, and inserting the word "five," so that as amended it will read: "Every town having five thousand inhabitants may elect two representatives annually; the mean increasing ratio shall be five thousand."

Mr. CADY, of Monson. I propose further to amend the amendment offered by the gentleman from Charlestown, by striking out from the first line of the second paragraph the word "four," and inserting the word "five," so that the clause as amended will read: "Every town having fifteen hundred, and less than five thousand inhabitants may elect one representative annually."

Mr. HALE, of Bridgewater. If in order, I will move to strike out the words "fifteen hundred."

Mr. PRESIDENT. The amendment is not in order at this time.

Mr. THOMPSON. I have no particular objection to the amending of my plan in the manner proposed by the gentleman from Monson, but it seems to me that he will accomplish nothing by striking out these words. On the contrary, I think that the amendment will, if adopted affect a large number of the towns which are now entitled to one representative, and throw quite a large number into the class of small towns, which will only be entitled to a representative once in two years. It is true, that it will reduce the size of the House to some extent, but I apprehend that it will work very differently from what the gentleman supposes. By thus increasing the ratio one thousand, I am not now prepared to say how many towns it will reduce to a representative for every other year only, but I should think it would reduce some fifteen or twenty. It strikes me that it will not affect the large towns or cities, but, that it will affect the medium towns, which, according to my plan, are entitled to a representative annually. This is my opinion as to what will be the practical operation of such an amendment if adopted.

Mr. CADY, of Monson. It was no part of my intention to affect the small towns at all, but I had in my mind a plan for reducing the House of Representatives. It is my impression that this is principally what the people desire—certainly it is, so far as my communication with them will allow me to judge. It is no part of my wish to injure the medium towns at all, or to give the smaller towns advantage over the larger towns, but I simply desire that something shall be done by which the representation of the people shall be made equal throughout the Commonwealth, and the size of the House of Representatives decreased as much as it can be consistently with justice and propriety. And, if there is anything in my proposition which will tend to produce a greater inequality than will be produced by any other plan, I hope it will not be adopted. As I said before, however, my object in submitting that amendment, was to provide for decreasing the size of the House of Representatives.

Mr. KEYES, for Abington. I hope that the amendment of the gentleman from Monson will not be adopted. And if it should not be agreed to by the Convention, I will move that the words "fifteen hundred" be stricken out, and the words "twelve hundred" be inserted, so that the amendment will be, in this particular, in accordance with the plan of the gentleman from Northampton, (Mr. Huntington). I shall then move to strike out, at the end of the third article, the words "four thousand," and insert the words "twelve thousand," so that the clause, as amended, will read: "Every town having four thousand inhabitants, may elect two representatives annually; the mean increasing ratio shall be twelve thousand." The meaning of that will then be, that towns having twelve thousand inhabitants may elect three representatives. I shall then propose to add another article: "That every town and city having more than twelve thousand inhabitants, may elect as many representatives as the number five thousand is contained in the number of the population." It seems to me, if the Committee had taken this matter in charge, they would have arrived at the same result which I have here proposed, but as that has not been permitted, as soon as the amendment of the gentleman from Monson is disposed of, I shall move the amendment which I have indicated.

The question was then taken on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Monson, and it was decided in the negative.

The amendment was accordingly rejected.

Mr. KEYES. I now move that the words "fifteen hundred" be stricken out of the first article, and the words "twelve hundred" be inserted.

The question was taken on the amendment, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. THOMPSON. I would suggest here, and I do so at the request of several gentlemen around me, an amendment which did not occur to me when this plan was drawn up. It is, to take the second article of the first resolve submitted by the gentleman from Lowell, and insert it between the first and second sections of my plan. The article reads as follows:—

Any two of such towns may, by a vote of a major part of the legal voters of each, at legal meetings thereof, unite together in a district, which shall be entitled to a representative each year, and which shall continue for a period of not less than five years, excepting the year in which the valuation of estates is settled.

Mr. OLIVER, of Lawrence. I would inquire whether the effect of this would not be to require that all the voters should be present?

Mr. THOMPSON. I think that difficulty could be obviated by inserting the word present in such manner that it would read, "that all the voters present," &c.

I would remark, that this matter has been brought to my attention during the past few moments for the first time. Hence a little difficulty may arise from my not having considered the point in question more deliberately. I should not suppose, however, that a gentleman possessing the legal acumen and knowledge of the gentleman from Lowell, would have drafted a provision of the important character of this, which would be liable to be applied in a different manner from that which he intended. If any difficulty should arise, however, it can be adjusted hereafter; my wish, now, simply being to provide a system of representation that shall be acceptable to all.

Mr. BUTLER, of Lowell. As this section, proposed to be taken from my amendment and inserted in that of the gentleman from Charlestown, was drawn up by myself, and as the gentleman from Lawrence has made an inquiry in regard to it, I may be permitted to say a word upon it. I am surprised that any legal gentleman, and much more so, that a military man should have asked such a question. The same inquiry arose some time ago in regard to elections of officers, and caused a great deal of trouble. It was finally submitted to the honorable and learned Attorney of the Commonwealth, who has since been elevated, or depressed, according as gentlemen may choose to consider it, from that office to the gubernatorial chair, [laughter,] and he gave an opinion which covers the whole subject, which may be found—for my friend's instruction—on the one hundred and fifteenth page of the Digest of the Militia Laws, a copy of which I brought here, expecting somebody to ask that question. [Laughter.] I should be happy to lend it to the gentleman.

Mr. OLIVER. I recollect the case, Sir, and I entirely dissent from that decision.

Mr. BUTLER. I will only say that I think this decision will be found to be governed by the decision of the supreme court, and that the majority of the legal voters—that is those voters who are present, not those who are a thousand miles distant on the ocean, but who are there—are the ones who do the voting, and elect the man of their choice. There is, therefore, no need of amending my proposition in the manner suggested; as it was drawn up with a full knowledge of all the facts.

Mr. GRISWOLD, for Erving. I do not precisely understand what is meant in the fourth paragraph of the first resolve by the phrase "ratio of towns." I would like to ask an explanation.

Mr. THOMPSON. My intention in drawing up that section, was to provide that on the increase of the inhabitants that might take place between one decennial period and another, the ratio of the towns would be increased, and the mean increasing ratio be so increased as to preserve the same relative proportion of political power, and the same number of representatives in the House of Representatives through all coming time, as is provided for by the plan now submitted.

Mr. GRISWOLD. From the explanation which the gentleman has given us of the proposition, I do not think it is as favorable as our present system of representation. For instance, if we take a town of fourteen hundred and ninety-nine inhabitants, we shall find, upon making the proper calculation, that it will be entitled to only six representatives in ten years. The small towns have more than that number under the present basis of representation which we have come here to correct. I hope the amendment, therefore, will not be adopted.

Mr. GARDNER, of Seekonk, moved to strike out, in the first and second sections, the words "fifteen hundred," and insert "one thousand."

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES, &c.—BOUTWELL—BRIGGS—ALLEN.

[June 30th.

The question being taken on agreeing to the motion, it was decided in the negative, so the motion did not prevail.

Mr. BOUTWELL, for Berlin. As it is rather late in the afternoon, and the seats are not all full, my own sense of respect to the proposition, and what I take to be the sense of the Convention also in this matter, as well as personal appeals from gentlemen who favor the amendment, impel me to ask that its further consideration be postponed until to-morrow. I dislike to have a question of so much importance as this taken without a fair opportunity for the expression of the views and opinions of members being allowed, and I therefore move that the Orders of the Day be laid upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

On motion by Mr. WILSON, the Convention then, at twenty-five minutes past 6 o'clock, adjourned.

THURSDAY, June 30, 1853.

The Convention assembled, and was called to order by the President, at 9 o'clock.

Prayer by the Chaplain.

The Journal of yesterday was read.

Reports from a Committee.

Mr. BRIGGS, of Pittsfield, from the Committee on the Encouragement of Literature, presented the following Reports, which were severally referred to the Committee of the Whole, and ordered to be printed.

On Female Education.

COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS.

In Convention, June 30, 1853.

The Committee on the Encouragement of Literature, to whom was referred an order of the Convention of the 20th of May last, on the subject of female education, and the petition of Harriet K. Hunt on the same subject, have considered the same, and report that, in the opinion of the Committee, the existing Constitution confers upon the legislature as ample powers to provide for the education of females as it does for the education of males, and that it is not necessary to alter it so as to provide for the education of females. They, therefore, recommend the adoption of the following resolution.

GEO. N. BRIGGS, Chairman.

Resolved, That it is not expedient to alter the Constitution so as to confer any additional powers upon the legislature in relation to the education of females.

Relating to the School Fund.

COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS.

In Convention, June 30, 1853.

The Committee on the Encouragement of Literature, to whom was referred an order of the Convention of the 31st of May, instructing them "to inquire into the expediency of so amending the Constitution, that the school fund belonging to the Commonwealth shall never be appropriated or applied to the support of any sectarian schools, or schools founded upon sectarian principles," have considered the same, and report the following resolution.

GEO. N. BRIGGS, Chairman.

Resolved, That it is expedient so to amend the Constitution as to provide that no public money in this Commonwealth, whether accruing from funds or raised by taxation, shall ever be appropriated for the support of sectarian or denominational schools.

Relating to the Union of the Boards of Education and Agriculture.

COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS.

In Convention, June 30, 1853.

The Committee on the Encouragement of Literature, to whom was referred an order of the Convention of the 23d of May last, directing them to consider the expediency of so altering the Constitution as to provide that the Board of Education and the Board of Agriculture shall be established as permanent departments of the government, have considered the same, and report the following resolution.

GEO. N. BRIGGS, Chairman.

Resolved, That it is not expedient so to alter the Constitution as to provide that a Board of Education and a Board of Agriculture shall be established as permanent departments of the government.

Plan of Representation.

Mr. VILES, of Lexington, presented the following plan as the basis of the representation in the House of Representatives, which was referred to the Committee of the Whole, and ordered to be printed:—

Resolved, That the Constitution be so amended that the House of Representatives shall be apportioned as follows:—

Towns containing two thousand inhabitants may be entitled to elect one representative every year.

Towns containing five thousand inhabitants shall be entitled to elect two representatives; and five thousand shall be the mean increasing ratio, for each and every additional representative.

Towns containing less than two thousand inhabitants shall be entitled to elect as many representatives in ten years as the number two hundred is contained in the number of inhabitants in said town. Also, entitled to elect an additional representative every decennial year.

On motion by Mr. WILSON, of Natick, the Convention resolved itself into

COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE,

Mr. Lord, of Salem, in the Chair, upon the Report relating to

The Reference of Legislative Acts to the People.

The Report was read by the Secretary, as follows:—

The Committee on so much of the Constitution as relates to the Frame of Government, &c., upon an order of May 17th, respecting the reference by the legislature to the people of legislative acts, for approval or rejection, report that it is inexpedient for the Convention to act thereon.

Mr. DAVIS, of Plymouth, moved that the Committee rise, and recommend to the Convention that the Report be accepted.

The motion was agreed to, and the Committee rose, and

IN CONVENTION,

The chairman of the Committee of the Whole reported, that they had had under consideration the Report submitted to them, and that he was instructed to recommend to the Convention that it ought to be accepted.

The Convention accordingly concurred in the recommendation of the Committee.

On motion by Mr. ALLEN, of Worcester, the Convention resolved itself into

COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE,

Mr. Earle, of Worcester, in the Chair, upon the Report from the Committee on the Frame of Government relating to

The Property of Married Women.

The Report was read, as follows:—

COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS.

In Convention, June 30, 1853.

The Committee on so much of the Constitution as relates to the Frame of Government, &c., to whom was referred an order of June 3d, instructing them to consider the expediency of securing to women, by constitutional provision, their property, acquired by devise, inheritance, or otherwise, and an order of May 20th, on the same subject, Report:—

That, in the opinion of the Committee, greater security than is now afforded by law, ought to be provided, for the preservation to married women, of the property acquired by them through the kindness of parents and friends, or by their own industry and prudence. The Committee have seen with much satisfaction, that, of late years, the course of legislation, and the decisions of enlightened judicial tribunals, have tended towards the alleviation of hardship and injustice resulting from the absolute control, which the husband and his creditors have had over most of the property of the wife. Evils still exist, which may be diminished or removed by legal enactment. But the Committee believe that the remedy can be most safely and beneficially applied by the action of the legislature, adjusting, in detail, the somewhat complicated relations, which result from the marriage contract. They therefore report that it is inexpedient for the Convention to act thereon.

CHARLES ALLEN, Chairman.

On motion, the Committee rose, and

IN CONVENTION,

The chairman reported, under instructions from the Committee, that the Report ought to be accepted, and it was accordingly accepted by the Convention.

Upon motion of Mr. ALLEN, of Worcester, the Convention went into

COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE,

Mr. Whitney, of Boylston, in the Chair, for the consideration of the Report of the Committee on the Frame of Government, relating to State Offenders.

The Report was read, as follows:—

The Committee on so much of the Constitution as relates to the Frame Government, &c., upon an order of June 9th, relative to the remuneration of persons tried for offences against the State and acquitted, report that it is inexpedient to act thereon.

On motion, the Committee rose, and,

THE GOVERNOR.—STATE CENSUS, &c.—DAVIS—EARLE.

[June 30th.

IN CONVENTION,

Reported, through its chairman, that the Report ought to be agreed to.

The Report was accepted.

Upon motion of Mr. ALLEN, of Worcester, the Convention again went into

COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE,

Mr. Wood, of Middleboro', in the Chair, upon the Report from the Committee on the Frame of Government, that it is inexpedient to act on

The Petition of Silas Lamson

And forty-four others.

The Committee concurred in the Report, without debate, and

IN CONVENTION,

The Report of the Committee of the Whole was concurred in.

On motion by Mr. WILSON, of Natick, the Convention went into

COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE,

On the subject of

The Judiciary,

Mr. James, of South Scituate in the Chair.

The Report was read, as follows:—

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred an order of June 6th, relating to granting the subject "a certain remedy in law, prompt and without delay," and an order of June 6, relating to the codification of the laws, have considered the same, and report that it is inexpedient to take further action upon the same.

On motion of Mr. HALL, of Haverhill, the Committee rose, and,

IN CONVENTION,

The chairman reported that the Committee had concurred in the Report, and recommended its adoption by the Convention.

The Report was adopted.

Mr. WILSON, of Natick, moved that the Convention resolve itself into

COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE,

for the consideration of the resolve reported by the Committee on so much of the Constitution as relates to

The Secretary, Treasurer, &c.

The motion was agreed to, and Mr. Davis, of Plymouth, was invited to take the Chair.

The resolve was read by the Secretary, as follows:—

Resolved, That it is inexpedient so to amend the Constitution as to require that "every person holding an office in or under the State government, shall retire therefrom at the expiration of six years' service."

On motion of Mr. JAMES, of South Scituate, the Committee rose, and,

IN CONVENTION,

The chairman reported that the Committee of the Whole had considered the subject referred to them, and recommended that the resolve ought to pass.

The Convention concurred in the recommendation, and the resolve was ordered to a second reading.

On motion of Mr. WILSON, of Natick, the rules were suspended, and the resolve was read a second time and finally passed.

On motion of Mr. WILSON, of Natick, the Convention resolved itself into

COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE,

Mr. Sargent, of Cambridge, in the Chair, on the Report relating to

The Governor.

The Report was read by the Secretary, as follows:—

The Committee to whom was referred so much of the Constitution in chapter 2, sect. 1, (except articles 9 and 10,) as relates to the Governor; a resolve of June 22, relative to the 7th article in chap. 2d; a Report of the Committee of the 14th of June, relative to the 7th article; have attended to the duty assigned them, and submit the following Report:—

The Committee having ascertained, that the Committee to whom was referred so much of the Constitution as relates to the Militia, had reported to the Convention an article upon which the Convention have acted, that it becomes necessary to strike out of the Constitution, the said 7th article. They, therefore, report the following resolve:—

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Constitution by striking out the whole of article 7th, in section 1st, chapter 2d.

Mr. DAVIS, of Plymouth. I do not rise because I am opposed to the Report of the Committee, but because I believe that document is not yet printed; gentlemen here do not find it upon their files. I am of the opinion that the subject will cause some debate, and under the circumstances, I submit the motion that the Committee now rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. DAVIS, of Worcester. I trust that that motion will not prevail. The Report has been printed, and it will be found in Document No. 88. The reason why the Committee have reported in favor of striking out this article, is, that the Military Committee, who have had the subject under consideration, have reported an article to the Convention which has been adopted by the Committee of the Whole and reported back to the Convention; and that article entirely supersedes this which it is proposed to strike out.

Mr. DAVIS, of Plymouth. I was not aware that this subject had been acted upon by the Convention, having been absent at that time. Since that is the case, I withdraw my motion.

Mr. DAVIS, of Worcester. I move that the Committee now rise, and report to the Convention that the resolve ought to pass.

The motion was agreed. The Committee accordingly rose, and the President having resumed the Chair of

THE CONVENTION,

The chairman, Mr. Sargent, of Cambridge, reported that the Committee of the Whole had had under consideration the Report of the Committee in relation to striking out article 7th in section 1st, chapter 2d, of the Constitution, and that the resolve which the Committee had reported ought to pass.

The Report was accepted, and the resolve was ordered to a second reading.

Mr. EARLE, of Worcester, moved that the resolve take its second reading at this time.

Unanimous consent being given, the resolve was then read a second time and passed.

Mr. EARLE, of Worcester, moved that the Convention resolve itself into Committee of the Whole upon the resolve reported by the Committee on the Frame of Government in relation to the State Census.

The Convention accordingly resolved itself into

COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE,

Mr. Hooper, of Fall River, in the Chair, and proceeded to consider the said resolve, which was read as follows:—

Resolved, That the Constitution be so amended as to require that a census of the State be taken in the year 1855, and on every tenth year from and after that period.

Mr. EARLE. I move to amend that resolve by inserting after the words "census of the," the words "whole population of the," so that the resolve will read as follows:—

Resolved, That the Constitution be so amended as to require that a census of the whole population of the State be taken in the year 1855, and on every tenth year from and after that period.

The object of the amendment which I have offered, is, to provide that in taking the State census the entire population of the State shall be taken. Heretofore the practice has been to take that portion only upon which representation is based, and the effect of it is, that we do not get the entire population; therefore it does not compare with the census which is taken by the United States government. My object is to base it upon the same principle upon which the census is taken by the United States; and then the legislature may provide by law for any distinction or classification they please, or they may take the census as it is now taken, and in addition take all the other population. There has been a general desire, heretofore, that the entire census should be taken, because, as it is now taken, it answers but one purpose, the main purpose, it is true, for which it is taken, viz., to ascertain the number upon which representation is to be based. But here are a great many other objects in taking at census; while for any other purpose than that, the census is incomplete and imperfect, whereas, if the entire population is taken, as the United States census is, it will afford a comparison every five years as to the population of the State, and would be useful for every other purpose for which a census is taken, besides fixing the basis of representation. Heretofore, when it has been proposed that an entire census should be taken, the objection has been made by the assessors or those who take the census, that they had no authority to do it—they are usually paid according to the number of the population, provided for by law, and there is a little addition of time required if they take the whole census, in order to make out their returns, for which they would receive no compensation. For this reason, I propose that they shall be authorized by law to take a complete census, and I have therefore moved this amendment.

Thursday,]

STATE CENSUS.—LIVERMORE—WALKER—BRIGGS—WILKINS—BANKS.

[June 30th.]

Mr. LIVERMORE, of Cambridge. The Committee who reported this resolve intended that the census should cover the whole population of the State, and supposed that their Report would be sufficient to accomplish that object. I have no objection to the amendment which is proposed by the gentleman from Worcester, if it is thought that it will make the resolve more explicit.

Mr. EARLE. I ought to have remarked, and I intended to have done so before I took my seat, that this thing suggested itself to my mind, and I had no opportunity to consult with any member of the Committee except the chairman. I did consult with the chairman, and he requested me, in case he was not present when this subject came up, to propose this amendment, inasmuch as if the resolve should be passed as it is, it might be supposed that it was only intended to change the year when the census was to be taken, and did not intend to enlarge that census as it is proposed to do by this amendment.

Mr. RANTOUL. I would inquire of the gentleman from Worcester, what class of the population has heretofore been omitted in the taking of the census.

Mr. EARLE. Formerly, as I understand it, State paupers, persons in prison, persons in charitable institutions of various kinds, and students in our public seminaries, have not been included in the taking of the census. For this reason we find that in the census of all the towns in the State, with very few, if any exceptions, as taken by the State, the number is less than it is when taken by the United States government, making a difference of several thousands in the whole population of the State.

Mr. GRISWOLD, for Erving. I do not rise for the purpose of opposing this Report, but rather for the purpose of inquiring the object of taking the census at this intermediate period. This is a matter which would be attended with considerable expense. I have not heard anything said upon the subject, but I hardly know why the census which was taken in 1850 will not answer all necessary purposes until 1860. I should like to have a little explanation of this matter from the chairman of the Committee who reported this resolve.

Mr. LIVERMORE. I do not see the chairman of the Committee in his seat, but being a member of the Committee I will give what explanation I can. The object of the resolve, as I understand it is this: the census is to be taken by the United States in 1860, and every ten years thereafter; and if we have it taken by the State in 1855, and every ten years thereafter, we shall have the population of the State enumerated twice in every ten years. The expense of taking one census certainly could not be very great, and the Committee were of the opinion that it might be well to take the census soon after the adoption of the amendments to the Constitution by the people, and to continue taking it every ten years thereafter at intermediate periods with the United States census. There has heretofore been a great discrepancy between the census of the United States and the census which the Commonwealth has had taken, in consequence of the omission in the latter case to take the classes of population that the gentleman from Worcester has named; and I believe the Committee were unanimously in favor of the proposition to have it taken by the State in 1855 and every ten years thereafter.

Mr. WALKER, of North Brookfield. In 1845, a census was taken of the industry of Massachusetts. There had been one taken previously, and there was an understanding at that time, as I was told, that such an account or census should be taken every ten years. I believe it is well understood that that census is a very important one for the interests of this Commonwealth. It is the general opinion that such statistics ought to be taken once in every ten years, in order that we may see how our population is increasing; for it is increasing, and our industry also is increasing very rapidly. It is of great importance that the inhabitants of Massachusetts should know what her industry is, and what her interests are; this knowledge can only be derived from that document; and no document, as I can say from my own knowledge, is regarded with so much interest, both by persons in the Commonwealth and persons abroad, all over the world, who desire to know the condition of Massachusetts, as that document. It was supposed to be the policy of the Commonwealth to continue to collect such statistics, and it was thought desirable, in connection with them, to take a census of the population. If we take it in 1855, the United States will take it again in 1860, and thus we may by this arrangement have the census taken regularly every five years hereafter, and the census which is taken by the Commonwealth, will include all the industrial interests. For one, Sir, I feel that this is a very important matter, and I had supposed that it was regarded by every-body as the settled policy of Massachusetts, hereafter, every once in ten years to have a statement furnished of the industry and the progress of the State. It has a great and important bearing upon the legislation of the country, and will exert a powerful influence in sustaining the credit and the reputation of the Commonwealth abroad. I deem this a document of more importance than any other which has been issued by the State; and I hope, therefore, that the proposition which is reported by the Committee, will commend itself to the approbation of this body.

Mr. BRIGGS, of Pittsfield. I presume the whole object of this resolve is to change the year when this census is to be taken. It is not a new proposition, as gentlemen seem to suppose, but there already exists in the Constitution a provision for the taking of the census. The 13th article of the amendments to the Constitution provides that "a census of the inhabitants of each city and town on the first day of May shall be taken and returned into the secretary's office on or before the last day of June, of the year 1840, and of every tenth year thereafter, which census shall determine the apportionment of senators and representatives for the term of ten years." By the existing provisions of the Constitution, therefore, a census of all the inhabitants of the cities and towns is to be taken on every tenth year, beginning with 1840. I suppose the object of the Committee was to change it so as to give us two enumerations of the inhabitants every ten years instead of one, and that ours should be on the year 1855, 1865, and so on, while the United States government would continue to take it in 1860, 1870, &c. Ours will then come half way between theirs. It seems to me that the amendment of the gentleman from Worcester, is entirely unnecessary, but at the same time it will do no harm, because, by this provision of the Constitution, the census will be of the population of the State, and that certainly includes all the inhabitants of the State. When you take a census for the purpose of taxation, I understand that a discrimination is made by the law of the State under which it is taken.

Mr. WILKINS, of Boston. It strikes me, Mr. Chairman, that it is much better that this census or these statistical tables should be prepared on the decennial years 1850, 1860, 1870, &c., if we are going to continue the policy of having them taken by the authority of the State. I think it would be better to have it done on the valuation year, than to have it taken in 1855 to be used in 1860. I supposed we should continue to make these enumerations, as they have heretofore been made, at the time when we make our valuation, and then we can have all our statistics founded upon that, and connected with it, instead of having them taken on intermediate years. I think it would be entirely useless, except as a matter of mere curiosity; at any rate, it could not be of any permanent use to have two-censuses taken within this period of years provided in the Constitution. I have no sort of opposition to the general object of a census, and once in ten years it is very useful; but it seems to me that this is quite often enough, and when it is done, it ought to be done at the time of, if not by the same persons who have in charge, the valuation of the Commonwealth. I hope, therefore, that this proposition will be rejected, and that the whole matter will remain as it is now.

Mr. BANKS. It seems to me that the Committee determines that the time for taking the census or enumeration of the inhabitants of the State shall be changed from the year 1850 to 1855, and from 1860 to 1865, and so on; and that carries with it the whole proposition. It carries the subject which was introduced by the gentleman from North Brookfield, and it also carries the subject which was introduced by the gentleman from Boston, who has just taken his seat. The valuation of estates is fixed by order of the general court; and if the Constitution should require that a census of the inhabitants shall be taken in 1855, and every ten years thereafter, the general court, will of course follow the same rule in fixing the valuation of estates. If, therefore, we shall decide that this is the proper time for the census to be taken, it will cover the whole question. The provision in the Constitution with regard to valuation, is found in the last part of article 4 of the first chapter in relation to the frame of government, and the legislative power. It provides that "while the public charges of government, or any part thereof, shall be assessed on polls and estates in the manner that has hitherto been practiced, in order that such assessments may be made with equality, there shall be a valuation of estates within the Commonwealth, taken anew once in every ten years at least, and as much oftener as the general court shall order." It will therefore fall within the constitutional provision if the Constitution shall establish this rule.

Mr. WILKINS. If that is the design of this amendment, if it is only intended to change the period of the apportionment or the valuation year, it seems to me that it ought to say so, and it should be understood that this is a substitute for what is already there. But it does not do that. It says that a census shall be taken on these years which are designated, leaving it to be inferred that the old provisions of the Constitution shall be continued. There is nothing in this resolve that forbids, or even intimates that it is not intended, that a census shall be taken in 1860. Indeed, Sir, if I remember rightly, in some proposition upon which we have acted here, we have adopted the year 1860 as the next valuation year, and it was understood that the old system was to continue in this respect. I hope, Sir, that those who have the framing of amendments to the Constitution, will take care that there is no conflict between their various provisions—that one does not cross the track of another. As I understand by this resolve, we do provide for the taking of two censuses every ten years; and that I regard as entirely useless. All the census that we need should be taken on the valuation year; and if it is the intention to change that, the resolve should say so.

Mr. WALKER. I do not understand that this has the effect, at all, of changing the Constitution. It merely provides that a census shall be taken in 1855. If the statistics of industry are to be taken in 1855, it will cost next to nothing to take a census at the same time; and it will be very desirable that a census of the population should accompany the census of the industry of the Commonwealth. Then in 1860 the United States government will take a census of the population and all the industry of the State of Massachusetts; and of course we shall thus have a census, both of our population and of our industry, once in every five years, which is certainly a thing very much to be desired. Then, in addition to that, another census will be taken in 1860 by the State. So be it. We always have had it, and I suppose we always will have it.

I am just informed by gentlemen around me, that this resolve simply changes the time of taking the census, from the year 1860 to the year 1855. If that is so, I agree to it, and there will be no objection to that.

At any rate it seems to me that this resolve is proper, inasmuch as it provides for taking the census of the population at the same time that the statistics of the industry of the State will be taken. In 1852 the legislature authorized the Secretary of State to prepare an Abstract of the returns of the United States of 1850, combined with such other facts as he might deem expedient, to illustrate the progress in population, industry, and wealth of the towns and cities of the Commonwealth. Upon an examination of the subject, it was thought by the Secretary of State, and those he consulted, that it would be more for the interest of the Commonwealth, if the object proposed was deferred until 1855, when it was understood that the general statistics of the industry of the State would be taken.

Mr. EARLE, of Worcester. I am inclined to think, from remarks made by gentlemen around me, that this subject is misunderstood. They suppose that it is intended to have a census taken, as provided for by the Constitution as it now stands, and also to have an additional census taken, so that there shall be a State census taken every five years. I do not so understand it. I understand the object of the resolve to be, simply to change the time from the year 1860 to the year 1855, and then require the State census to be taken every ten years thereafter, for instance, in 1865, 1875, and so on. The design is to bring it intermediate with the time of taking the United States census, which is in 1860, 1870, and every ten years thereafter. We shall then have a census every five years, one taken by the United States, and the other by the State. We are now at the expense of taking a State census the same year that the United States census is taken. It is an imperfect census, and therefore, except for special purposes of legislation, of no use whatever. Under this proposition, it will be taken in a perfect form, in 1855, 1865, 1875, &c. If taken at those periods, it will afford us data of comparison of the relative number of inhabitants, and of the industrial resources of the State, each recurring five years, and will be for all purposes of the same use as the United States census. This incurs no additional expense, above what is now imposed upon us. It has been spoken of by the inhabitants of other States with surprise, that we take our State census the same year with that of the United States, when we might as well take it at intermediate periods. In the State of New York, under a provision contained in their revised Constitution, similar to the one proposed here, they take their State census in 1855, and every ten years thereafter, so that it shall come intermediate between the periods of taking the United States census.

Mr. HALE, of Bridgewater. The amendment of the gentleman from Worcester, so far as I understand it, is merely to carry out the intention of the Committee which reported the resolve, which was that there should be an entire census of the population taken in 1855, and every ten years thereafter. It was not intended by the Committee, I believe, to take an additional census beyond that now required to be taken by the present Constitution, but merely to change the year from 1860 to 1855. It was considered that it might be necessary to take a census in 1855, in consequence of the alterations which may be made to the Constitution by this Convention. It seems to be objected that the valuation of the estate of the Commonwealth is required to be taken in the years 1860, 1870, and every ten years thereafter. But I believe that, by this Constitution, the legislature is required to provide for taking that valuation the same year that the census will be required to be taken, if this amendment is adopted. If it is not so now, this amendment may be so modified as to require that the census of the population, and the valuation of estates, shall be taken in the same year.

I believe that it will be acceptable to the people to have a new valuation taken as early as 1855, for I believe it is generally admitted that the basis of the present valuation is unequal, although a great deal of time was spent by the legislature in arranging that basis. I have not looked at the Constitution, but as I heard it read by the gentleman from Waltham, it is competent for the legislature, without our making any provision, to change the time of taking the valuation. As I understand it, the legislature is required to provide that the valuation shall be taken every ten years, or oftener. So it is not necessary, if I am correct in my supposition, to make any provision in the Constitution to change the time of taking the valuation.

Mr. ALLEN, of Worcester. I apprehend that no difficulty can arise from the proposed amendment to the Constitution. It is apparent that the object of this proposition is, to require that the census shall be taken in the year 1855, in the place of the one which is required by the present Constitution. The Committee on the Frame of Government, had not that part of the Constitution before them, as it was not committed to them. That provides that the census shall be taken every decennial period, and it was not within their province to make a special report, to alter that part of the instrument. But when they reported upon the matter which was submitted to them, that this Constitution should be amended, and that the decennial census should be taken in 1855, 1865, &c. It was supposed by them, that it would be understood by the whole Convention, and by the Committee, upon whom should devolve the duty of putting into form the resolves which shall be adopted by this Convention, that it was intended that that census should be a substitute, and not an additional one. But, in order to remove every possible doubt as to its meaning, as soon as the present amendment is disposed of, I shall move to add to the resolve these words, "instead of the decennial census, now required by the Constitution."

There must be many reasons why we should change the time of taking the decennial census. The Constitution as amended, if it shall be adopted by the people, will go into effect immediately. There will, probably, be some change made in regard to the basis of representation in the House of Representatives, and, undoubtedly, in that of the Senate of the Commonwealth, and there must be a propriety in basing them, at the earliest period, upon the present population, and not upon that which has been determined by the former census. Undoubtedly, the legislature will make the valuation year conform to that in which the census shall be taken.

The question was then taken upon the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Worcester, (Mr. Earle,) and it was decided in the affirmative.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLEN. I now move to amend the resolve as amended, by adding thereto the words "instead of the decennial census now required by the Constitution" so that the resolve shall read:—

Resolved, That the Constitution be so amended as to require that a census of the whole population of the State be taken in the year 1855, and in every tenth year from and after that period, instead of the decennial census now required by the Constitution.

The question was then taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BRIGGS, of Pittsfield. I suggest to the chairman of the Committee, if he thinks it worth while to do so, that he shall make the provision conform to the present Constitution, so as to define the mode and manner in which the census shall be taken. As it now stands it is simply a general provision that a census of the population shall be taken once in ten years.

The gentleman from Worcester, (Mr. Earle,) says, that under the present law, the whole population of the State is not taken, but that public paupers and criminals confined in the prisons of the State, are left out. I apprehend, if such be the case, that it has arisen from this fact. The Constitution provides that a census of the inhabitants of each town and city shall be taken.

Thursday,]

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, &c.—EARLE—GRAY—BRIGGS—DAVIS.

[June 30th.]

Under that provision, when the census of the county of Worcester, shall be taken it would not include persons then imprisoned, or, perhaps, persons in the asylum, who are inhabitants of other towns. The census of the towns or counties where they belong should include them as inhabitants of those towns, but they being absent, are probably omitted in the enumeration.

Now my proposition guards against what may be an evil. Under the general terms of the resolve, these persons may be taken twice over. The inmates of a prison in the county town may be taken in the town where the prisoner is, and then they may be taken again in the town where they belong. And so with persons in the county poorhouse.

I do not know that it is important that such a provision should be made, and if it is not, I certainly would not press it. But it seems to me that it would be a little more certain and specific to adopt the existing provisions of the Constitution, so as to provide that "the inhabitants of each city and town" shall be taken in 1855, &c., instead of at the present decennial year.

Mr. EARLE, of Worcester. I suppose that the resolutions of amendment which we shall pass, when they come to be put into form in the new Constitution, are not to be followed out literally. They can be put into the form which may be necessary to carry out the intention of the Convention.

Now if what the gentleman from Pittsfield suggests, is true, I would ask why it is that the returns under the State census, of the population of almost all of the towns of the Commonwealth, fall considerably below those which are made under the census taken by the United States? As I understand it, under the United States census, no more people can be returned than there are, because a list of the names of every person is taken, and if they get duplicate names, it is ascertained from a comparison, and the error is corrected. By comparing the returns of the State census with those of the United States census, the former is often found to fall many thousand below the latter, and it has always been attributed by the assessors, to the fact that certain portions of the population were excluded in the towns, as well as in the cities. Take, for instance, State paupers, who have been paupers for years, and residents of the towns where they are, almost from their youth, and, perhaps, always will be. They are excluded from the census. Therefore, it appears to me that the amendment is a proper one.

As to the form in which the amendments shall appear in the Constitution, that matter can be attended to by the Committee upon whom that duty devolves. At any rate, a provision which shall guard against the taking of any portion of the population twice, is certainly within the province of the legislature to regulate, and it can be guarded against by them, much better than it can be done by us, by inserting a provision to that effect in the Constitution.

Mr. GRAY, of Boston. There was a point raised by the question of the gentleman from Pittsfield, (Mr. Briggs,) to which I attach more importance and consequence than he does. It seems to me, that at some point of time, and at some branch of the business of the Convention, it is well worth while to consider whether the Convention will not go a little more into detail as to the mode of taking the census.

In reference to another matter, I may be permitted to say a word, and that is the subject of representation. It is only necessary to say that all the schemes that have been presented to us—whatever their merits or demerits may be—have had reference, somewhat, to population, and yet not one of them has undertaken to define what the word "population" shall mean; neither do we define it now. I recollect, that in 1840, when the last act was passed, touching representation, that point was a matter of some debate, and finally the census was taken in the manner prescribed by statute. The same statute was followed in taking the census of 1850.

My friend adverts to the liability of taking the same person twice over. The prisoners in the house of correction, for instance, may be taken in the town where the house of correction may be located, and also in the town where he belongs. But as was suggested by one gentleman, they do not belong, and never will belong, to any place but the one where they are kept in confinement, except those of them who may be reformed.

I throw out these suggestions that the Convention may keep in mind whether it be not expedient here, or somewhere else, when they speak of taking the census, to define, in some degree, what part of the population that census shall include. I am not prepared to make a motion upon the subject, but am satisfied with bringing it to the attention of the Convention.

On motion of Mr. HALE, of Bridgewater, the Committee rose, and the President having resumed the Chair of the CONVENTION,

The chairman, (Mr. Hooper, of Fall River,) reported the resolve with amendments.

The PRESIDENT stated the question to be upon concurring with the Committee of the Whole in inserting in the second line of the resolve, after the word "the," the words "whole population of," and in adding, at the end of the resolve, the words "instead of the decennial census now required by the Constitution."

Mr. BRIGGS, of Pittsfield, moved to amend the amendment by striking out the words, "whole population of," and inserting the language of the present Constitution, viz.: "all the inhabitants of each city and town."

The amendment was agreed to.

The question then recurred upon the adoption of the amendment as amended, which, if adopted, would make the whole resolve read as follows:—

Resolved, That the Constitution be so amended as to require that a census of all the inhabitants of the State be taken in the year 1855, and on every tenth year from and after that period, instead of the decennial census now required by the Constitution.

The question was taken, and the amendment, as amended, was adopted.

The resolve, as amended, was then ordered to a second reading, and

On motion of Mr. EARLE, of Worcester, the rule having been suspended for that purpose, was read a second time and passed.

Mr. STETSON, of Braintree, moved that the Convention resolve itself into Committee of the Whole upon the Report of the Committee upon the expediency of granting the loan of the State credit to private corporations.

Mr. WILSON, of Natick, said he hoped that the motion would not prevail, but that the Convention would proceed to consider the unfinished business of yesterday relating to the basis of representation.

The PRESIDENT remarked that the motion was not debatable.

The question was then taken, and the motion of the gentleman from Braintree, (Mr. Stetson,) was disagreed to.

On motion of Mr. WILSON, of Natick, the Convention then proceeded to the consideration of the Orders of the Day.

The PRESIDENT stated that the first business in the Orders of the Day was the Report of the Committee of the Whole, upon

The Basis of Representation.

The Committee had reported an amendment, it being the proposition submitted by the gentleman from Lowell, (Mr. Butler,) for which the gentleman from Charlestown, (Mr. Thompson,) had moved a substitute; the question pending was therefore upon the adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from Charlestown.

Mr. DAVIS, of Plymouth. It seems to me, that although opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Lowell, as it now stands, it would be more expedient for us, that is for those who are opposed to that amendment, to endeavor to perfect it before any substitute is offered, the effect of which will be to destroy it altogether.

I stated in the Convention yesterday that I was opposed to the proposition of the gentleman from Lowell, as it now stands, but it was not then in order to state my reasons for that opposition. I propose now, before I sit down, to offer an amendment, not to that of the gentleman from Charlestown, which I confess I prefer to that of the gentleman from Lowell, but to the original amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole, the object of which is to perfect that proposition before the question is taken upon the motion to strike it out. I think such an amendment is in order.

I had occasion, Mr. President, yesterday, to state that I believed the small towns demanded too much. I still adhere to that opinion. I concur entirely with the gentleman from Northampton, (Mr. Huntington,) in the very able and statesmanlike speech which he made upon this subject, in Committee of the Whole yesterday. I agree with him that the Convention ought not to adopt any plan which makes the minimum of representation less than 1,200 inhabitants. The question has been asked, victoriously, apparently, by those who have taken part in this debate, what this Convention was called for? Whether it was not solely, or almost solely, on account of the question of representation? I admit that it was. But then they ask whether it was not called for the purpose of giving to the small towns full corporate representation? Here, Mr. President, I am compelled to take issue with them. I say it was not called for that purpose, but, on the contrary, I say that what was claimed before by the people, what was claimed by me as one of the people, and what was claimed by those with whom I acted, was, that under the present system the small towns would finally be destroyed, and that it was necessary to call a Convention to put a stop

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.—DAVIS.

[June 30th.

to that sliding scale in representation provided for under the existing system which would ultimately entirely destroy the representation of the small towns. Another reason for calling the Convention was because, under the present system of election by general ticket in the cities, the individual voters at the polls possessed a much greater power in the cities than in the small towns in the country. These were reasons at any rate sufficient to induce me to advocate the calling of a Convention, and to induce me to vote for it, whatever other reasons may have existed in the minds of others who were friends of this Convention.

I ask, then, Mr. President, whether it is reasonable, knowing as we do, the almost universal wish of the people to have the number of members of your House of Representatives diminished as much as possible; I say, is it reasonable, or was it expected beforehand that the small towns should come here and demand the right to send a representative every year from each town, however small in population? I certainly heard no such doctrine plainly and openly advocated before the election. But the Convention was called. These small towns came forward and demanded a full representation every year. That demand was acceded to by the majority of the Committee to whom the subject of representation was referred, and a Report was brought in by them, making such a provision.

But it has been stated that the amendment reported by the gentleman from Lowell, (Mr. Butler,) is a compromise, a kind of "go between," a half-way plan between the Report of the minority of the Committee, which was the district system, founded solely upon population, and the Report of the majority, which was founded upon absolute and complete town representation. Now, Sir, I contend that there is no compromise in the proposition of the gentleman from Lowell, which has been presented here for our adoption. I will admit, that as far as the amendment goes, the doctrine of town representation has been abandoned. I do not mean abandoned, in the sense in which the gentleman from Northampton, (Mr. Huntington,) used the term in his remarks yesterday when he alluded to a certain decision of the supreme court, but I mean to say that the amendment of the gentleman from Lowell has abandoned the right—the absolute right—of the towns to yearly representation. And I mean to say upon the other side, what must be sufficiently apparent, that this Convention has decided, by a vote which cannot be mistaken, that no clean district system of representation founded upon population shall at this time be presented to the people of the Commonwealth.

Now, under these circumstances, what is just and reasonable for the small towns to ask at the hands of the Convention? If they get, by the action of this Constitutional Convention, or by the amendments which we shall propose for the adoption of the people, a division of the cities, or if they shall get what is to them still more important, an anchorage ground, a ground which will put an end to that sliding scale, resulting from the system under which we now exist; if they get ground upon which they may cast anchor, so that the towns having twelve, fifteen, or eighteen hundred inhabitants, are sure of sending a representative every year hereafter, as they do now; if they can have a provision about which there can be no misunderstanding; that shall forever destroy this sliding scale; if they can gain such a system as that, ought not the small towns of the Commonwealth to be satisfied? Is it reasonable that they should ask for more? To be sure, it does not assert the principle of absolute town representation but it secures to all the towns with that number of inhabitants, a yearly representation for all time to come. And while upon this point, let me say that I concur fully with the position of the gentleman from Boston, (Mr. Giles,) who spoke upon this subject yesterday from the other side of the House, that the people of these small towns are entitled to be represented every year. I admit the principle, but I believe this Convention has decided that the people of the towns do not want a district representation, and if the people of these towns prefer corporate representation a fractional part of the time, to representation by districts the whole time, why I should not object to their claiming it as their right, but they come forward and claim it as a right that they should be represented here as towns, every year, to the prejudice of all the larger towns, as well as the cities, and with the certainty of an unwieldy House staring them in the face. I admit that in proportion to their population they are justly and fairly entitled to representation all the time. But that is not what it is proposed to give them. If I understand this amendment, it proposes to give to all the small towns containing less than 1,000 inhabitants the right to send six representatives every ten years. Now, Sir, there is no principle in that.

But this Convention having decided that there is to be no district system founded on population submitted to the people, it seems to me proper that we should amend the amendment of the gentleman from Lowell before we proceed to vote upon such other propositions as may be offered as substitutes, and before we are compelled to vote against it as I should certainly do if driven to vote upon it in its present form. I prefer a district system founded upon voters, but will not vote for it until all hope of perfecting this amendment is gone. The system set forth, in that plan, I contend operates unjustly and unequally upon the different portions of the Commonwealth. I tell this Convention that no such system as that, even if it is received favorably by the people at present, can continue in favor, I care not upon what principle it is founded, for any length of time with the people. In this connection I care not what its effects are upon the county of Plymouth one way or the other. I, for one, would not return to my constituents and say to them we have adopted a system of representation in the House and the Senate which destroys the power—not of any particular neighborhood, but of four or five of the counties of the Commonwealth and gives that power to the other portion of the Commonwealth, yet that is the practical effect of the system which is recommended by the gentleman from Lowell.

I say, it is a fact which I am obliged to look at as an honest man, as a friend of this Convention, and as a friend, I hope, of the Constitution which this Convention may frame. It is stated, and in this respect the statistics of the gentleman from Lowell are very ingenious, that if we found this system upon votes as they were given in 1850, these inequalities do not appear. I submit, that such statistics as these do not form a fair statement by which men of sense can judge of the operation of this system. There are various causes which might operate. It might rain on election day in one part of the Commonwealth, while in another part of the State the weather might be fair and pleasant. Local interests might exercise an influence in one part of the State, and the passions of men be greatly excited in consequence, while such a state of feeling would not exist in another part of the State.

Now, I ask gentlemen of the Convention to look at another fact, and that is, that whether you take, in point of fact, the actual voters of the south-eastern counties, or take the population, according to the amendment of the gentleman from Lowell, (Mr. Butler,) there is a proportionate loss upon the present system as compared with the whole number of members, a loss upon the population by the district system as proposed by the gentleman from Boston, (Mr. Hale,) and a loss by any system which has yet been proposed, unless, perhaps, it be that of the gentleman from Charlestown, (Mr. Frothingham.) I understand that some of the western counties, with a population of four thousand or five thousand less than the south-eastern counties, are to have a representation of ninety, whereas these south-eastern counties are to have a representation of about seventy. I repeat it, that you must consider the fact that you cannot get this amendment ratified by the people, that the people, not only of these south-eastern counties, but of other counties of the State, have sense of justice enough not to ratify any such system. I find all around me, out of the Convention, gentlemen of my own party and gentlemen of other parties, who have looked into this system, who say uniformly that the plan offered by the gentleman from Lowell is unfair, although they don't take the trouble to say that they will not vote for it; that follows as a matter of course. Without intending to make a set speech upon this question, let me merely state, in this connection, with regard to the arguments used by the gentleman for Manchester, (Mr. Dana,) in his extemporaneous but very able speech, and those used by the gentleman for Berlin in his instructive speech upon the subject, I am not fully convinced that they prove an actual necessity exists for town corporate representation. I will say that the arguments, authorities and illustrations which they have adduced should be strictly investigated. What do they prove? I understood one or both of them to say that at one time in England, and at other times upon the continent, municipal corporations were the safeguards and the very citadels of liberty. I ask, Mr. President, if it proves anything if it does not prove too much, because the fact is that when liberty was protected on the continent and in England by these corporations, it was protected generally by the large cities and walled towns. I do not believe that any comparison can be made between the cities of Europe and the cities of this country, between the peasantry of Europe and the yeomanry of New England. And farther, I do not believe, because the municipalities on the continent or the provinces of France or the districts in England, have been of great assistance to liberty and republican institutions heretofore in cases where free principles were first introduced, that it follows, by any means, that in this Commonwealth, where republican institutions have been established for more than two hundred years, born with our birth, grown with our growth, where free principles have been imbibed with our mothers' milk, it is vital to our liberties or a republican form of government, that representatives should be sent from the towns. Neither do I believe it is a fact because you take away the right of a town, as a town, to send a representative, that you destroy municipal rights and privileges, or that you do anything necessarily to blot out that spirit of liberty which, I admit, is breathed more purely in the small towns over the hills and valleys of New England. I do believe that the argument adduced upon this floor, so far as it went to show that large cities should not be entitled to an amount of representatives proportionate to their population, was a sound one; but with regard to that I have nothing to say at this time. If the amendment is to be carried I merely wish to offer this amendment, to strike out the first paragraph of the amendment of the gentleman from Lowell, and insert the following, which will not greatly alter the result, but declares a rule which has more of reason to support it:—

Each and every town having five hundred inhabitants or less shall be entitled to five representatives in ten years. Each town having between five hundred and fifteen hundred inhabitants shall be entitled to an additional representative in ten years for every two hundred additional inhabitants, and each town having less than fifteen hundred inhabitants shall have an additional representative in every ten years for valuation year: provided, that no more than one representative shall be sent in any one year.

I think it proper I should state, that the amendment I offer is strictly a portion of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Winchendon. If gentlemen will consider the effect of the amendment, they will perceive that it gives a town having 1,300 inhabitants a representative every year, and it gives a town with less than 500 inhabitants a representative six years in ten, by which they will have more representation than they have under the present system. It gives every town of 1,200 inhabitants a representative nine years in ten, by which they get more representation than they now have.

The PRESIDENT. Does the gentleman move this as a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Charlestown, (Mr. Thompson)?

Mr. DAVIS. I understand the amendment of the gentleman from Charlestown to strike out the whole of the proposition of the gentleman from Lowell, and insert his amendment in the place thereof. I wish, at present, to strike out only the first clause of the amendment of the gentleman from Lowell, and insert what has been read by the Clerk.

Mr. HOOPER, of Fall River. I rise to a question of order in relation to that amendment. I would inquire of the Chair, if the question before the Convention is not the Majority Report, and whether, pending that, the gentleman from Lowell, (Mr. Butler,) has not offered an amendment, as a substitute for the Majority Report, and which the Convention has not as yet adopted? To that amendment the gentleman from Charlestown, (Mr. Thompson,) has offered an amendment, and now it seems that the gentleman from Plymouth offers an amendment to that of the gentleman from Charlestown.

The PRESIDENT. The gentleman from Fall River, (Mr. Hooper,) renews the question which was decided during the session of last evening.

The position of the question before the Convention is this. Resolves upon the basis of the House of Representatives, were reported by the Select Committee appointed to consider that matter. The resolves were referred to the Committee of the Whole, and were reported back to the Convention with an amendment, which stands in the nature of a substitute for the original resolves. The gentleman from Charlestown, (Mr. Thompson,) then moved an amendment to the amendment, which was in fact an entire substitute for the amendment reported by the Committee of the Whole. The Chair ruled the amendment out of order, upon the ground that a second substitute could not be admitted, as an amendment, pending the question upon the amendment reported by the Committee of the Whole, as a substitute for the original resolves. It could, at that time, be received only by unanimous consent. That consent was given, and the question upon the amendment to the amendment, was stated by the Chair. The proposition being admitted as an amendment, striking out the amendment of the Committee of the Whole, and inserting a substitute, it is in order for the gentleman from Plymouth, (Mr. Davis,) to move an amendment, in the way of perfecting the part proposed to be stricken out, or that proposed for insertion.

Mr. BRIGGS, of Pittsfield. I have no wish to embarrass the Chair, or raise any nice question of order. As to the matter of parliamentary law upon this point, I really wish some little information. The Chair makes a distinction between a substitute and an amendment, and yet I observed, that before he gets through with his sentence he calls it an amendment.

Mr. BATES, of Plymouth. I would like to inquire, if it is in order to discuss a question of parliamentary law unless there is an appeal taken from the decision of the Chair?

The PRESIDENT. Strictly speaking, the Chair supposes that the gentleman from Pittsfield is not in order, objection being made.

Mr. BRIGGS. The Chair understood me, I presume, as respectfully making a suggestion for his consideration, and unless objected to, it is in order.

The PRESIDENT. It is in order, unless objection is made.

Mr. BRIGGS. If the gentleman objects, I will sit down.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair will state, that this amendment, proposed by the gentleman from Plymouth, (Mr. Davis,) is in order only upon the ground that the unanimous consent of the Convention was given, to the introduction of the amendment moved by the gentleman from Charlestown. In reply to the remark of the gentleman from Pittsfield, the Chair does not make a distinction between a substitute and an amendment, but, on the contrary, the Chair understands, that parliamentary law recognizes no proposition as a substitute, but every proposition which pertains to the original question, is in the nature of an amendment. That amendment, however, may take such a form as to be a substitute, in fact, for the whole proposition; as by striking out all that follows the enacting clause, and inserting an entire new proposition, as a substitute for the part stricken out, and the amendment taking that form, then it is a substitute for the entire proposition; and, upon every principle of parliamentary law, and by the practice of all deliberative assemblies, it is in order to amend the original proposition in the way of perfecting it, before the Convention can be called upon to strike out or affirm it by a vote. The Convention will find itself in this position, if the proposition reported by the Committee of the Whole, be affirmed or rejected as a whole, without the privilege of amendment, that they must stand by that vote, and cannot improve or change that proposition in any way, at this stage of the question, and if, at the succeeding stage, the previous question should be moved immediately upon the second reading of the resolve, then the Convention would be obliged to pass upon it without being able to change or modify it in any manner whatever.

The Chair understands, according to the practice of all deliberative assemblies, when an amendment is reported as an amendment to the original proposition, which is in fact a substitute for the whole, that it is the right of any member of the Convention to propose to perfect that original proposition then to be stricken out or retained. Therefore, upon that principle, the Chair rules that the amendment of the gentleman from Plymouth, (Mr. Davis,) is in order.

Mr. BRIGGS, of Pittsfield. I will take an appeal from the decision of the Chair, for the simple purpose of stating my views upon this subject. I understand the parliamentary law to be this: that when a proposition is pending, it is open to amendment; that it may be amended by striking out all parts of it, leaving nothing to which an amendment can be attached, and that when such proposition is made, it is an amendment—really, strictly, and technically an amendment—though it strikes at the whole body of the proposition. I agree with the Chair, that parliamentary law recognizes no such thing as a substitute. The proposition of the gentleman from Lowell, (Mr. Butler,) was this: to amend the original resolution by striking out all after the word "Resolved." Then what was it? It was an amendment, reported as such, and come up before the Convention as an amendment. That amendment was open to amendment, and the gentleman from Charlestown, (Mr. Thompson,) proposed to amend it, as he might do, by striking out a part and leaving the residue; by striking out a part and substituting something, or by striking out the whole and substituting something in its place. That would be an appropriate and ordinary motion, conforming to parliamentary law upon the subject of amendments. That would be an amendment to an amendment. Now, I understand the Chair, that if he rules so, and that this was properly and strictly an amendment, then the Convention have got to vote upon the entire proposition or on the question as between the two propositions, or if they adopt it they must take it as it is, and thus get something which they do not want; and therefore they have a right to perfect it before the vote is taken. I concur with the Chair, that in one stage of the proceeding this is so. When an amendment is offered to a bill, to strike out and insert, you have a right to make either part perfect. But that is an amendment to an amendment. But when we have two amendments pending, the parliamentary law says you shall not move another amendment, or an amendment in the third degree. That is the law, and you must take the consequences of that law. Now, to avoid that law, I understand the Chair to say that this is to be regarded as a substitute, and being regarded as a substitute, it is open to amendment.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES. — GARDNER — MARVIN — BROWN — KEYES.

But I understood the Chair to say—and I agree with him—that parliamentary law recognizes no such thing as a substitute; it is an amendment. Then, by that parliamentary law, if two amendments are pending, a third amendment is not in order, because you cannot move an amendment in the third degree. Therefore, unless the Chair makes a distinction between an amendment and a substitute, I do not see how he is sustained by parliamentary law, in his decision in this case. If there is such a parliamentary law and usage as to recognize any distinction, I agree with the Chair.

Sir, I said I took the appeal for the purpose of expressing my views, and not for the purpose of embarrassing the Convention, and because I was not permitted to express my views otherwise. I withdraw the appeal.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair will suggest, that the gentleman from Pittsfield is right in one point of view: considering the substitute as an amendment to an amendment. But this is not the fact. The gentleman from Charlestown had no right to present his proposition to amend without the unanimous consent of the Convention. The Chair so ruled. The gentleman from Pittsfield assented to its reception. That being assented to, any member has a right, first, to perfect the proposition of the gentleman from Charlestown, which was introduced by unanimous consent; and secondly, he has a right to perfect the proposition adopted by the Committee of the Whole. Otherwise the effect would be that it might be introduced without the possibility of amending it, or if it was affirmed, the Convention would be held to it without the possibility of amendment. The difficulty originated in admitting it. But if it is admitted without opposition, the Chair understands, by the uniform procedure,—both of this body and the House of Representatives of the United States, which is the leading authority, of course, upon American parliamentary law,—any member of this Convention has the right to perfect the amendment introduced by the gentleman from Charlestown, although it stands, pro forma, as an amendment to an amendment. Being admitted, it must be treated as in order.

Mr. HOOPER, of Fall River. I understand that the proposition of the gentleman from Charlestown is before the Convention.

The PRESIDENT. It is. His motion is to strike out certain words and insert others; and now the gentleman from Plymouth moves an amendment to perfect the first proposition. The question is on the proposition of the gentleman from Plymouth.

Mr. GARDNER, of Seekonk. I do not know that the county which I have the honor to represent in part, will be affected one way or the other by this amendment; but I feel, at present, opposed to the amendment. It seems to me that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Lowell, is better, standing as it is, than it would be to insert the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Plymouth as a substitute. The gentleman from Plymouth says, that in his judgment, the small towns ask too much. Sir, from every side of this hall, almost every gentleman has spoken in favor of the rights of the small towns, and I have heard from various quarters that the most just and equitable system would be to have the small towns all represented. I concur in that opinion. I think these small municipalities should be preserved, if possible. But, Sir, we have a proposition to allow sixty-four towns to elect five representatives in every ten years. Now, the gentleman from Plymouth, notwithstanding all these eulogies, and all that has been said in favor of these small towns, and notwithstanding his love of the small towns, and his desire that they should have a due influence on this floor, says that they ask too much, and he is opposed to the proposition of the gentleman from Lowell on that ground. I feel as though the terms of the plan made with regard to the small towns, by giving them what is proposed by the gentleman from Lowell, are as near right as we can make them, unless we adopt the district system. If it is finally concluded by this Convention to go into the district system, and take the most just and equitable course for the whole Commonwealth, I, for one, will go for it. If we adopt any one of the systems which has been presented, it does seem to me that the proposition of the gentleman from Lowell, or at least the principle contained in the first paragraph of his proposition, ought to be accepted. It is the same which I have proposed in document No. 78. Therefore I wish to express my approbation of the proposition of the gentleman from Lowell, and my entire disapprobation of the proposition of the gentleman from Plymouth. As to the great disparity and discrepancy with regard to the large towns, and the fear that they will not have their full share of representation, I think that there is no danger but they will be satisfied. I hope the proposition of the gentleman from Plymouth will not prevail.

Mr. DAVIS, of Plymouth. I rise to make an explanation. I did not say that, under the proposition of the gentleman from Lowell, the large towns would not have a sufficient representation. I am in favor of restricting the representation so far as the large towns are concerned, by increasing the ratio.

Mr. MARVIN, of Winchendon. I wish to say a single word, as gentlemen have an idea that the proposition which is offered will increase the representation from the small towns to a great extent. The difference is only one and a half. According to the plan of the gentleman from Lowell, the towns having less than fifteen hundred inhabitants will have ninety-nine representatives, and if this amendment is adopted, those towns will have one hundred and one-half. The advantage will be this; if you aggregate the small towns, according to this plan, a town which has nine hundred inhabitants will have no more representatives than a town which has only five hundred, and I offer this as an improvement, and not because it makes any difference in the aggregate.

Mr. BROWN, of Medway. I do not claim an hour, and will not occupy more than ten minutes. The proposition of taking representation from each town has been tried in other places, and I would draw the attention of the Convention to the State of Vermont, for a moment. For a long time they had been in the habit of electing one representative for each town, whether it be large or small. Recently, I believe, the law has been altered so that for a limited time the towns having a certain number of voters, may choose two representatives, and after that limited time they choose only one, forever. This system, in the State of Vermont, has certainly operated well, for we all know that there is no State in the Union which has prospered better than Vermont, and especially since she has been brought nearer market by her railroads. There is a very great advantage in this system, it is so simple, so easily understood by every-body. Their statute laws, based upon this system, are so simple, so plain, so easily understood, that every man in Vermont knows the law and is a judge of the law. It is very different in this State. When you go to a lawyer in this State—and I would not speak disrespectfully of that honorable body, especially those with whom we are associated in this Convention—and ask his opinion on a case which you have, he cannot tell you, he must go and search his books, and he must go and look up reports and decisions on similar cases, before he can give any opinion on the case. Now this is not the case in Vermont. Their laws are so simple to be understood, as I said before, that every individual, so far as my acquaintance extends, in Vermont, knows as much about her laws, as our lawyers know about our laws here. I think that we need not be afraid of the large towns and the cities. It is the glory of the country towns that they have such places as Boston, that they have such places as Charlestown. Mr. Webster said, in his great speech in answer to Mr. Hayne, in speaking of Massachusetts: "There is Concord, there is Lexington, there is Boston, and there is Bunker Hill; there they stand, and there they will stand forever." I hope that the system, whatever it is, that we adopt here, will be one which will give the most representatives, and the most power, if you may so call it, in our legislature. The country towns are certainly not enemies to the cities, or to the city of Boston and its vicinity. The city of Boston, and the circumstances connected with it, are the glory of the small towns, and it will be their pride and their glory to deal out justice to them.

Mr. KEYES, for Abington. I offered an amendment, yesterday, to the proposition of the gentleman from Charlestown, in order to find out a fact; and I think I did find it out—that is, Sir, that the proposition now before us, offered by the gentleman from Lowell, is the one upon which this Convention are to act. I did not offer it to the other proposition, however, because the Committee seemed to think that could not be amended, and I would not introduce it in opposition to that. Now, Sir, here is an amendment that, in my opinion, is directed to the right quarter, and what is it? The great argument has been constantly upon the ground of inequality; and the effect of this amendment, as I understand it, is, to destroy that inequality, and to establish equality, if it has not that effect, it has no effect at all. It does not add to or diminish from the number of representatives, to any appreciable degree whatever. The only operation of it, which I can perceive, is, to introduce the principle of equality. Now, if the proposition of the gentleman from Lowell is correct in all respects, I ask, why this amendment is not improving it, because the inequality between towns of five hundred inhabitants and those of fifteen hundred, is just as appalling and monstrous as any of these other inequalities which have been talked about so much. The effect of that amendment, if I understand it, is, to destroy

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.—CROWNINSHIELD.

that inequality; because, if the minimum is 1,500, then a town of fourteen hundred would have no more right of representation than a town of four hundred has. So, it is just as monstrous and just as unequal in one case as in the other—just as much so in the proposition of the gentleman from Lowell, as all these other things which have created such a furor about inequality here. Now, I ask, why you do not take this amendment, which only makes it as nearly equal as it can possibly be made, and allow towns of five hundred inhabitants to have a representative every year, and add another every ten years, for the increase in their population?

The amendment could have no other possible effect than to establish an equality among the small towns; and if there is any serious objection to that, I should very much like to know what it is.

Mr. CROWNINSHIELD, of Boston. I had not intended to address any remarks to the Convention upon this subject; but if any apology is necessary for my not adhering to that determination, it must be found in the great interest which my constituents have and feel in this important question. Here we are, in what we have so often been told, is "the middle of the nineteenth century;" and the people of Massachusetts have met in Convention, through their delegates, to effect great reforms in their fundamental law, and to cure sundry evils in the Constitution, which have pressed with heavy weight upon the people of the Commonwealth. The gentleman from Greenfield, who represents Erving in this Convention, (Mr. Griswold,) opened the debate upon this subject which is now before us; and allow me to say, that probably that gentleman had as large a hand in bringing together this assembly, and perhaps even greater, than any other individual in this Convention, or in this Commonwealth; for it is well known, that several years since, in the legislature, he first broached the subject of making an alteration in the basis of representation, which he pressed with zeal and pertinacity, but failing in his object there, turned his attention to a Convention, which, with a like zeal, he has, at last, brought to pass. From the length of time which has already been consumed upon it in this Convention, and from some other circumstances, we know that this was one of the great and important subjects that has brought us here. Now, the gentleman for Erving, in his opening remarks, stated that here was a great evil to be corrected—here was an important principle involved. What was the principle? It was, that during a considerable portion of the time, a large number of the inhabitants of the small towns of this Commonwealth were wholly unrepresented. This, it seems, was one of the great things that had led to the calling of this Convention, and this is one of the great evils that remains to be corrected here; and now, how does that gentleman, and how do those gentlemen who sustained him in calling this Convention, propose to remedy that evil? what is the effect of the amendment which they propose? I ask that gentleman, or I ask any other gentleman in this body, who is in favor of the proposition before us, to tell me wherein it differs, in principle, from the provision in the existing Constitution. Sir, by the amendment now before the Convention, are the small towns represented every year? Is it proposed that they shall be represented every year? Not at all, Sir. Is there any principle of equality about it? What is the principle which is embraced in the amendment, that the Committee of the Whole have reported to this body, which differs in substance from the provision in the present Constitution? It differs only in this—that it takes away from my constituents a large portion of the equal and just rights which have been guaranteed to them by the Constitution of the Commonwealth, and by the Bill of Rights, and which are inherent in every man who is a freeman, and who lives under a republican government.

I had intended to say something in relation to the history of this question, and refer to times long gone by, for it is there gentlemen seem to look for the largest liberty and the greatest democracy. They base their arguments upon that which is ancient and venerable, and to sustain them in their reforms here. The gentleman for Erving, the other day, told us that this system of town representation was ancient and venerable, and that it forms no objection, in his mind, to anything, that it is ancient and venerable, provided it is good; and that is one argument in favor of town representation, because it is both ancient and good. The difficulty is, he gives us no standard by which we may judge and determine what is good, and he begs the question when he says it is good. I was somewhat astonished, Sir, by a remark which fell, the other day, from the gentleman from Natick, (Mr. Wilson,) in which he spoke of those who opposed this proposition, as being among those who were the opponents of the calling of this Convention. I suppose I may as well admit, that I am among that number, and we have had it flouted in our faces, that we were the opponents of the Convention, as though, for that reason, we were not entitled to any consideration. I think another statement, made by that gentleman, spoke volumes upon this subject; for he told us, that it was with the greatest difficulty that the people could be got to agree to the calling of a Convention; and he admitted that it required an amount of labor almost unheard of, to wake up the people of Massachusetts to the assertion of their rights, which had been trampled upon, and to redress the great grievances under which they had been suffering. And is it so, that in this boasted "nineteenth century," the people of this Commonwealth should be under such a necessity for a Convention to reform the Constitution, and yet should require so large an amount of labor and energy operating upon them, to induce them to call that Convention? We have been authoritatively told, again and again, that "the people would do this," and "would not do that,"—that "they wanted this," and "did not want that;" and the gentleman from North Brookfield has regaled our ears with the managements and arrangements of party—that it is the politicians who make all the trouble, and not the people. Now, Sir, if I may be permitted to express an opinion in this matter, the people do not need any great and essential changes in the Constitution—they are very well satisfied with it, in general, as it is, and that accounts for the labor and effort required to call us together.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT. Does the gentleman from Boston yield the floor?

Mr. CROWNINSHIELD. Yes, Sir; I will yield the floor for any purpose except for a motion for the previous question.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair will remark that the rule is positive, that no member shall interrupt another member speaking, except to raise a question of order; although the courtesy is usually extended to allow interruptions for the purpose of making explanations. The gentleman from North Brookfield will state for what purpose he rises.

Mr. WALKER. I wish to ask if the gentleman from Boston alluded to me in his remarks.

Mr. CROWNINSHIELD. I did. I know no other member from North Brookfield.

Mr. WALKER. I understood the gentleman to say that the gentleman from North Brookfield stated that it was the politicians, and not the people, who called this Convention. Did I understand the gentleman correctly?

Mr. CROWNINSHIELD. Not at all. I remarked that the gentleman from North Brookfield had repeatedly told us, in his usual emphatic and authoritative manner, what the people did or did not want, and what they would or would not approve, and what the politicians were always contriving against their interests. I believe that the people do not desire a large House of Representatives. So far as I understand what they do want, and I have taken some pains to find out, if the House is brought down to a convenient size, so as to conduct public affairs in the best manner, that will satisfy them.

Let us advert for a moment, if I may be pardoned for alluding to the matter after the able and extended remarks of the gentleman from Salem, (Mr. Upham,) to the historical view of the question. The country was settled under a Charter obtained from royal authority, which was granted to an association formed for that purpose. At length the Charter was brought over, and formed, as it were, the Constitution of Government. Every free man in the corporation had equal rights and equal power, and the elections of governor and other officers, were made by the body of freemen assembled in Boston. It was as pure a democracy as, perhaps, ever existed, where every man was equal to every other man. Soon it was found inconvenient for all the inhabitants to assemble together for such purposes, and so they had representatives and districts established. The reason why this was done, has been stated by the gentleman from Salem; and the system of representation which then grew up was not a representation of towns in their corporate capacity, exercising a corporate right, but of freemen who were as equally represented as possible. So far as I know, there was no census of the inhabitants at that early day; but from each town was sent, as it was convenient, "two or three" representatives, who had powers delegated to them to act for the whole number of freemen. This state of things went on until the Restoration, when the republican government was overthrown, and royal authority was established in England. Presently the king of England found that he had too free a government existing in his colonies, and took away their Charter. After that great outrage, things went on for a time under Andros, until the Revolution in 1688, when our fathers hoped that the Charter of which they had been robbed would be restored to them, as many Charters of cities in England, which, in like manner had been taken away, had been. But they hoped in vain. The Charter that they had at first, allowed them a too republican form of government for the time, and the best thing they could obtain was the Charter of William and Mary, or the Province Charter, which took away from them many of their rights, and deprived them of the right of choosing their own governor; and a royal governor was sent over here, and they lived under royal governors for nearly one hundred years, until the Revolution of 1776 established a different order of things. It was not a representation of towns even under the Royal Charter; but supposing it were, is that any authority for us? When the Revolution came, "old things passed away, and all things became new." The people of this Commonwealth, when they framed the first republican Constitution under which they have since lived so happily, well understood the fundamental principles of a republican government. Let me read to this Convention a few extracts from that Constitution as they established it. Those men who were then at the head of affairs, who took a leading part in forming the Constitution of Massachusetts—such men as John Adams—did they know nothing about republicanism and the rights of the people? I fancy that this question needs no answer from me. Let us look at the Constitution which they established, and see what it says upon the subject of equal rights of members of the community. In the first place let me read the preamble:—

"The end of the institution, maintenance, and administration of government, is to secure the existence of the body politic; to protect it; and to furnish the individuals who compose it with the power of enjoying with safety and tranquillity their natural rights and the blessings of life; and whenever these great objects are not obtained, the people——"

Not the towns, but the people.

"The people have a right to alter the government, and to take measures necessary for their safety, prosperity and happiness. The body politic is formed by a voluntary association——"

Of what? Of towns? No! but of people.

"The body politic is formed by a voluntary association of individuals; it is a social compact."

The gentleman for Manchester, (Mr. Dana,) tells us that he does not believe in the doctrine of a social compact; and although I can very well understand upon what principles the gentleman for Manchester takes his position—and I respect him for uttering them boldly and manfully as he does—yet there are certain other gentlemen, in this Convention, who are very well known to entertain very different opinions from those of that gentleman, on all subjects connected with government; and I cannot easily conceive upon what ground they want the House of Representatives to cease to be a popular branch of the government, while the Senate, which we have always looked upon as an aristocratic feature in the Constitution, and the chief executive magistrate who has only the veto, are to be, par excellence, the representatives of the people. Why, Sir, if this provision should be adopted, as those gentlemen desire, in the Constitution, hereafter a member of the body which shall assemble within these walls cannot rise up and say without a blush, "representatives of the people." Will they be in any sense representatives of the people? No, Sir! they will not; they will be representatives of the municipal corporations. They will cease to be the representatives of the people; and if we ever wish to see the representatives of the people, we must go to the other end of this building, where we shall find forty gentlemen gathered around the Senate board—they are the representatives of the sovereign people. So we are informed by the gentlemen of the majority. But let me revert to this Constitution once more. It says:—

"The body politic is formed by a voluntary association of individuals; it is a social compact, by which the whole people covenants with each citizen, and each citizen with the whole people, that all shall be governed by certain laws for the common good."

We have heard a good deal said here about the social compact, and the gentleman for Abington, (Mr. Keyes,) with whom I am happy to agree in many things, has commented upon it, and says that it is not so—that many people dissent entirely from it, and do not agree to its terms. Certainly it is a social compact—not that we have made a written compact with every individual—for gentlemen know that that is not true. When we say that it is a social compact, we mean that we agree to abide by it, and we yield our assent to it. All who live under this compact, give a silent assent to it, and the great mass of the people do heartily assent to it, as I believe, with the exception of some fanatics, as I must insist upon calling them, who deny the authority of government, and who petition the legislature for all sorts of strange and absurd things. The great mass of the people do give their hearty assent to it, and it is, in substance, a compact between every individual citizen, and the whole body of the people. But let us read on:—

"It is the duty of the people, therefore, in framing a Constitution of government, to provide for an equitable mode of making laws, as well as for an impartial interpretation and faithful execution of them; that every man may, at all times, find his security in them. We, therefore, the people of Massachusetts, acknowledging with grateful hearts, the goodness of the great Legislator of the Universe, in affording us, in the course of his providence, an opportunity, deliberately and peaceably, without fraud, violence, or surprise, of entering into an original, explicit, and solemn compact with each other," &c.

This is the preamble to this great instrument, and now let us go on into the Bill of Rights. And I ask gentlemen if they purpose to strike out this provision from the Bill of Rights, which says in the first words of the first article, that "all men are born free and equal." Here is the great principle of the Declaration of Independence; and is it an idle form of words that is to be read over on Monday next to the people of this Commonwealth, when they come together to celebrate their emancipation from thralldom, and their entrance into liberty—the overthrow of the royal authority, and the formation of a republic? Are these words idle words, or are they the words of truth and soberness, that "all men are born free and equal?" And, Sir, if they are not equal they cannot be free. We read in section 4, of the Bill of Rights: "The people of this Commonwealth have the sole and exclusive right of governing themselves, as a free, sovereign, and independent State." And we read in section 5: "No man, nor corporation, or association of men, have any other title to obtain advantages, or particular and exclusive privileges, distinct from those of the community, than what arises from the consideration of services rendered to the public." Then what right have the individual small towns and corporations in this Commonwealth to a greater representation than I, a citizen of a large one, have? What services have they rendered to this Commonwealth, which entitle them to a greater right or a greater voice in this House of Representatives than I have, or than my constituents have?

Let that question be answered. I see gentlemen around me smiling because, as I know, they think that this provision was introduced into the Constitution for another purpose, and with another meaning. So it was, mainly; for it never was dreamed of that a Convention would meet in 1853, and that gentlemen would stand up here and astonish us with such doctrines as have been announced upon this question in this Convention.

Again, the ninth article of the Bill of Rights says:—

"All elections ought to be free; and all the inhabitants of this Commonwealth, having such qualifications as they shall establish by their frame of government, have an equal right to elect officers, and to be elected, for public employments."

Will this Convention strike out that provision of the Constitution, or will they let it stand there? Will they let it remain there, in strange inconsistency with the provision which has been reported by the Committee of the Whole, and which a majority of this Convention seem about to adopt? A hundred and fifty or a thousand years hence, when we shall have passed away, and when many generations shall have passed away from all earthly scenes, and the memory of most of us shall have been forgotten, what will the future historian of Massachusetts say, when he looks at the provision of this Constitution which I have just read, and sees also in that same Constitution, a provision by which the city of Boston—of which I have the honor of being a humble representative—and the cities and large towns, were robbed of their equal rights? How will he be able to explain it? He can give no rational account of it.

When I go to my constituents, and they ask me what has been done here, and I tell them that a provision has been adopted whereby four or five men in this city are only worth as much, politically, as one man in the central part of the Commonwealth, or away upon Connecticut River or the Berkshire hills, what reason shall I assign for it? What answer can I make? I am dumb, and can make no answer.

There are many other passages of the Constitution, of the same import, which I might read, but I have read enough to satisfy gentlemen that we raise here, in one hand, in the Constitution, a declaration of liberty, equality, and equal rights, among all the inhabitants of the Commonwealth, and then present in the other a proposition for an amendment of it, which robs a large portion of the inhabitants of their just and equal right to participate in making the laws.

Now, it has been said by the gentleman for Erving, (Mr. Griswold,) and also by the gentleman who represents Manchester, (Mr. Dana,) that exact equality is impossible. I quite agree with them in that, and that government, of all things, is a practical subject, and we must deal with it practically, and not carry off any principle in reference to it to an extravagant extreme. But we must establish great principles, and carry them out as nearly as we can. That is all we ask or desire. In any system of representation you may adopt, in any mode of districting that you can establish, you cannot bring together an exact equal number of inhabitants in each district. And if you could do it to-day, they would be unequal to-morrow. Nobody asks such an absurdity as that there shall be a strict and exact equality. All we ask is that there should be an honest, fair, just, and righteous attempt to make it as nearly equal as the nature of the case will admit. There will be fractions, and larger fractions in one place than in another. And I may as well say here,—what I am surprised has not been adverted to by any gentleman upon this floor on any side,—that as to the matter of fractions, I hold that where there is a fraction greater than half large enough to entitle a town, or district, to a representative, the place having this fraction ought to have that representative. That was the great principle established by Mr. Webster in 1832, if I remember right, when the question was before the Senate of apportioning members of the House of Representatives of the United States for that decennial period. And here I take pleasure in stating, that it happened to me about that time, in company with a friend, a delegate in this Convention from Roxbury, to be in the city of Richmond, and in the study of that eminent man, Chief Justice Marshall. I talked with him upon that very subject, and alluded to the speech which Mr. Webster had recently made upon that matter. General Jackson was reported to have said that the principle which Mr. Webster had laid down was not a sound one. Chief Justice Marshall remarked that that was also his own opinion when the principle was first announced, but that the argument of Mr. Webster was so conclusive that no room was left for doubt, and his mind was entirely convinced by it. When I pleasantly reminded him of what General Jackson had said, that this principle was not sound, he replied in the same vein, that he thought General Jackson would find it hard to answer that argument.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.—CROWNINSHIELD.

Now, the principle for which I contend here,—though I hear it said around me that “it is too late,” yet I desire to place upon the record, if any poor remarks which I may submit, in support of my position, be thought worthy of being recorded,—the principle for which I contend here is exact equality of representation to all, so far as it is practicable. Therefore it is, if I understand the proposition submitted by the gentleman from Boston, (Mr. Schouler,) the other day, that I go for his proposition, and nothing short of it, and “to this complexion we must come at last.” As the gentleman from Abington, (Mr. Keyes,) said the other day, you may talk as much as you please about it, and make what provision in the Constitution you please, and still the result must be, that the Commonwealth of Massachusetts must be districted for the choice of representatives. If we do not come to that in these ten years, we shall in the next, for it is the only just principle that can be established. You may make as many mathematical calculations as you please; you may legislate with reference to this party or that party, or combination of parties; you may legislate with an eye to temporary purposes; but you must come to that complexion at last. The Commonwealth is rapidly increasing in population, and any system which provides for town representation cannot last.

The great difficulties have been overlooked. The gentleman for Erving, (Mr. Griswold,) told us that the vital defect in the existing Constitution is, that it takes away from the small towns the right of representation every year. I am free to confess, that I consider it unfair and unjust to the people of the small towns. I hold that every individual in the Commonwealth has a right to be represented every time the legislature assembles to make laws, which may possibly affect him in his person or property; and every time that they make laws imposing taxes which fall upon him. Every man in the Commonwealth has always, and at all times, an equal right to be represented; and I say, that any system which prevents the inhabitants of the small towns from being represented during any portion of the year, is wrong, unjust, and unfair, and I cannot support it, unless I am driven to that as the best thing I can get. I have no hesitation in expressing my opinions upon that point.

My objection to any system which has been proposed here, except those of my colleagues from Boston, (Mr. Hale and Mr. Schouler,) is this, that there is no principle or standard by which they can be gauged. One gentleman tells us that a House of so many members is about right. Now, the number of representatives of which the House shall be composed, is altogether an arbitrary number. When the amendment as to the number of representatives was introduced into the present Constitution, what was the great and ruling motive in the minds of the people which induced them to adopt it? Does not every gentleman know that they considered the great evil to be a large House of Representatives, too large conveniently to transact the public business which came before them, and which compelled them to assemble and remain together too great a length of time, at an enormous expense? That was the great evil, and the people of the Commonwealth wanted to get rid of a large House. That is what they want still.

If gentlemen will put this question to their constituents, whether they want a large or a small House, they will find that they are in favor of the latter. I do not affect to know more than other gentlemen, but my calling has obliged me to come in contact with a great many people, of all classes and conditions, and I have taken occasion to sound them upon the subject. These people belonged both to the large and the small towns. I have talked with gentlemen from a small town in the county of Plymouth, and I asked them whether they wanted a large House. They answered “No.” The gentlemen with whom I have conversed, were not politicians. They were men who had other business to attend to than continually attending caucuses and town-meetings. They said, also, they were in favor of district systems, by which several of the small towns might be united to choose a representative, and with all their hearts, because they believed that in the long run, they would be better represented than they now usually are.

Now, the gentleman for Erving, (Mr. Griswold,) told us that the amendment which was introduced into the Constitution of 1840, was not proposed by a Convention. That is true. But was it not proposed and discussed before two successive legislatures? Was it not pending two years before the legislature and the people? The provisions of the Constitution require that a proposed amendment shall be passed by two successive legislatures, and that provision was two years before the legislature, and it was discussed by the people, and it was approved of by a large majority—much larger than that which sanctioned the amendments of the Convention of 1820, a majority of nearly two to one. Did not they know what they were doing? They did it, not because they apprehended that it was the very best system, but because it in some measure cured what was then the great, the grievous, and the principal evil.

Now, Sir, as I was saying, I object to the propositions now pending, because there is no rule or standard by which they can be measured. What reason is there for cutting off from annual representation all towns with less than a certain amount of population, and stopping when you get to one thousand inhabitants? Simply because it is a round number? Why stop there any more than when you get to twelve hundred, fifteen hundred, or ten thousand? Can any gentleman answer me the question? I want something more than a mere arbitrary rule. When you have determined to abandon the system of town representation in any degree—and you give up the whole principle if you adopt these amendments, which leave some fifty or sixty towns of this Commonwealth unrepresented for a part of the time—I want gentlemen to lay down a rule of right upon this subject. The matter is entirely arbitrary, and every gentleman upon this floor who has made a speech upon the subject—which speeches foreshadow the wishes of the Convention—has discussed it with reference to the manner in which it would affect his own constituents. And I rise here to discuss it upon the same principle. It is right that they should do so. Every gentleman, before he comes to a vote ciphers it out to see how it will affect his constituents, and how, perhaps, it may affect himself, and perhaps I may do so myself, for I do not pretend to be wiser or better than my neighbors.

We have heard a great deal said about the intelligence of Massachusetts. We do not want to take an example from other States. We are wiser or better than they. I am the last man to abate one jot or tittle of the credit which is due to Massachusetts; but I have been strongly impressed with the idea that the sort of language which has been used in reference to this matter, would better come from some other source than from us. I do not think it betokens a great deal of modesty. I am impressed with the force of the old saying that “Self-praise goes but little ways.”

And I remember, too, what Fuller, the author of “The Worthies of England,” has said when speaking of the famous Captain John Smith, the early voyager along the shores of New England, and whose history is so closely connected with the early history of Virginia. After giving some account of his wonderful exploits, he says: “they seem to most men above belief, to some, beyond truth;” yet we have two witnesses to attest them—the story and the pictures, both in his own book; and it soundeth much to the diminution of his deeds, that he alone is the herald to publish and explain them. He then adds a story of two captains being at dinner; one of them fell into a large relation of his own achievements, concluding his discourse with this question to his fellow and pray, Sir, said he, what service have you done? to whom the other answered, "Other men can tell that."

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.—CROWNINSHIELD.

[June 30th.

So I prefer, when the morals and intelligence, and glory of Massachusetts are to be told, that the praise should come from abroad rather than from home. But if Massachusetts, and her reputation, character, morals, and intelligence are attacked from any quarter, then for want of a better champion, one may be found in me. But until that is done, I think it more decorous to sit quietly and say nothing at all about it.

Now I have said that I go for the doctrine of equality. I go for it, because I believe in the sacred doctrine contained in our Declaration of Independence, and in our own Bill of Rights, "that all men are born free and equal," that "they are entitled to an equal voice in making their laws." That is a natural, inherent and inalienable right. Now, I ask any gentleman to tell me, what natural right any town has to be represented? Gentlemen undertake to ground their arguments in favor of it, upon the fact that they have always possessed and enjoyed it. Has any gentleman told us how many towns there were when the Constitution of 1780 was formed? What natural right exists in an aggregation of men, because they are enclosed within artificial lines, to entitle them to a representative greater than in another great aggregation of men upon a smaller territory? I deny that it exists, and I defy any gentleman to show it. We all have, naturally, equal and just rights. Now, let any gentleman, who here proposes to cut up the Commonwealth, so as to rob two-thirds of its people of their equal rights, state upon what principle he does it, and what arguments he can bring in favor of it? The gentleman for Erving, (Mr. Griswold,) told us that the present system is a bad one. I can say "amen" to that. But I ask him how it differs in principle from the amendments proposed here? It cuts Boston and the large towns a little more, and not a little either. But the gentleman tells us, that although the proposition was not his, and although he believed his plan to be a better one, yet, as there must be a compromise among so many propositions, he gives in his adherence to it. Upon what principle does he do that? If he says that he does it, because it takes away a piece from us, or from you, I can understand it. If he can give any fair, and honest answer to it, I am ready to hear it, and be convinced by it.

The next objection to the existing provision was that it is complicated,—that the people cannot well understand it,—that it requires a good deal of ciphering and figuring. Will the gentleman tell me how this proposed amendment is any less so? Does it require any less knowledge of mathematics or of figures to understand it? Sir, we have been overwhelmed and deluged with figuring, showing the practical operation of these amendments. That objection, then, I must consider as rubbed off the slate. One gentleman, at least, has told us that he wanted no system founded upon mathematics. Another, that he does not wish to have the State run out by a surveyor into districts, as France was divided at the first Revolution.

Why, Sir, will any gentleman tell us how the principle of representation by the small towns and the large towns as municipal corporations, differs from that by districts? Are not the towns separated by purely artificial lines? Do not the legislature, every year, and year after year, emancipate some three or four of these towns from their connection with the towns to which they have heretofore belonged, and create new towns? And how do they do it? Are the boundary lines of these towns natural boundaries? Are they rivers or mountains? Sometimes they are, but more frequently they are mere artificial divisions. I well remember when the town of Ashland was created, a number of years ago, out of some three, four, five or six other towns. I well remember the time which was spent in the consideration and the reconsideration of that question in this hall, and that one of the strongest arguments used in opposition to its creation, was that of one the lines of the new town went straight through Mr. Pierce's barn. [Laughter.] The divisions do not, and cannot, from the nature of things, grow out of any natural boundary. They are merely a matter of convenience, to bring together a certain number of people conveniently located, or arbitrarily, and form a town.

You well remember, Mr. President, for you took a prominent part in that transaction yourself, when a few years since, it was proposed and carried, to set off a part of the town of Newton to the town of Waltham. In that case the boundary of Newton was not an artificial, but a natural one. It was bounded upon three sides by the Charles River, which in fact nearly surrounded it, and had constituted the boundary of that town for more than two hundred years, but that natural boundary was disregarded and a portion of the town of Newton was carved out by purely artificial lines. Sir, these municipal corporations have no natural right of representation. They are wholly artificial divisions, as much so as if the Commonwealth had been divided by the surveyor of the United States into mathematical squares, sections, quarter sections and townships, for town lines. And there is no more reason why your towns, as municipal corporations, should be represented, than there would be in the case I have supposed, that the squares which had been marked out by the surveyor should be represented as such.

But various gentlemen upon this floor, and particularly the gentleman for Manchester, (Mr. Dana,) eulogized very highly, these "little republics and democracies." Why, Sir, I apprehend the gentleman for Manchester was never in a town-meeting in his life. Although for twenty years past I have been a resident of this city, yet the early part of my life was spent in a town; and being then a somewhat younger man than I am now, and being a somewhat ardent politician, even before I was one-and-twenty years old, I attended the town-meetings and used to check off the voters, as they came up to the polls, upon the check list; gentlemen will see, therefore, that I know something of the proceedings of a town-meeting, and I must confess that I was a little astonished when the gentleman for Manchester alluded to the debates and deliberations which take place in these town-meetings as to the qualifications of Mr. A. or Mr. B., or of the qualifications of this candidate or that for the office of representative. Why, Sir, such a thing, I apprehend was never heard of at any town-meeting for the choice of representative, in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, as for a debate to arise upon any subject touching that election, unless it were the subject of whether they should send a representative or none at all, and where they are entitled to send two, three or four, they debate the question whether they shall send three or four, or one, or none at all. When one party finds the other in the majority, and in a position to elect all the representatives, they will sometimes manage to prevent any at all from being elected, by moving, when a larger number of their party happen to be present, than of the other, to send a smaller number than that to which the town is entitled, and so place the majority party in a trying position, with more candidates on their tickets than they can elect, without knowing which to select and which to leave out. I remember an incident connected with this subject, where a very distinguished gentleman, a resident of this Commonwealth, who for a considerable time occupied a seat upon the bench, but who was at that time an ardent and impulsive politician, belonging to the majority party in the town in which he resided, played a conspicuous part. It was at a period of considerable excitement in political matters. That town—it was Salem—was entitled to send ten or twelve representatives, and the voters belonging to the majority party came to the polls with their votes all written—for they used written votes in those days, and not printed, and it was a matter involving a good deal of labor to prepare the votes. But a sufficient number of the minority party collected together at the opening of the meeting to overbalance the others, and a motion was made that the town should only send, I think, three representatives; the effect of which, if carried, would have been that the voters belonging to the majority, would not have known which of their candidates to vote for, and some would have voted for one and some for another.

Well, Sir, the gentleman to whom I alluded rose to speak to the motion, and after he had spoken in opposition to it for some time, and having exhausted what was to be said about it, finding that the voters on his side did not come in, like the minister of which my friend from North Adams, (Mr. Dawes,) told us, he began "to scatter," and went on in his speech thus: "Mr. Moderator,—Some philosophers have doubted whether there was such a thing as matter," [laughter]; and then he went on at great length to prove that this theory of Bishop Berkeley was unsound and fallacious, and so continued until he found that voters enough upon his side—whom he had sent out friends to rally and bring in—had come to defeat the motion, when he closed with, "Mr. Moderator, having now accomplished the purpose for which I rose, I will conclude my speech." That is the kind of debate which took place in that town-meeting, and no other debate or deliberation ever occurs in the town-meetings for the purpose of electing representatives to the general court. Now, Sir, I ask gentlemen to look at this subject, and tell me if it would work any serious disadvantage to the towns of the Commonwealth, to apportion them into districts, for the purpose of electing representatives? I ask any member of this Convention who is acquainted with the character of these municipal corporations, to say if, by dividing the State into representative districts, as nearly equal as may be, you would effect any serious inconvenience, or in any way destroy the character of those municipal institutions? Sir, those who know best, know that it would not. It would not hurt a hair of their heads. They were not created for, and do not exist for, the purpose of choosing representatives. The electing of a representative in one of those towns is nothing more than a mere opening of the polls for the voters to deposit their votes, and the same thing will be done precisely under a district system. The people will have the same opportunity of voting as now, and the same opportunity of discussing the same questions in town-meetings that are discussed now. They can discuss the qualification of voters, and the merits of the several candidates, precisely the same as now, that is, not at all, there. They can levy and collect their taxes, arrange their school-districts, elect their constables and other town officers, the same as now, and quarrel about their local affairs as much as they please. Why, Sir, I remember one occasion, when the people of my native town were thrown into a state of the most tremendous excitement—yes, Sir, greater than ever occurred at any presidential election—upon the question whether a bell which had been taken down from the “old east school-house,” where it had stood many years before my time, should be put back again. It had been used for a long period for the purpose of calling the scholars into, and dismissing them from, school. At this time there happened to live in the neighborhood a very respectable woman, who had lived to a great age. The bell made a great noise, and disturbed the old lady so much that she applied to the committee, and had it taken down. This raised a very great excitement among the good people of the town. Several town-meetings were held to consider the question. At last some one was so unwise as to say that the mechanics of the place wanted the bell to ring at eleven o’clock to give them notice of the time to go out and take a drink. [Laughter.] That settled the question—the consequence was that the bell was at once re-established.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES. — CROWNINSHIELD.

Now, Sir, if you establish the district system, the people can quarrel among themselves just as much as they please, and just as much as they can now. There may be the same number of town-meetings, those schools, as gentlemen call them, in which your governors for the Western States and for California are reared, as now. But I apprehend the governors which are reared here will not be needed in those States. I apprehend that the governors of California, New Mexico, and of the great empire of Mexico itself, when we shall have reduced her to our subjection, will not come from New England. They will come from a latitude a little farther South than this, and they will be raised to their positions too, by the votes of New England men, as they are in California to-day. There are a multitude of men born and educated in New England, who have gone out there and abandoned all the principles and habits of their early education; all those maxims instilled into their minds in the schools in your towns, and when some dashing Southern politician, who can outstrip them in making stump speeches, sets himself up as a candidate for office, he will carry away all their votes. I apprehend the gentleman indulged a little in the fanciful when he spoke of the governors of these territories being educated in and by our system of municipal corporations.

But, Sir, the gentleman from North Brookfield, (Mr. Walker,) and the gentleman from Manchester,

(Mr. Dana,) have a great horror of caucuses, and the caucus system. They say that if you provide for dividing the State into districts, it will greatly multiply the number of caucuses, and throw the whole system of our elections into their hands. Now, Sir, it seems to me a little strange that they should begin to use this argument at this stage of our proceedings, when they have already provided for twelve or fourteen caucuses every year for the nomination of your county officers, sheriffs, commissioners, treasurers, and the like; when they have provided for forty more caucuses for the nomination of a senator in each of the forty senatorial districts into which they propose to divide the State. There can be no difference in this respect between the town and district system, unless it be the difference in the number of representatives provided for by the different systems, and as the number of districts would be decidedly less than those of the towns, there would be fewer caucuses under that system. But again. I want those gentlemen who see so great evils and so much corruption resulting from the caucus system, to tell us what they would substitute in its place? How are you to conduct the elections—how are you to provide candidates for your governor and State officers unless you have a caucus to nominate them? They are nominated by conventions of the people which are nothing but caucuses. Now that you have multiplied your officers to be elected by the people, I want to know what plan you are going to adopt to provide candidates for those offices? How will you get your candidates for your attorney-general, your treasurer, your secretary, your auditor, and your councillors, (unless you determine to abolish them)? If you are going to abolish the caucus system I want to know what you are going to substitute for it? Sir, is there any reason for this great outcry against caucuses? Can you carry on the business of the Commonwealth without caucuses? Has it ever been carried on without them? Can the people of this Commonwealth elect these officers without them? It cannot be done and every-body knows it cannot be done. I am very willing to admit the correctness of what the gentleman for Manchester, (Mr. Dana,) has said of the manner in which these conventions are held and their business is conducted, making some little allowance for the coloring. I am ready to bear testimony of my own party in that respect that it has not always been an exception to the general rule, but unless some one can bring forward some system which will accomplish the same good results without the evil, I can see no reason for rejecting them. How many men were elected to this Convention without caucuses? Was this Convention organized or has its business been conducted without caucuses? We know it has not. How many men have been elected to your House of Representatives without caucuses? When was the governor of this Commonwealth elected without caucuses, except it may be during the era of the Revolution and a little time afterwards? How can your elections go on without caucuses? They cannot. There is no system that can be substituted for it which will answer any better purpose, and therefore I say that all the talk about the dangers of the caucuses that are to result from the adoption of the district system, amount to just nothing at all, for they will not be affected at all by the system, and gentlemen know it as well as I do.

Then there is a great humbug—I can call it nothing else—raised here about “centralization.” Well, Sir, that is a term, as it has been applied, that I could never thoroughly understand; I certainly cannot comprehend it, as applied to this subject. But gentlemen gravely tell us, that if this district system is adopted, it will not be very long before the political power of the State will all be concentrated in the cities; well, Sir, if the people of the Commonwealth collect in the cities to that extent, I see no reason why it should not be concentrated there. I go for the equal representation of the people, and I apprehend the people know their own business better than we can instruct them, and if they find it for their interest to come to the cities to live, I see no reason why they should be disfranchised for it, or why their political rights and importance should depend on their social habits. If three-quarters of the people of the Commonwealth choose to come to live in the city of Boston, and the other quarter in the city of Lowell, or that of Worcester, who is to say them nay? and why should they lose their political rights for that reason?

Again, we have been told something about Boston and Boston influence. I believe we have never heard the words, but I am surprised that I have not, of Boston aristocracy and Boston centralization. Well, if the people choose to centralize themselves here in the city of Boston, is there any one to forbid it? Sir, if there is a man here, who will stand up in this hall and tell me that the people of the city are not equal in intelligence, and should not be politically equal to the people of any other portion of the Commonwealth, I stand here to deny it. And how much have we heard of the rich men of Boston. I have not forgotten the remark of a gentleman upon this floor, that you might take a thousand of these rich men—I am not sure that he said of Boston, but from what followed he must have meant so—and lay them quietly in the classic shades of Mount Auburn, their money would be left behind, and they would not be much missed. Let me tell that gentleman, that within the year past, there have three of the rich men of Boston been laid in those classic shades. I allude to the late Amos Lawrence, Robert G. Shaw, and Thomas B. Wales, and if the gentleman will point me to three men in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, who were more honorable and beloved in their lives, or who have left a more noble and glorious reputation behind them, I will fall down and worship them. Sir, their names will be remembered with honor when we have passed away and most of us are forgotten, and be deservedly bright, because they were faithful in their day and generation, and calling. Who are they that have endowed most liberally your universities, your colleges, your hospitals, and other charitable institutions? Have the rich men of Boston contributed less, in proportion to their means and ability, than the people of any other portion of the Commonwealth? I should be glad to see the men who have done it. No, Sir. Boston is as proud of her rich men as she is of her political men. I need not go over the names of her Perkinses, her Lowells, her Phillipses, her Lawrences, her McLanes, her Lymans and her Lees—but I almost owe an apology for enumerating these names, for I should scarcely know where to stop were I to undertake to go over the long catalogue of those Boston worthies.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.—CROWNINSHIELD.

Sir, I should hardly know what to say, when I go to render an account of my stewardship to my constituents, the shipwrights, the seamen, and that great influential class, the intelligent mechanics of Boston. When I go to the foreign population, to the Catholic population of Boston, if the gentleman pleases, what am I to say to them? Must I tell them, that in this land to which your laws have invited them; this land, which, on an occasion not more than three or four days distant—the 4th of July—we shall hear lauded to the skies, as the home for the exile and the asylum for the oppressed, is not a land of equal rights and privileges? What am I to say to this large class of foreigners? Must I tell them that they may come here, but they must be disfranchised as soon as they come. And may they not reply, “Do not your laws promise to protect us in all our rights? Are not we industrious? Do we not do your work which there is nobody else to do? Are not we striving to rise, morally and intellectually, from that condition to which we have been reduced by ages of wrong and oppression, as much as possible, and if we are not able to elevate ourselves to a level with you in this respect, in our day and generation, do we not look forward to see such a position obtained for the rising generation through the aid of your public schools, and the means of education which you have made free to all, and must we be disfranchised for this? Are we to be deprived of all participation in the affairs of government for this? Sir, there is a delegate in this Convention from the good city of Boston, not now in his seat, who resides in South Boston, and employs a very large number of mechanics, and there are several other equally worthy gentlemen, his neighbors, whom I could point out in this city, and who also employ large numbers of mechanics in their machine shops, in their founderies, in their engine establishments, on railroads and the like, who, with their workmen, are among the most intelligent and worthy portion of the people of the Commonwealth, with all due respect to your agricultural interest, of which we have heard so much in this Convention. I am not afraid to make the comparison with even them, and they are men who know their rights as well as any body else, and they are entitled to as much political power as any other portion of the people of the Commonwealth. The gentleman from Lowell, (Mr. Butler,) said, let them be represented by the old homestead, by their fathers and brothers who they have left in the country. Well, Sir, a great many of them have no old homestead, and never had any here.

Very many of them came from other States, from the democratic State of New Hampshire, and are they to be told, by these democratic gentlemen, when they come down here to seek employment, that they should leave the political power in the hands of their fathers. We, in this “nineteenth century,” have the old American prejudice of preferring to vote for ourselves. We have something left of that old spirit of 1776, which did not care to have their fathers, who lived across the waters, make laws for them, and which did not like to have their great father send his royal governors over the water to take upon them the right to make laws for and govern them. We want the power in our own hands, and we have a right to it, and mean to exercise it.

Here the hour having expired, the hammer fell.

[Cries of go on, go on, go on.]

The PRESIDENT. The gentleman's hour has expired, but as the Chair hears no objection, the gentleman will be allowed to proceed.

Mr. CROWNINSHIELD. I had nearly finished what I intended to say, and I hardly, like, by the indulgence of the Convention, to consume more time, but I will be very brief in what I have yet to say, and I am not quite sure whether the few remarks I shall now make will be strictly in order.

I was about to say, that we have adopted several propositions in this Convention. In the first place, we have adopted the secret ballot, and we have told the town of Berlin to elect a delegate in a certain way. In the next place we have pretty much decided that the present plan of representation needs amendment, and that the town representation is the true system, and that the smaller towns shall not be entitled to an annual representation. We have established the principle that there shall be no payment of a tax required as a qualification of voters in some things, and that it may be required in other things. What I have to say is this, I do hope, before we shall go away from here, that we shall lay down some principle to which we shall adhere, and which can be adopted and fully carried out and maintained. In regard to the election in the town of Berlin, we invited the town of Berlin to send a delegate here, and requested that they should elect him in a totally different manner from that in which a large number of delegates from this city and other cities and towns were elected. Does not every member of this Convention know that the delegates from the city of Boston were elected without any reference to the secret ballot, and that it was scarcely used at all in our election? Why not carry out the principle adopted in the case of the town of Berlin, and send us all home to our constituents. In regard to this secret ballot, I should be exceedingly puzzled to answer my constituents the questions which they might see fit to ask me in regard to it. For my own part, I am free to say that I care but little about it. If gentlemen will let me vote my own way and manner that is all I care about. If my constituents should insist upon knowing whether it was a good measure or not, I should be obliged to tell them that a majority of the Convention, I suppose, thought it was good. But why, they would ask, apply it in the municipal elections of the cities, and not apply it to the municipal elections of towns? Will any gentleman of the Convention put an answer in my mouth to give them upon that subject. Why do they not carry out the principle in all its bearings, and why do they establish the principle as to some elections and not as to others, and why are we of the cities blessed with more than our fair share of this good thing? Is it a compensation for the loss of our equitable share of representation? If so we do not thank them for it, or consider it an equivalent. Then they will say that you have established a principle of representation that is upon the hypothesis that what has been recommended by the Committee of the Whole is to be the system established. I shall tell them there was one difficulty in our present Constitution to be remedied, that there were many small towns during certain years that were not entitled to be represented at all. Do you not think that is an evil? I think it is. Does your new Constitution contain the same provision? I believe it does, but not to the same extent perhaps! [Laughter.]

Some gentlemen think that 1,200 is about the right number that should entitle a town to send a representative, while others think that 1,000 is about the right number. And some again prefer another standard. It all reminds me of a nursery story which I used to sing to my children, or rather which my children used to sing to me:—

“Little Johnny Pringle had a little pig,
It was not very small and it was not very big.”

I think that will apply very well to the proposition now pending before us, which will cut off several towns from annual representation, and which contains a standard of population by which towns are to have an annual representation, which is neither very small nor very large, but which is just about right, as some think. Then as to the principle of requiring payment of a tax as a qualification for voters. The gentleman for Berlin, (Mr. Boutwell,) told us, and I took a note of it at the time because I thought it an extraordinary statement, that if you only made provision in the Constitution that there shall be no tax qualification required in the election of governor, lieutenant-governor, and the other officers of state, these being the major things, that it will be well enough to make no provision in regard to the town officers, but leave that to the legislature to determine, as those are the minor matters. I differ from the gentleman entirely in that respect. In the first place, I say that there is no principle at all established. I remember when I was a student at law at Cambridge that we were taught to say that there should not be one law at Rome, another at Athens; one law now and another hereafter, but one law, both eternal and immortal, shall have force among all nations and in all time. I believe that it is Cicero whom these gentlemen have quoted so much, who is its author. He says:—

“Non erit alia lex Romæ alia Athenis, alia nunc, alia posthac, set et omnes gentes et omni tempore una lex et sempiterna et immortalis continebit.”

I believe these are the words of Cicero, if not, those gentlemen will correct me, and they are a great deal better than any words I can say. Gentlemen say, if we establish the rule as to the qualifications for the governor, lieutenant-governor, and senators of the Commonwealth, we can leave the minor matters to the legislature, who will make them all right. That is the statement about which I wish to say something. I agree that the question who shall be governor of the Commonwealth is an important question, and that the questions relating to the other State officers, are of an important nature; but I humbly submit that the questions with which the people of the towns have to do in their town affairs, are of as far more importance to the true interests, welfare and happiness of the people, as it is possible to conceive. The business of small municipalities and great municipal corporations, comes home to us every day of our lives and every step we take. They provide for the education of our children. They lay our taxes, light our streets, lay out and repair our highways, build our school-houses, and have to do with the most important every day affairs of our lives; but it may be ten years or half a century before any law is passed in the legislature, which very nearly affects any particular man. I am not disposed to undervalue the importance of either, but I do think the gentleman for Berlin, (Mr. Boutwell,) was in a great error when he said that the important offices of the State were of more consequence than these minor ones of our towns. In regard to the town of Berlin, we have said, that the secret ballot ought to prevail. In regard to the city of Boston, I stated that we came here without reference to the secret ballot. Are we here by sufferance or are we here by right? If the former I would not stay a moment, but take my hat and walk out. The Convention did not choose to meet that question. Is the secret ballot law a good measure? The gentleman from North Brookfield, (Mr. Walker,) tells us that it is a most excellent provision and claims it and rightly so, as his thunder. Why does he not carry it out?

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.—CROWNINSHIELD—FOSTER.

I have already said what I intended to say in regard to the principle of representation. One word more upon the 'great principle of centralization, which is supposed to be exerted by the large cities, and I have done. In regard to that matter, I appeal to the experience of every gentleman in this Convention, who has had any legislative experience at all, to lay his hand upon his heart, and tell me whether he believes the city of Boston, Lowell or Salem, have ever exercised an undue influence in the legislation of the Commonwealth. Since I have had anything to do with public affairs, it has been directly the reverse. If, when a measure has been pending in the general court, that seemed likely to succeed when it started, it could be satisfactorily shown by its opponents, that it was a Boston measure, down it went at once. We come here, thirty or forty representatives from Boston, many of us strangers to each other, and I venture to say there is not a man here representing the city of Boston, who knows all his colleagues. For my own part I say, that there are several gentlemen representing the city, whom I do not know even by sight. I was introduced to one of my colleagues for the first time in my life a day or two since in an omnibus, and although I had become familiar with his face, sitting near him as I did, yet I did not know him even by name. And so it is always in the legislature. We come here strangers to each other. We are not much in the habit of practising a system of caucusing. I have found it uniformly to be the case, that the delegates from the city of Boston possess less influence than those of any other part of the State, in the House. How is it with members from the country? Country gentlemen come down here, and remain in the city during the greater part of the session. They meet together at the hotels and their boarding-houses, and they hold sort of a caucus every night while they are here. The course of legislation, when I was first a member, before I was let into the secret, used to puzzle me exceedingly. We would carry or reject a measure one day by a decided majority, and the next morning some one would move a reconsideration, which would be carried by one hundred majority, perhaps, without a single syllable being said by any body. The fact was easily accounted for when I understood the true state of the case. It was done by private caucusing at the boarding-houses. I dare say, if I lived thus in a boarding-house when I was a member, I should have spent as much time in this way as any other. If they can get more information by talking out of doors among themselves, it is so much the better; but when gentlemen make the charge here, that the city influence is a pernicious influence, which overawes and controls the legislature, I undertake to say, from the experience of four years, that it is not true. Then there are several cities of the Commonwealth represented in the legislature. Will gentlemen tell me that all their representatives that come here are of one mind? How is it in this Convention? Do the cities of Boston and Lowell unite to effect any common object? No! Do the cities of Boston and Worcester? No! Salem and Boston? I believe we happen to be agreed, and we have been, for a great many years, since that old association and acquaintance which was formed in the times that tried men's souls, when the city of Salem stood up so nobly to support the inhabitants of Boston, in the time of their distress, and refused to avail themselves of the advantages so artfully offered to them by the royal government. I believe the association then formed, has never been severed from that time to the present. The cities of the Commonwealth never have, or never will unite upon any common object. Therefore, when gentlemen talk about the centralizing influence exerted by cities, I ask, do they not continually counterbalance each other? We all know that is the case, as experience shows. Let me say a word about the statement made here of Boston owning Lowell. It may do very well to say so, but every-body knows that it is not true. That Boston capital, wealth and enterprise, in a great measure, established a prosperous business on the banks of the Merrimac, from which grew up that great city of Lowell, nobody will deny. A large portion of the capital and the enterprise which founded the city of Lowell, did come from Boston. So Waltham, which you represent, Mr. President, has grown up and flourished under the influence of the capital and energies of Boston men. Would the gentleman from Lowell desire that the property which belongs to Boston should be withdrawn from that city, and her wheels stopped, and her shuttles stand idle in the looms? Do you, Mr. President, as the representative of the good town of Waltham, desire that the property which is owned by Boston men, in that town, should be withdrawn and her wheels, shuttles and looms, stand idle? I apprehend not. Do the people of this Commonwealth desire that the capital of Boston, or that of any other city and town in the Commonwealth, should be annihilated and swept away? Do you want to see your public improvements stopped? The gentleman from Lowell would be the first man to turn around to me and tell me no. But I have already trespassed upon the indulgence of the Convention too long, and it is time I should conclude. Thanking the Convention for the great patience with which they have listened to my desultory remarks, I will now take my seat.

Mr. FOSTER, of Charlemont. Mr. President, I rise to answer the fifty questions which the gentleman from Boston has just asked, upon the single point of numerical equality in representation. I answer them in one word, and that is the word "majority." Sir, the majority of the people supersede equality. That is the answer, Sir. Refer this, or anything else to the people of Massachusetts, and what the majority say shall be, that is the law of the land, by the general consent of all parties, and by the principle of state governments. That is a full answer to the talk about equality. You may talk about what may be done, but the people decide what they will have, and that decides the question. That is exactly it; and it is the first great truth that I brought from home with me, to vote for that which I think the people will sustain. What is the use of spending hours and days theorizing upon equalities, when the people will not accept such theories and systems of equality? No, Sir, they will not take it, and why spend our time here theorizing about it till the sun goes down on the last day of July? No, Sir, let us act like men of common sense; let us look at the thing which we can do, and not at what we would do. The question here is not what we would do, but what we can do, and nothing else.

If all the people of Massachusetts were to come down here together on a sudden, from up somewhere, a new and fresh creation, then we might legislate and say what we would do, but we have a history behind us, and public opinion and the heart of the people behind us, and we must consider what is to come in the future. Now, Sir, I am ready to do what I can do. I will vote any way that will be suitable to the condition of this State, so far as I think the people will accept it. I must say, that I am very sorry, and I have now to express my regret, that the member from Waltham, (Mr. Banks,) said in his seat, there was one thing we must accede to; and the gentleman from Pittsfield, (Mr. Rockwell,) said the same thing; and the gentleman from Boston, (Mr. Crowninshield,) said the same thing. I cannot think that it is so. These gentlemen say—the district system must come; I cannot believe that.

I wish to say one word on that point, by way of giving a reason for my opinion. If the people of the country must receive this, they will of course, submit to it. I was at Inversnead, on Loch Lomond, in Scotland, the night on which the intelligence came that the American yacht had won the prize in the British waters. There were present English, Scotch and Americans, in considerable numbers. The subject engrossed the conversation of the evening, and went round with great glee. As usual, I was a silent listener. It was concluded by the English and Scotch that the race had been fairly won, and there was no use in making up wry faces about it—"we will take it with a quiet countenance and give the Americans all due praise," said they. Now, I say, if the country members must take this district system, they will at last take it in good heart when it comes. But, is it true that the district system must come? The large cities—and I will name Boston—I believe are resolved that the district system shall come, and they will conquer us if they can. I remember when I was in the State of Georgia, a good member of that State, said he had a brother who had married a woman who was determined on the supremacy in the family. Well, Sir, he said that his brother had all along demanded equality, and that that had been the strife with them for seven years. He said, that the mother of this good wife was overheard one day giving her daughter a little private and useful counsel, and she was heard to say, "Stick to him, daughter, it took me twenty years to conquer your father." [Laughter.] "Stick to him."

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES. — FOSTER — SHELDON.

[June 30th.

I wonder if the members of this Convention are ignorant of the past, and indifferent to the future. Can we not read the past and foresee the future, to some extent? Do you not know that Ninevah was the capital of the first universal empire, and Babylon the capital of the next, and that finally Rome conquered the whole world? Perhaps Boston aspires to something like the same position in the State of Massachusetts. This reminds me of Peter's keys, and leads me to inquire where they came from. They are hanging up in the citadel in the centre of Rome. The priest obtained these keys because he was bishop of the metropolitan city. They were gained by city supremacy. I remember once having a conversation with John C. Calhoun on that subject, and he said to me this idea of Peter's keys is the most curious piece of history in all this world. How came he to obtain them? That is the curious question. And I do not know how Boston is to get the supremacy with regard to this district system. I do not think they understand exactly the character of the people of Massachusetts. I am a countryman at heart, and I know how the hearts of countrymen beat throughout the State. It seems to me that things have changed with the common people since Rome conquered the world. Bonaparte's schoolmaster once ordered him to burn a letter which he had written. When the old schoolmaster was introduced to Napoleon, after he became Emperor of France, he said to him, "The times have changed since the burning of the letter." The people of Massachusetts are a deliberating people, they are a people of attachment to forms, and I have no doubt they will hold on to their town representation.

The hour of adjournment having arrived, the Convention adjourned.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The Convention reassembled at 3 o'clock, and resumed the consideration of the Orders of the Day.

Mr. FOSTER, of Charlemont, resumed his remarks. He said:—

Perhaps, Mr. President, I should rather listen to those distinguished gentlemen to whom I referred this morning, than to undertake to express my own peculiar views. I know that many of those gentlemen agree with me. The distinguished gentleman from Northampton, (Mr. Huntington,) did not directly enter into the argument on the point upon which I was speaking when the Convention adjourned this morning, yet the whole of his remarks went to sustain the idea that the people of the country will adhere, and succeed in adhering to town representation. Now the country people, as I have had occasion to say in this house a few days ago, love Boston, and will never cease to love Boston. There are, however, some interesting thoughts respecting the working of this country feeling. And one idea which seems to me to be particularly working in the minds of the people in the country, is the conventional idea. The gentleman from Waltham, (Mr. Banks,) took occasion to say that the smaller towns would of themselves come together in the district form. That result will not come in my opinion. The time is not coming within ten years, when they will act together in a conventional manner in electing members of the House of Representatives. The truth is, towns love location. It cannot be so much the case where the population of the towns are of a sea-faring character. My sympathies are strongly with the men of the sea; but, in all the towns west of Boston, the people love their corporations and their towns,—and they have been accustomed to elect their own members, and cannot agree to work together under the district system. It is not according to their views; they cannot do it, and they will not. It is with our country towns as it would be with an army of ten thousand men, divided into companies, which had always marched and fought together,—if you should decimate each company, by taking every tenth man in each company and forming a new company, and then by taking every ninth man, to form another, and so on, they would not be fit for the battle the next day. They could not go shoulder to shoulder as strangers. Our country towns are in the habit of seeing their representatives return among them, and converse with them, and sympathize with them. It is not so with our members of congress,—they are men at a distance from the towns, men unknown to many of the people who vote for them; but the representatives of the people here in this Convention, and in the legislature, are our neighbors, and our friends and associates, and this town representation will continue to adhere to the feelings of our country people all the way through their history.

Then there is the religious idea. All of us have our religious feelings, and religious associations, and all of us have ideas of reform which we must contend for in some shape, while we meet the different ideas of others. We wish the cheapest, and at the same time the most radical, reforms. Possibly, Mr. President, you and some gentlemen in Boston have no idea of the interest which the last session of the legislature excited in the minds of the country people respecting what we have to hope for or to fear hereafter, from certain city ideas of reform. The city members on this floor are not to blame for any of these feelings in the minds of the country members, in consequence of city opposition to reforms which are very clear to the country people.

Now, Sir, if Rome conquered the world it was in an age of little inquiry in the country. It is now very different in the country. The country people think, they reflect, they meditate and act uniformly for their own interests. They will adhere to their own interests and will work out their own systems, and adhere to the principles on which they have already established their corporations. This Convention is not a crisis in this State. It is not what we shall do here that will decide the question for the people of Massachusetts as to continuing their system of town representation. This is a question which will still go on, in spite of what we do, and work out its own idea among the people of Massachusetts hereafter. I am of opinion that the motion of the member from Plymouth, or something like it, will answer for the country. I am of the opinion that there are two hundred and fifty members on this floor who will be in favor of something in that form.

Mr. SHELDON, of Easton. This is the first time that I have asked the indulgence of this Convention on any subject, save to move an adjournment once or twice. Thus far I have been a silent listener, and a silent voter. And, Sir, I have been highly edified and instructed by the discussion which has passed in the Convention. Quite likely it would be for my interest, and the interest of all concerned, for me to remain silent through the whole term of the Convention in all its debates.

But, Sir, after having, with a good degree of patience, listened to the eloquence and argument of others, I have concluded that I also will show my opinion. I have not the vanity, Sir, to suppose I shall add materially to the eloquence or arguments given here. Already, I hear it said the climax of the one and the profoundest depths of the other have been reached. Yea, Sir, and that the whole subject in its length, breadth, height and depth, is fully and more than fully exhausted. It may be so. And I duly appreciate the feeling of those who thus think. I suppose the minds of all, or nearly all, are made up on the subject before us.

Then, it may be asked, why prolong the debate? Sir, I would not do it if I supposed the Convention were ready to take the final question. Perhaps I may, as well as others, take a share in the crime and responsibility of wasting the time, if it be thus. Besides, by uttering my views, I may derive some benefit from the animadversions of others. If wrong, I may, by their superior wisdom be set right. I have also, a vote to give on the pending question. I would give a just vote, and I would have it appear just to others. Differing, however, somewhat in my opinions of justice from some gentlemen who have taken part in this debate, I feel it my duty to express them, hoping in this way to gain light and knowledge in relation to duty. I ask, therefore, the indulgence of the Convention for a few moments.

Now, Mr. President, as I view the subject, our object should be to form a basis of representation which will be just, and one which will best secure the interests of all concerned—a basis of representation which will most equally distribute the governing power over the whole State. These are the objects which I shall endeavor to attain, and which I verily believe this Convention should labor to attain in their debate upon this question. I say, in the first place, our course should be just and right. This, Sir, is what I preach, and this is what I should practice, and this is what we all should practice, whether we preach it or not. The great question before us is, what is necessary to do justice to all? But, if I mistake not, a reply has been already given. Population, numerically considered, is the only basis of a just and equal representation of the whole people. That is one prominent sentiment which has been presented and advocated by nearly every one in the Convention who has spoken upon this question. If this be the only true basis of representation in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, it should be adopted, let the consequences be what they may. But, Sir, is it so? The question is whether numerical population is the only just basis. If it is, I submit whether we have now, ever had, or ever can have, a just and equal basis of representation in this State, or in these United States. Has any city or town in this State ever been represented equally, as to its population, when compared with the population of other towns in other sections of the State? Can you find two towns that are equally represented as it respects

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.—SHELDON.

population? There are some towns containing only a few hundred inhabitants, while others have a thousand or two thousand, and yet each sends the same amount of representation. Can you establish an equal representation in this manner? Suppose you take a town with five hundred inhabitants, and you decide that that town is entitled to one representative. If you give equal representation upon the basis of numerical population, you must give one representative to every five hundred inhabitants in every town and city in the Commonwealth. If you do not, Sir, you depart from and give up the numerical population as the only just basis of representation; and the first instant that you depart from the strict numerical basis of population, you depart from the principle that representation is to be based upon population entirely. Now, I ask again, have we any equal representation upon the ground of population? Can there be any? How will your proposed senatorial districts be? Are they to be divided into so many districts, and the number of inhabitants in each and every district counted out, equally and precisely the same? If they are not, they are not represented equally upon numerical population; just so far as you depart from the equality of numbers, just so far you depart from this principle. How is it in relation to congress men? How is it in relation to the representatives, and every department of the government where the officers are appointed? You are necessarily obliged to depart from this basis, and the same is true in relation to the general government of the United States. The very smallest of the different States has an equal number of senators with the very largest State of the Union. Their representation is not based in this respect upon numerical population. The object of this was said to be that it was designed to form a government of states on account of their relation to the general government as states. Very well; but is it not a departure from that principle which has been announced here as the only equal and just principle of representation? I care not what reasons you may give for that departure; the argument is, that true numerical population is the only just foundation for a proper representation. Suppose it was equally divided throughout the whole Commonwealth, and the inhabitants were all exactly counted out, giving to each town and city an exactly proportionate representation, I ask how long would it remain so? How long would it be before the births and deaths, and the influx of population from one place to another would destroy this equality? If population numerically is the only just and equal basis, then, I submit whether the whole framework of our State and the United States governments is not unequal and unjust, even at the present time. I submit too, Sir, whether they ought not to be overturned, and the idea of ever having a righteous government abandoned. Why, Sir, that class of men who have been styled fanatics, because they wish to overturn our government on account of its injustice, are in fact right, on this principle. If there is "monstrous injustice" when our government is not based upon an equal representation, then this government stands upon injustice and ought not to remain—it is contrary to right, and contrary to the best interests of the community.

Well, Sir, if we are obliged to give up the strict numerical population, not as a basis, but as a only basis of an equal and just representation, then the question arises, how far may we, and how far do circumstances require that we should depart from the principle of numerical population in order to get a good basis of representation? All seem to agree that there is a departure, and that there must be a departure—there will continue to be a departure; and the question is, when shall we arrive at the proper point to stop? How far is it expedient and best to depart from this principle? If it is a good and a practical principle, we should adhere to it; but if we cannot adhere to it strictly, how far may we deviate from it and give it up, and what shall we fix as the true standard, to enable us to secure the best interests of the community? What must come in to aid and relieve us in this situation? It is evident that there is a great difficulty in fixing a basis on numbers, because we cannot agree as to the manner in which we shall regulate these numbers, so as to give satisfaction to the people in all parts of the Commonwealth. I answer, in the next place, the interests of the people as individuals and associated communities. I admit the importance and the necessity of founding, in a measure, the basis of our representation upon numbers. I am perfectly willing that we should carry that as far as we can, but in connection with that system we must consider the interests of those who are to be represented. Your representatives ought to be so elected and distributed through the State as to secure and promote these interests in the highest degree. These interests are various. You have your merchants, your bankers, your manufacturers, your capitalists, your railroad companies, your printers, your mechanics, your farmers, your seamen, and numerous other interests. You also have, Mr. President, your cities, towns, and corporations, and your civil and religious rights and privileges, and innumerable interests besides, connected with the position and the circumstances of the different localities and sections of the State. Well, Sir, these interests are in your cities and towns all over the State—not in your cities alone, but in your towns also. They are in every body corporate in this Commonwealth, and in each as a corporate and a separate community. The cities would not be willing, neither ought they, to give up their interests wholly or unduly to the care of the towns; we do not ask it or desire it. No method should be adopted which will take from the cities their just rights; neither should the towns be deprived of their rights for the benefit of the cities. In these respects there should be a mutual action, a mutual concert, a mutual effort, to promote the interests of the cities and the towns together. Now, Sir, what shall be done? I answer, that we should elect so many representatives, and distribute them over the State, as is needful to look to and secure the interests of the whole community. Now, I take it, from the statements of all the gentlemen here, that our government ought to provide for the interests of all the different portions of the community. Will not the city of Boston, with the number of representatives which we propose to give to her, have representatives enough to look to and secure her interests? I put the question to any gentleman who represents that city, if thirty representatives are not a sufficient number to promote the interests of the city of Boston, and could they not do it as well as fifty or a hundred members? And so with every other large city and town, or even the smaller towns; do we not propose to give them a representation which will secure their interests? And certainly this they ought to have—all of them. If nothing but the true and necessary interests of the people were cared for,—and these on equitable principles,—the population basis might be disregarded altogether, and yet each city and town might have that number of representatives which is necessary to secure its interests. But as things are, it is needful that both come into consideration as elementary parts of the same system. We have a population, and that population have personal rights and interests also; and both of these being inseparably connected, must come into our calculations upon the representative basis. Nor is this all. The people and their interests need regulating. They must be so managed as not to conflict with each other in their various aspects and circumstances. Hence the importance and the necessity of government. A people diverse in their feelings, opinions, pursuits, and objects, need a general government. In order for this they must compromise some of their personal rights and privileges for the good of the whole. Unless they are willing to do this; unless the cities and the large towns are willing to compromise some of their personal rights and privileges, there could be no union; there could be no general government organized or sustained. This compromise may be as to their numerical rights, or their interests, or both; doubtless both. This may be requisite in order to a just and beneficial administration of government; and if so, it is fit and proper. The highest individual good is secured by being so connected and governed. Thus, the people being too numerous to conduct their concerns in an assembly of the whole, relinquish this personal right, and delegate their power to a part of the people. Hence comes a representative government, as it is termed. To these representatives the power of making and directing the execution of the laws is committed.

Now, Sir, as this government has to do with the persons and the interests of the whole, in their individual and social relations, it should be so distributed as to secure the persons, rights, and interests of the whole. Here another question arises. How shall this be done? It seems to me that this may and should be effected by distributing the administrative power of the government over the whole State as equally as possible.

Here comes in another element, which will materially affect the basis of representation. If I do not greatly mistake, it will do much to justify, and even require a considerable departure from numerical population, as the only basis of a just representation. Where, then, lies the power of the government? Solely in its numbers? I think not, Sir,—at least not wholly, by any means. Where does it lie, then? In certain localities and circumstances of the community to be governed, in a very considerable measure. I venture to say, Sir, that ten men, in certain positions, may exert more influence and power in and over every government, than twenty or thirty in other circumstances and locations. Central locations, wealth, talent, corporate privileges—these, with many other things, have a mighty power in directing and controlling the government in various respects. This power passes more or less by steam, by water, by money, by relative associations, through all our towns and villages, over the length and breadth of the State. Take, for instance, if you please, and only as an instance, the city of Boston, or any other large city, where is concentrated wealth, talent, and influences of this description. The influence of the social relations, the influence of wealth and talent, goes out into all parts of the community, and bears upon the towns, and especially upon the leading portions of many towns of the Commonwealth. They exert an influence not only at home but abroad, an influence unspeakably more extensive than other localities of a similar nature can exert. In whatever portion of the State these exist, they give an almost overwhelming advantage over those sections of the State where similar or less influential localities exist.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.—SHELDON.

Now, Sir, should the sources of power become corrupt and corrupting in their influence, they would soon poison and destroy the vital energies of the body politic. It is through the instrumentality of these corrupt and corrupting influences, that almost all the republics of the world have been overturned and destroyed. Now, Sir, how is this devastating tide to be checked and regulated? I do not say that it does now exist, but only speak of it as a thing which is possible, and one to which we ought to look, in the progress of things, in this, as well as in other governments. I see nothing to be put against this but numbers. There is not the wealth, there is not the local position, there is not the talent, there is not the powerful influence in the outer sections in the State, that there is concentrated in the city, and in the central localities. It must be acknowledged, and doubtless will be, that there is nothing to oppose to these corrupt and corrupting influences, but the numbers which can be sent up from those towns. Besides, Sir, the governing power of the small towns is much lessened by their different opinions, interests and merits. The argument seems to have been founded on the supposition, that these towns are to exert their combined strength and influence in opposition to the larger towns and cities. But it is not so in fact. For various reasons—differences of opinion, interests and measures, in the various small towns scattered all over the State, divide them, and some are of one party, opinion and feeling, and some of another. They, therefore, in a great measure, counteract each others' power, influence and efforts, in the management of the affairs of the government. Other sections are more powerful, by their union, in this respect. Take some of the large cities, and their representatives upon this floor, or upon the floor of the legislature, may all be of one political opinion, perhaps. That I do not object to. I do not speak of it as being wrong, if the people choose to elect them. Well, they come here, and they may not know each other, but I venture to say, that if an object of interest comes up before the legislature, they will know each other, and many others will know them. A common interest will bring them together. But I do not object to this. It is perfectly natural, and perfectly right, if they act upon right principles. Each town and city has a right thus to act, if they act righteously in what they do. Now, Sir, I submit, that these things ought to have an influence in determining the question before us; and it appears to me, that with the impartiality and entire destitution of party feeling and designs, which gentlemen have here professed, they will be willing to act upon such just and honorable principles. Sir, I do not profess to come here without party feelings. I come here as connected with a party that had an object to accomplish, knowing that there was a party in opposition to that object, and calculating righteously and justly to carry out that object, in connection with the party with which I associated myself, so far as they acted justly and rightly, and no farther. I disclaim all unjust party feeling, but that I am not in favor of something in particular, I do not pretend to say or acknowledge. I had an object in coming here, and I wish to carry it out, and I hope it will be accomplished, if it is right, but if not, I hope it will be defeated. Let the numerical population, the interests of the community, and the administrative power of the government be duly regarded by each individual, each town, and each section of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, and then, I think, they would apply and act on the pure and heavenly principle, adopted by one of the gentlemen representing Boston, as the ground of his efforts here—"Whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you, do ye even so unto them."

These views, Sir, will help us to determine the number of representatives which are needful. They should be as many as are required to secure the personal safety, interest, and equitable government of the whole people. If a large number is requisite, then a large number is the proper and best one. If a small number, is the number which will best secure the personal safety, interest, and equitable government of the whole people, then a small number of representatives will be the best one. On this basis we ought to rest.

The present number is supposed to be too large. The number proposed in this amendment which has been proposed here, is also supposed to be too large. This is a matter of opinion, and we can determine upon it only by expressing our opinions, drawn from what we see exists now, or that may exist in future. There are two general objections to a large number of representatives. One is the expense attending it, and the other is the delay or hinderance in legislation which results from it.

The first objection, is the expense. Well, Sir, we would all, undoubtedly, avoid expense if we could; we would have our government conducted without any expense, either to the government or individuals in the State, if it were possible; but we cannot. That is out of the question. Then the question arises, how much expense is needful? Just as much as is required to sustain that legislation which is needful to secure the personal safety, interest, and proper government of the people, and no more. Who makes this expense? Why, in the first place, the people lead to it by electing the number of representatives they choose to elect; and by the election of that number they say they are willing to bear the expense. What has been done in electing delegates to this Convention? Was not every town and city anxious to elect as many delegates as they could; and having elected them, are not they willing to pay them. If the people are willing to have a large House, they will be willing to pay the expenses of such a House. But I ask again, to whom is this expense paid? Who receives it? To be sure, it is shifted from one portion of the community to another. As respects the amount of wealth, there is an abundance, a superfluity in different parts of the State, to pay any expense which will be made here at any time in the legislature? Besides, who receives the benefit of the expenditure? The people, either directly themselves, or through the instrumentality of the individuals they send here. I ask you, how money can be better expended than in promoting the interests, and protecting the rights of the person and property of the people?

As to the complaint of delay or hinderance in the business of legislation, who causes that delay? Who hinders progress in our deliberative assemblies? Whoever else may do it, I think, Sir, none of us will attribute it to the members generally from the small towns. That is not generally the case. No, Sir, the members from small towns are, generally speaking, only like silent-jurors, with all long-suffering, patience and forbearance, they listen to the eloquence and arguments of the sapient attorneys, longing ardently for an opportunity to give their verdict. So it is with them, and finally and often they are driven to the disagreeable necessity of demanding the "previous question," in order to close up what has become a tedious and useless discussion, and I allow myself to be engaged in the same. I speak not of this body particularly, but of legislative action.

But let me revert to the point of reducing the size of the legislative body. Where shall we begin? Are the cities willing to begin with themselves? Are the large towns willing to cut off a portion of their number? Are the small towns willing to restrict themselves? Is any county willing to do this? Do we not hear objections from all quarters and all parts, that you are going to take from us our rights, and give them to others? All ask for a reduction, but the moment the work is begun each one asks himself how it will affect his own community?

Fix this basis as you may, and I feel sure that the cities and large towns will have their full share in the administrative power of the government. I do not think there is the least danger under any system of representation that you may establish, that the cities and large towns will not have their full share of influence and power—at least equal to that of any other portion of the Commonwealth in proportion to their population. For instance, suppose the city of Boston. I take this city merely as an example. I say, suppose this city has nominally thirty representatives. Are these representatives the only persons who exert power in and over the action of the legislature, while it is in session in this city? No, Sir, no, Sir. I do not forget what the gentleman from Boston, who addressed the Convention this morning, has said, that the representatives from the small towns had, vastly more influence over the legislature than the representatives from the city of Boston. I understood him to say that it is not true that individuals in the city exert an influence over the members from the country in relation to their conduct in the legislature. Sir, it will require pretty strong evidence to convince me that such an influence is not exerted. I believe it is thrown in and around the legislature by the citizens of Boston enough to overbalance the votes of many country members. I may be in an error, but I submit whether the power of Boston in the legislature is not more than a hundred per cent. over her numerical representation? While passing to and from the city, in the cars, I have met with lobby members of the legislature, who were telling how they had been here in the city, and how they had operated upon and influenced such and such members of the legislature to vote for this or that measure. Well, Sir, if this has been done in the past, I do not know why it will not be done again in the future. At any rate, I think we ought to make provision for as large a country influence in the legislature as we can without interfering with the rights of the city. Thus it is proportionately with the large and central portions of the Commonwealth. The distant small towns cannot be here in anything like equal proportions; and if they were, their influence would be comparatively trifling. Why, Sir, here are our merchant princes, with their elegant and powerful bearing, our wealthy capitalists, with their all-controlling banking system and operations; our immense railroads, and manufacturing corporations; an empire—yes, Sir, an EMPIRE of business men—are here in the city of Boston. Why, Sir, gentlemen have told me, in conversation, that they were influenced in consequence of their connection with individuals in the city of Boston, in matters of business. Sir, it is natural, perfectly natural, to be influenced by such considerations. We cannot rid ourselves of that influence. Sir, their power, in this respect, is incalculable, and they know it. I do not hesitate to say that they know it. I am willing that they should know it. I do not object. And they must be something more than men, if they do not labor to sustain and use, too, what they consider their advantage. If they do it not, I think they are different men from what exist in any other part of the State, or any other State with which I have any acquaintance. I blame them not for this. I blame them not for using their influence. I blame them not for using every proper means to promote their business interests. I am not blaming them for anything they have done. I only wish that the credit for what they have done shall go where it appropriately belongs.

Now, Sir, we want some checks and balances upon this power. It does exist. Let it exist. I am willing it shall exist; but while it does exist, we want some power behind it, by which we may check it whenever it shall not keep itself within proper limits. We want it for the good of the State; we want it for their own good. Sir, I believe the city of Boston, and other cities, are as dependent upon the country for their support as the country is upon them, and I think they need some protection. They need these checks and balances to protect themselves against any undue influence, for, in spite of themselves, notwithstanding their general intentions to deal honestly and uprightly with all men, there is a tendency, as there always has been, in every age, and in every section of the country, and in every age and section of the world, to depart from right principles and right purposes. And therefore it is, that we all need checks and balances to regulate our conduct in all respects, and these cities and large towns need them to regulate theirs, especially in this respect; and our only resort, in this emergency, is to numbers. This, Sir, I think, must be our safety ballast in the noble ship Massachusetts. Sir, will you retain this ballast, or throw it overboard; cut her cable, and let her drive before the tempest of overwhelming centralization. You may start at the word centralization, you may reject it; you may repudiate it, but what is the history of the world? What is the history of our own republic, of our nation? Is not the tendency to centralization everywhere manifest? Is it not apparent in every portion of the country, and is it not apparent in Massachusetts? Our only safety is in numbers, and I am therefore in favor of a good sized legislature, I believe the safety and interest of the people demand it. And I believe the people are willing to sustain it at any reasonable expense. I believe they will be disappointed if many of the towns are deprived of a direct share in the legislation of the State.

But, gentlemen say, they are not afraid of the people of the towns. What then is the trouble? What is the trouble in this Convention? If they are not afraid of the people of the towns, why not give every town a representative, and let them come up here with the representatives of the large towns and attend to the interest of those towns. If gentlemen are not afraid of them, why not let them come up here every year by their representatives, without objection? I ask again, then, what is the trouble? Why, they say the trouble is not with the people of the towns or with the representatives, but with their political aspirants. Sir, I am afraid of the small and the large towns both. I am afraid of all the different sections and localities in the Commonwealth. So long as I know the selfishness of man and his proneness to do evil, I shall distrust them, without a proper system of checks, regulations and balances upon their conduct. I am afraid of any town whether it be large or small. And still more am I afraid of their political aspirants. Whenever an election approaches, they always make their appearance, and I say I am afraid of them from the city as well as the country. I am afraid of their influence in the management of the government, and for that very reason, I would mingle in the legislature, a good share of honest, stable, intelligent, working farmers, who are not political aspirants; who come to do the business of the people, to secure their persons and to promote their interests, to administer the government in a manner that shall be equitable, just and righteous to all. I, therefore, go for town representation as far as possible, and as far as is justifiable in connection with numerical representation. Sir, I believe a just and equal representation will require us in fixing our basis to depart materially from strict numerical population. Such an one as the district system will not allow us to adopt. I shall therefore go for some plan founded on population, interest and power justly distributed, if such an one is proposed—or can be obtained. I hope, therefore, that we shall be enabled to fix on some one of the many propositions which have been presented here; such an one as will furnish security to the persons and interests of the people, and which shall secure power and prosperity to the Commonwealth. And so far I have seen no one to which I would more readily give my consent than to that now before you, as reported from the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GRISWOLD, for Erving. I suppose there is a very general disposition throughout the Convention to take the question upon the various amendments which have been, or may be proposed to the question now under consideration. I think, perhaps, in view of the protracted discussion in Committee of the Whole, and in Convention in relation to it, it will not be worth while to delay longer than this evening or tomorrow, in coming to some definite result upon it. I had intended to have made some general remarks, but I am willing, for one, to have the question taken upon the various propositions before us, immediately. I think, after the discussion we have had, the general proposition is understood perhaps as well now as it will be at any future time.

I wish merely to say in reply to a remark made by the gentleman from Boston, this morning, in reference to my own course, that I have not publicly advocated the amendment of the gentleman from Lowell, (Mr. Butler). I was originally in favor, and I am still in favor of giving to every town a representative in the House of Representatives every year. But it has been urged very strongly that it was necessary to district the cities. The plan proposed by the Majority Report, carried the principle of town representation throughout, and therefore it did not district the cities. But if you divide the cities into districts, it was thought that the towns must yield something. Now, Sir, if I cannot get precisely the proposition I want, why, of course, I must yield something in order to compromise the matter, and although it is not perfectly in accordance with my wishes, I am willing to, and shall vote for the proposition introduced by the gentleman from Lowell, (Mr. Butler). It seems to me that this is as far as the small towns can go, or will submit to go; and on the whole, if we are to compromise the matter between the two extreme propositions as presented respectively by the Majority and Minority Reports, I think this is as far as anything that can be arrived at. At any rate, it seems to me we may as well take the question upon the various amendments which have been proposed, and for one, I am willing to commence taking them at this time, without extending my remarks as I had proposed to have done.

Mr. ALLEN, of Worcester. I think no one will think it unreasonable that the sense of this Convention should now be taken as to the expediency of continuing this debate any longer upon this subject. I have listened to the speeches that have been made, pro and con, upon this question, and it seems to me that we have had the substance of all that can be said relative to the question now before us. With a view, therefore, of bringing the matter to the test, I move the previous question.

Mr. SCHOULER, of Boston. I agree with the gentleman from Worcester, as to the propriety of terminating this debate, but I hope we shall proceed to vote without the previous question, because I think there are many gentlemen here who have propositions upon which they desire to have the vote of the Convention, and if the previous question is carried, of course that will cut off all except those which are now pending. No others can be entertained.

Mr. ALLEN. I understand the practice to have been to allow propositions for amendment to be made after the previous question has been ordered. It certainly was not my desire to prevent gentlemen from offering their amendments.

The PRESIDENT. That has not been the practice after the previous question has been ordered. Propositions for amendment may be entertained by general consent, but not otherwise.

Mr. ALLEN. Well, Sir, I know of no other mode of reaching a vote upon these propositions.

Thursday,]

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.—BRIGGS—WILSON—WHEELER—DAVIS—THOMPSON.

[June 30th.

I presume, by general consent, the Convention will allow a vote to be taken upon each of the various propositions that may be offered.

Mr. BRIGGS, of Pittsfield. If any one man in the Convention objects, it cannot be done. I hope this Convention will not act upon the supposition that what the Convention decided against by a majority will be allowed by common consent. I hope the gentleman from Worcester will withdraw the call for the previous question. It seems to me manifest that the debate upon this proposition is concluded, that no gentleman desires to continue the debate, and I hope, therefore, we shall be allowed to go on and vote upon such propositions as may be offered without resorting to the previous question.

Mr. WILSON, of Natick. I would suggest to my friend from Worcester, that by common consent, we had better not press that question now, but let us proceed to vote upon the several propositions that are offered. We have spent already fifty-six hours and listened to one hundred speeches upon this subject, and I think no gentleman will desire to consume more time in discussion. But it seems to me that the best way is not to force the previous question. If we will proceed at once to vote, we can take several votes to-night before we adjourn. But if we adopt the previous question, some gentleman may object to propositions being offered, and in this way others who have plans upon which they desire a vote of the Convention may fail of obtaining an opportunity.

Mr. ALLEN. If it appears to be the wish of the Convention to proceed to a vote without farther debate, I should be disposed to withdraw my motion, as it may be made at any future time, if it becomes necessary. It certainly appears to me to be important, that in some way we proceed to a vote upon the question before us. I withdraw the demand for the previous question at present.

The PRESIDENT. The question now before the Convention is upon the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Plymouth, (Mr. Davis).

Mr. WHEELER, of Lincoln. I do not propose to take up the time of the Convention upon this matter. I merely wish to make an inquiry of the gentleman from Plymouth to see if I understand the operation of his amendment. It proposes that every town having five hundred inhabitants shall choose five representatives in ten years, and that it may choose an additional representative in ten years for every two hundred additional inhabitants. I want to inquire what effect this provision will have. If I understand it, that town which has thirteen hundred inhabitants will have nine representatives in ten years. I may be mistaken about it. It will have, according to my understanding, five representatives for the first five hundred inhabitants, and it will then have for an increase of eight hundred, four more representatives which makes nine.

Mr. DAVIS, of Plymouth. If the gentleman will refer to the last paragraph of the document which has been printed and circulated, he will find the remainder of my amendment, which has been separated from the two first propositions, and I think the gentleman will find that he is incorrect in supposing that these towns will have more than one representative in a year. A town of 700 inhabitants would have seven representatives in ten years; a town of 800 would have eight; a town of 1,100 would have eight; a town of 1,300 would have nine, besides one for valuation year, which would make ten in ten years. It makes the basis essentially 1,300.

The question was taken upon Mr. Davis's amendment, and it was rejected.

The question then recurred on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Charlestown, (Mr. Thompson).

Mr. SCHOUER. Is my amendment now in order?

The PRESIDENT. It is not in order, inasmuch as it is a substitute for other propositions. The first question is upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Charlestown, upon which question the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. ALLEY, of Lynn, moved to reconsider the vote by which the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken upon Mr. Alley's motion, and a count being had, there were—ayes, 188; noes, 80.

The PRESIDENT. The question now recurs upon the motion for the yeas and nays, demanded by the gentleman from Charlestown, (Mr. Thompson).

The question was taken, and it was decided in the affirmative.

So the yeas and nays were ordered. The question then recurred upon the amendment of the gentleman from Charlestown, (Mr. Thompson).

Mr. THOMPSON. I wish the Convention may be apprised of the fact, that a section has been engrafted into my amendment, taken from the plan submitted by the gentleman from Lowell, (Mr. Butler,) authorizing towns to unite, which reads as follows:—

Any two of such towns may, by a vote of a major part of the legal voters of each, at legal meetings thereof, unite together in a district, which shall be entitled to a representative each year, and which shall continue for a period of not less than five years, excepting the year in which the valuation of estates is settled.

The question was then taken upon the amendment as modified, and there were—yeas, 129; nays, 199—as follows:—

Absent and not voting, 90.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WILSON, of Natick. I wish to amend the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Lowell, (Mr. Butler,) by adding, at the end of the fourth paragraph, which reads as follows: "Every town of 4,000 inhabitants, and of less than 8,000, shall be entitled to two representatives each year," the following words: "and the mean increasing ratio shall be 4,000;" and to strike out the fifth, sixth, and seventh paragraphs.

Mr. BUTLER, of Lowell. I would inquire of the gentleman if he did not mean to move to strike out the last paragraph but two, which provides that the House shall not exceed three hundred and seventy. Because if he does not, he will have two provisions which will clash with each other, and he will get a House of four hundred and fifty, with a provision that it shall not exceed three hundred and seventy.

Mr. WILSON, of Natick. Mr. President, I ask the indulgence and attention of the Convention for a few moments. I shall be very brief in what I have to say in favor of the amendment I have proposed.

The amendment to the Report of the Committee proposed by my friend from Lowell, (Mr. Butler,) will, I am quite sure, be sustained by the Convention. The votes already taken clearly indicate that a majority of the Convention is in favor of the provisions embodied in the amendment now pending. A majority of the Convention is evidently in favor of town representation. If town representation is to be the system, the amendment moved by the delegate from Lowell, (Mr. Butler,) is by far the best one proposed to attain that end. I have given this plan my vote in preference to all other plans proposed, but I voted for it with the hope that the mean increasing ratio would be changed from five thousand to four thousand. I voted against the amendment proposed by my friend from Charlestown, (Mr. Thompson,) with the fullest expectation that the gentleman from Lowell and his friends would readily assent to the change I now propose. Other gentlemen, I am sure, voted as I did. I am not a little surprised at the opposition of the gentleman from Lowell to the amendment I have moved. The Convention, I trust, will sustain the amendment, even should the gentleman from Lowell persist in his opposition to it. Justice and sound policy alike demand its adoption.

I am in favor, personally, of the district system. If I had the power I would make a House of three hundred members, based on legal voters, in single districts of contiguous territory, preserving town lines as near as practicable. We have based the Senate on population; I would base the House upon legal voters. A House of three hundred would be large enough, and if chosen in single districts the members would represent fully the sentiments and opinions of the people. Such a system would secure equality of representation and simplicity of arrangement, now and in the future.

I have not pressed my own views upon the Convention. I have yielded to the wishes and judgments of others,—of gentlemen who have taken an active and leading part in favor of the Convention. Having, by your kindness, Mr. President, been placed at the head of the Committee on the Senate, and having had my opinions fully carried into effect by the almost unanimous voice of the Convention, I have, on this question of the basis of the House of Representatives, chosen to follow the lead of my distinguished friends who have addressed the Convention with so much power and eloquence. If I have erred in yielding up my own sentiments and opinions, and in following the lead of my friends, I shall have the consolation of knowing that I have acquiesced in the policy advocated by some of the most glorious names in our history, among the living and the dead, and sustained for more than two centuries by the voice of the people of this ancient Commonwealth. The time may not have arrived to adopt a district system, yet I cannot but think that if the delegate for Erving, (Mr. Griswold,) the delegate for Berlin, (Mr. Boutwell,) the delegate for Manchester, (Mr. Dana,) and other gentlemen who have advocated the mixed system with so much zeal and ability had come out for a single district system based on legal voters, and a House of three hundred members, that such a system would have received the support of the Convention and of the people. All parties would have accepted the system; a formation would not have been made against its adoption by any considerable portion of the people.

The Convention, by decisive majorities, has decided against all propositions for the district system. The mixed system of town representation is to be continued. The Convention stands committed to it by several votes already taken. This system should be made as just and perfect as possible. It must, in any event, be unequal, measured solely by the standard of population. I think we should do justice to all sections of the Commonwealth, as far as we can do so and preserve town representation. The distinction between the towns and the cities is now too broad. The inequality is so glaring that it will shock the sense of justice. Therefore, Sir, I have proposed to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Lowell by substituting four thousand for five thousand, as the mean increasing ratio. This will increase the House eight—six in Boston, one in Lowell, and one in New Bedford. My friend from Walpole, (Mr. Bird,) suggests that it will give a House of three hundred and ninety-nine instead of three hundred and ninety-one provided for by the proposition of the gentleman from Lowell, (Mr. Butler). If it be necessary to take off the limitation of three hundred and seventy, I am willing to take it off altogether or enlarge the number to three hundred and eighty-five or four hundred. If gentlemen, if the people, wish to preserve town representation, they must take the consequences of town representation—a large House of Representatives. If the people want the House reduced, let them abandon town representation and go for an equitable district system. Town representation and a large House must go together in the future, as in the past. When the people are ready to abandon town representation, they can have a reduced House of Representatives, and a district system based upon legal voters or population.

If, Mr. President, the amendment I have proposed, to make the increasing ratio four instead of five thousand is adopted, I shall vote for the amendment now pending. If we are to have a mixed system, let it be liberal and just to all sections of the State—as liberal and just as it can be made and preserve town representation. If the amendment I have proposed is rejected, I shall feel constrained to vote against the proposition made by the member from Lowell, (Mr. Butler). It will be unjust towards the cities—grossly unjust; and I cannot vote for a plan that is so unequal and unjust. Adopt the amendment I have proposed—take off the limitation of three hundred and seventy members, if necessary, as I think it is, and the amendment now pending will be adopted by the Convention and by the people.

The plan now pending, introduced by the gentleman from Lowell, (Mr. Butler,) if amended as I propose to amend it, will be substantially the plan introduced some time ago by my friend from Quincy, (Mr. White). If gentlemen will read the proposition carefully, as it will stand if the amendment I have proposed is adopted, and the limitation at three hundred and seventy taken off, they will see that it combines interests and influences enough to carry it triumphantly before the people. If gentlemen have any doubts about that, let them analyze the proposition and they will doubt no longer.

In the first place, it takes sixty-four towns which have now only about four representatives each in ten years, and gives to each of them six representatives in ten years, and it gives them this number perpetually, no matter what may be the increase of the population of the Commonwealth. It gives these towns, whose representation was vanishing at every decennial period, a position of power, influence and permanency in the House of Representatives. It is therefore for the interest of these sixty-four small towns to go for this proposition.

In the second place, it gives to seventy-five towns, which now have about the average of six representatives in ten years, a full representation now, and it secures it to each of them in the future, unless any of them should fall below one thousand in population. At every decennial period the representation and power of these towns in the House would diminish, so that in a few years, they would be almost powerless. This plan restores to them annual representation and secures it to them in the future.

In the third place, it secures to nearly one hundred towns, between 1,560 and 2,100, that now have a representation each year, but which would be reached and reduced by the census of 1860 and 1870. Most of these towns would be reduced in their representation in 1860, nearly all of them in 1870. It is therefore for the interests of these towns to go for this proposition.

In the fourth place, there are several towns that have between 4,000 and 4,700 inhabitants that will gain one representative each. It is for the interest of the people of these towns to go for this plan, and they will be quite likely to follow where interest leads the way.

In the fifth place, this plan districts the large towns and cities. This will meet the warm commendation of the minorities of those towns and cities and of the masses, even of the majority parties, who will obtain by its adoption greater power and influence in the nomination and election of their representatives.

I think, Mr. President, that gentlemen of all parties err altogether, who apprehend that this plan of representation will fail before the people. The friends and opponents of this measure had better unite, and make it as perfect, just, and equitable as possible. If we are to have town representation, we must have inequality, more or less. Let us then try to make a system as equal as is practicable.

Mr. STETSON, of Braintree. Mr. President, I had no intention of addressing the House at all on this subject. I do not now intend to say but a word or two. I voted for the amendment of my friend from Charlestown, (Mr. Thompson,) because, in the first place, it was the fairest and most just proposition which has been before me to vote upon. I think, Sir, that with the amendment of the gentleman from Natick, I would vote for this proposition; and the reason is, because it makes the proposition more just, more equal, and more proper, and will present to the citizens of the State one that is not so unjust as other propositions. As has been said before I came into this House in favor of the district system; but as that matter is not to be heard, I take the next best proposition, and that which will be most satisfactory to the people of this State. Therefore I think the amendment ought to prevail.

Mr. HALLETT, for Wilbraham. I desire to say, Mr. President, that I am in favor of this amendment, but I wish the gentleman to modify it in a form which I think will make it more correct in its expression. The proposition as it now reads, is as follows: "And the mean increasing ratio shall be four thousand." I would suggest whether it is sufficiently definite; whether it should not be: "And the mean increasing ratio for a representative of each town and city, shall be four thousand." I suggest that form of expression, as otherwise it might seem to apply only to towns of four thousand inhabitants.

Mr. WILSON. I will accept the modification suggested by my friend for Wilbraham.

Mr. HALLETT. Mr. President, I desire to say, in this connection, that it seems to me this amendment, fixing a progressive ratio of four thousand for an additional representative, removes an objection which does exist to every kind of proposition which undertakes to absolutely limit the increase in the large towns and cities; and that is a difficulty that I have always found in relation to any proposition that did not give a fair progressive ratio of increase over a fixed number. I have stood, from the beginning, in the conviction, and I so stated when I had the honor of addressing the Convention on the 17th of June, that we must find a medium proposition which would give the sixty-four towns that had a population of less than one thousand a representation, so that every town should have at least one representative each alternate year, or unite, and have one every year, for two towns in a district, as they saw fit. Then we must give to every town of a thousand inhabitants, and under a given number, (say 4,000,) one representative yearly, and to all over four thousand, a progressive ratio to the extent of their population. That is clear, explicit and simple, and that combines the two principles which have, from the beginning of our Commonwealth, and always, been the foundation of our representation in the House. It is a rule consistent with original, existing, and progressive rights, and, therefore, perfectly equal and perfectly just. It carries out precisely that rule that was so anxiously labored after by the gentleman from Boston, who was in his seat this forenoon, (Mr. Crowninshield,) and who came here at the end of nearly three weeks, after we had been elaborately discussing this matter in all its bearings, and rushed into it with great eloquence and earnestness, as if it had been a new and untried topic upon which nobody had said or thought anything. That rule I have desired from the beginning to see laid down, and it conforms precisely to the platform of representation plainly established, but which that gentleman could not find, or passed over, in the Constitution of 1780; for while he exhorted us to follow the fathers and the Bill of Rights, he strangely omitted to cite from the Constitution which contained that Bill of Rights, the precise rule of town representation which we now propose.

Now what was the representative rule of 1780, and what is the rule which we now propose to adopt? The old Constitution provided that, "Every corporate town, containing one hundred and fifty ratable polls, may elect one representative; every corporate town, containing three hundred and seventy-five ratable polls, may elect two representatives; every corporate town, containing six hundred ratable polls, may elect three representatives; and proceeding in that manner, making two hundred and twenty-five ratable polls the mean increasing number for every additional representative. Provided, nevertheless, that each town now incorporated, not having one hundred and fifty ratable polls, may elect one representative; but no place shall hereafter be incorporated with the privilege of electing a representative unless there are within the same one hundred and fifty ratable polls."

That was the representative rule then. It had been the rule from 1634 down to 1775. It was solemnly reenacted in 1775. It went into the Constitution of 1778 and 1780, and was reaffirmed in 1820, and we are now called on to reestablish it, and because we are doing just what has been the rule for two hundred years, all this clamor is raised about inequality and injustice, as though there had never been uniform and universal town representation.

Here stands the proposition, the rule of centuries in the Constitution of 1780, that every town should have at least one representative, and then that there should be a mean increasing ratio for every additional representative, but that no town thereafter should be incorporated with representation without a population of one hundred and fifty ratable polls. The proposition of the gentleman from Lowell embraces that same provision, by providing that no town shall hereafter be incorporated, with the privilege of representation, having less than fifteen hundred inhabitants. A town may be incorporated with less inhabitants, but not a representative town.

Now I say, taking the proposition adopted as an amendment by the gentleman from Natick, for a mean increasing number of 4,000 for every town over 4,000 inhabitants, and we carry out precisely the parallel of the representative rule laid down in the Constitution of 1780. The only difference is they took ratable polls for the basis, and we take inhabitants. Gentlemen may talk as much as they please about inequality, and about one man counting more than another in a different county; they may attempt to ignore town representation as if it never existed; I say, Sir, if we put the Constitution on the same principle as to representation upon which the Constitution of 1780 was based by the inhabitants of all the towns of the Commonwealth at that time, we will carry it through with a strong expression of the popular will, and the district system will find no favor with the mass of the people.

And what was that principle? What was the Massachusetts rule of representation? Every town in this Commonwealth was represented in that Convention of 1780, or every town was invited to send a delegate, and though they did not all send, they might have done so. Then three hundred towns were entitled to representatives, and that Constitution declared that every town in the State should be entitled to have at least one representative, and accordingly every town did or might ever after have had one in the general court. They then fixed upon one hundred and fifty polls as the basis for one representative. Now we propose to adopt a population of one thousand as the basis for one representative. That is precisely parallel to the rule of 1780, only increasing the number which forms the first basis. They said two hundred and twenty-five polls should be the mean increasing ratio, and we say four thousand inhabitants shall be the ratio of increase to entitle to an additional representative. That is precisely parallel, and disposes of all towns and cities from one thousand inhabitants and upwards. Then, as to the small towns, they made a proviso in 1780 that each town of less than one hundred and fifty polls should nevertheless have one representative. We say that towns under our basis of one thousand inhabitants, shall have a representative once in two years, and one each valuation year. And in this we do not go the full length of the rule of 1780 for the small towns, which makes our rule so far operate against the small towns, and in favor of the cities and large towns.

With this exception, every basis, every rule, and every principle now introduced into our proposition as proposed to be amended, will be perfectly parallel throughout; and there is the rule and the doctrine of 1780, and I say that we can carry a proposition of this kind before the people, upon every principle of common usage and common right. Why do gentlemen keep out of sight the great fact that the Massachusetts House is, and always has been, a representation of communities and not of aggregate population? The Constitution of 1780 could not have been framed or adopted without the principle of giving every town a representative, any more than the Constitution of the United States could have been agreed to without giving every State a representation in the Senate. Let that fact be remembered. And this proposition of compromise, between towns and cities, which we now propose, is carrying out the same rule, and the same principle. The three hundred towns were there in the Convention of 1779, and were each a body corporate and politic, and they made the Constitution of 1780; and it never emanated from the people in the aggregate, as has been said here. It was an assembly of representative communities called towns, which made that Constitution; and you cannot get around that first and foremost fact, in the element of the constitution of this branch of the government of Massachusetts, the House of Representatives in 1780. And we are now here to renew the Constitution in 1853, and we propose to renew it precisely on the same principle, and in precisely as good faith, and common honesty and fairness to the small towns.

Gentlemen come here from the great cities and towns, and because they have grown large and rich, say "obliterate the small towns. Take from them all they have and give more to us, and reduce the House." The small towns are here and say "No, we call on you, if the House of Representatives is too large, to reduce the number of your representatives from the cities and large towns; you can afford to be reduced, for you can be reduced without losing your representation in a corporate capacity, but we cannot afford to lose our last representative and die." Now this is the question, and the small towns have rights you cannot take from them justly. The small towns must therefore yield something and the large towns must yield in the same proportion. We have no legal or moral right to exterminate the representation of the small towns against their solemn protest. When we are here representing as delegates, these separate communities, the three hundred and thirty towns in this Commonwealth, I cannot understand how we can exterminate them, with any pretext of common honesty or justice.

The only point to which I can come, to lead me to agree to the curtailment of their annual single representation in any degree, is that they voluntarily surrendered a part of that ancient right in 1836, and, therefore, we will give back all we can, if we cannot give back all. Why is it not fair both for the cities and the country? Let us then terminate this conflict between towns and cities. There is nothing adverse if you will only give the towns and country a voice here. Better a large House than great injustice and wide dissatisfaction. If the cities say we will come in with you, who are less favored in wealth and population; we would rather have a numerous family than to exclude any from the homestead, and if we cannot sit quite so comfortably we shall all be satisfied, and we will all stick together as our fathers did before us, and be governed by the same principles which have always prevailed from the earliest settlement of the Colony.

If we will all frankly come to that point, we can secure to these sixty-four towns a representation alternately, or enable them to relieve themselves from alternate representation, by uniting with each other if they see fit. Then we next provide for the two hundred and nineteen towns which have a population over one thousand and under four thousand, and give them each a representative. And we say to the large and increasing cities, New Bedford, Lowell, Salem, Lawrence, Boston, and all the progressive cities, we will not cut off their natural and proper increase, and that whenever they add four thousand to their population, they shall have an additional representative, with a relative increased ratio, to prevent excess after 1860. That is fair, and that, I believe, can be carried.

Now let me say, if I can have any influence, if my voice can have any force to any extent, in producing a concentration of opinion here, let us come up and stand firmly together on this plan, and then this proposition will go out to the people as a union compromise proposition; as neither this man's proposition nor that man's proposition, to be carried before the people, and held up so that any one can say, "I did this, and you did that." Let us unite upon this proposition, and carry it through the Convention, and it will be carried through by the people.

Mr. WALKER. I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Natick will prevail. I think this renders the first proposition more just, and therefore it will be more satisfactory to all the people of the Commonwealth, not only to the cities but to the towns, and to the majority of the people. I believe we have come together here, to make a Constitution for Massachusetts, and not for any particular section of Massachusetts, or any particular interest in Massachusetts, or any particular party, but for the whole Commonwealth. I think, therefore, that this is an amendment which I shall be in favor of; and I shall be in favor of any other amendment which will render this more just and more perfectly adapted to the wants of the Commonwealth. I hope, therefore, that the amendment of the gentleman from Natick will prevail.

Mr. WHITE, of Quincy. On turning to document No. 49, it will be seen, that certain resolutions, which I had the honor to submit to the Convention about three weeks ago, contain the same general principle respecting the basis of representation, which the amendment of the gentleman from Lowell, (Mr. Butler,) embraces. In those resolutions to which I refer, it was proposed to make one thousand inhabitants the number which should entitle a town to one representative; four thousand the number which should entitle a town to two representatives; and every additional four thousand inhabitants should entitle a town or city to an additional representative. It was further provided, that all towns of less than one thousand inhabitants respectively, might elect representatives five years in ten, or that any two of such towns might unite themselves in a Representative District, and elect a representative every year. It was likewise provided, that cities should be districted into equal Representative Districts of contiguous territory, and that no city of less than one hundred thousand inhabitants should have less than four Representative Districts, and no city of more than one hundred thousand inhabitants should have less than eight Representative Districts.

The amendment of the gentleman from Lowell, which is in the nature of a substitute for the Report of the majority of the Committee on Representation, contains the same general features. In two particulars it differs from those resolutions. It provides that all towns of less than one thousand inhabitants respectively, may elect representatives in the years when the valuation of estates shall be settled—which is to say, that all such towns shall have six representatives in ten years, one more than was proposed in my resolution.

The second modification consists in this: that the number which shall entitle a town or city to five, six or more representatives shall be five thousand instead of four thousand.

Thursday,]

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES. — WHITE — BUTLER.

[June 30th.

The amendment now submitted by the gentleman from Natick, (Mr. Wilson,) proposes to change the number five thousand to four thousand. I hope it will meet the approval of the Convention, not only because it will reduce the amendment of the gentleman from Lowell, in that particular, to a likeness with my resolutions, which is a mere personal matter, but because it will remove, as it seems to me, a discrimination in favor of the small and middling towns, altogether uncalled for, and which will not diminish the number of the House more than six or eight members.

Mr. BUTLER, of Lowell. I am constrained to oppose this amendment, and for the reason that I do not believe it is well to increase the size of the House of Representatives, as at present advised, while I do not pledge myself to any special course hereafter. So far as I have examined the subject, this amendment proposes to increase the House, which is already too large, at once, to four hundred members. Then, if you leave the restriction, you say that the House "is to be apportioned according to the mean increasing ratio;" which is language which I cannot understand, when there is but one number. One number may have a proportion to another number; but one to one is such a proportion as I never heard of. But this is a criticism upon the language. There are other incongruities which may be seen, and which show the haste with which the amendment has been thrust upon us, and the want of consideration bestowed upon it; because the language is open to very decided criticism, and if we adopt anything of the kind, the proposition of the gentleman from Quincy, (Mr. White,) is much better, in my judgment.

Upon that view of the matter, then, and according to what we may justly estimate the next census to be, what do you propose to do? You adjust the question of representation upon the proportion of giving in the cities one representative to every four thousand inhabitants. And upon that proportion what do you cut into? You cut into the medium sized towns; and, in the year 1860, Boston, according to the figures upon your table, will have fifty representatives, and Lowell will have, how many? Why, Sir, she will have thirteen; and other medium sized towns in proportion. Now, if gentlemen are content to live in that way, all well and good. I suppose I can submit to it if others can. Well, you are asked to put your ratio upon that proportion. What then happens? You have to raise the ratio accordingly in the small towns, and accordingly as you raise that ratio you deprive them of representation. For what purpose? Why evidently that you may confer it upon the cities.

If gentlemen are ready for that I am content. As I said to my friends all round, if they can find it worked out so as to show that, in 1860, it will be a good proposition, I will cheerfully give it my support. But has any gentleman yet told us how it will operate in 1860? If he has not,—and I have not yet heard anything of the kind from any gentleman here,—and if any gentleman is prepared to do it, I will sit down and listen to him. What I want to see are the figures. It is very easy for gentlemen to rise up here and present a proposition, and jump at just such a conclusion as for the time being may coincide with their wishes, without the least idea where they are going to, leaping like a cat in the dark, without seeing the ditch into which they will inevitably fall; but I ask gentlemen, as reasonable men, to look a little before they leap, so as to see where they are going to land. I do not know but that hereafter I may come to that proposition myself; but I want gentlemen first to cipher it out, to get the figures, so that we may see them,—not that I have any great faith in mathematics in such cases. How is it to be in the year 1860? How is it going to affect Bristol, and Berkshire, and Franklin, and Middlesex, and other counties? I want gentlemen to consider that, and tell me how all this will end. Why, Sir, no man can tell anything about it; and by and by you will see that the small towns will begin to think that, if they are going to be cut up in this way, they would have been much better off with the district system. Unless gentlemen can show us the reasonableness of this proposal, and to what it is likely to lead us, we do not want to be hoodwinked in this way. I protest against this jumping in the dark. Ought we not, as reasonable men, to stop to inquire? You cannot make even a horse put down his foot in the dark unless he knows where he is going; and shall we, here, evince less sagacity than horses? That is the whole difficulty with me. I do not say whether I shall vote for this proposition hereafter or not. I may or may not. Besides, there is another stage through which this proposition will have to pass; and if, upon careful investigation, it should appear best to adopt this amendment, I do not know that, when the question comes up on its final passage, I would have any objection to make the motion myself; but, until I can see the full bearing of it, I must declare here that I will commit myself to nothing. Between this and the next stage of the question, I will sit down and endeavor to solve the problem; and if it commends itself to my judgment I will vote for it; and if it does not, I shall, of course, be under the necessity of opposing it. At all events I desire to know something more about it, if I can by any accident. If any gentleman can tell me its effect I wish him to do so; and if he cannot, why of course I don't want him to say anything. As I am at present advised, I must vote against this amendment. I hope, therefore, that it will not be pressed at this moment. If it is necessary to be pressed now I must vote against it. But I would rather it should be delayed until the next stage of the question, and we can then vote it up or vote it down, as may seem most likely to conduce to the public good.

Mr. WHITE, of Quincy. I had determined, after consultation respecting the proper time of moving amendments, with gentlemen better acquainted with proceedings in deliberative bodies than myself, to propose two amendments, one of which is the same in substance with that now offered by the gentleman from Natick. I was advised that the third reading of the resolves would be the most proper time.

But the gentleman from Natick has introduced it now. It is for the Convention to decide upon it. What I wish to say is, that I shall vote for the amendment, because it will tend to perfect the scheme of representation, now before us. I have given some attention to it, and have endeavored to form some opinion of its probable future operation. I have a table of statistics showing its probable results in 1860 and in 1870.

Mr. BUTLER, (interposing). I am very glad to hear that. I hope we shall have the benefit of them now.

Mr. WHITE. I do not have them by me at this time,—they are in the drawer of my seat. I did not refer to them with any expectation of reading them at this time.

I rose merely to state the fact, that I, for one, had considered the probable future operation of this amendment. If it is desirable that I should present the result of my calculations, I have no objection to doing so. By changing the number from five thousand to four thousand, we shall increase the number of the House eight, and no more. In 1860, a new apportionment will be made.

Mr. BUTLER. In 1835.

Mr. WHITE. So much the more favorable.

Sir, the amendment of the gentleman from Lowell makes a discrimination in favor of the small and middling towns altogether unnecessary. It proposes to diminish the representative power of cities—to require more inhabitants to elect a representative in large cities than in the middling towns and small cities.

The proposed basis of representation is very liberal to the small towns. Of the one hundred and thirty-nine towns now deprived of a yearly representative, it restores seventy-five to their original corporate privilege of an annual representative. Of the sixty-four towns, under one thousand inhabitants each, seven will gain four years of representation in ten years, eleven will gain three years in ten, twenty-six will gain two years in ten, and twenty will gain one year's representation in ten.

In 1860, taking as a basis of calculation the schedule of towns and cities with their respective population, prepared in 1850 by the secretary of state, (Hon. Amasa Walker,) I find that nine of these sixty-four towns will have a population of one thousand and more, respectively. These nine towns will then be entitled, each of them, to a representative every year. In the same year, two of these towns, which in 1850, according to the State census, contained more than one thousand inhabitants, will fall below that point, and will therefore lose their yearly representative. So that the House in 1860 will be increased, from that cause alone, seven members.

There are several small towns already incorporated which now vote with the towns from which they were set off, for representatives in the general court, which in 1860 will be entitled to yearly representatives. The House will be increased correspondingly. If the proposed limit to the number of the House shall be insisted on and shall be incorporated in the Constitution, then the number of representatives of the large towns and cities, in 1860, will have to be diminished exactly in proportion to the increase of towns entitled to one representative each, from the two causes to which I have already referred.

I will here give the reason which operated chiefly on my own mind, in determining the number which shall entitle a town to one representative. There are one hundred and thirty-nine towns now without an annual representative. By requiring one thousand inhabitants as the number which shall entitle a town to a representative, it is found that seventy-four towns will regain their lost corporate privilege of a yearly representation, and sixty-four towns will not come up to that number. As the number twelve hundred was regarded as a compromise in 1839, between the small and the large towns and cities, so the number one thousand, is a fair and liberal compromise on this occasion, when it is very manifest that the supporters and friends of the small towns have a decided majority in the Convention.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES. — WHITE.

There are two hundred and eleven towns of one thousand inhabitants and less than four thousand, which will be entitled to two hundred and eleven members of the House. These two hundred and eleven representatives, together with the representatives from the towns of less than one thousand inhabitants each, will have a majority of any House of Representatives which will assemble within the next thirty years, chosen on the basis of the resolves of the gentleman from Lowell, (Mr. Butler).

Sir, this view of the practical operation of the scheme of representation now before us, is very favorable to the small towns. Why, then, should we make any discrimination, however slight, the result of which will be to diminish the number of representatives of large towns and cities, merely to diminish the number of the House. Sir, such a motive cannot justify us. A large House is unavoidable in any system based on corporate rights of representation. If every town and city is to have one representative, the House will consist of three hundred and twenty-one members. If we are resolved to reduce the House, and, at the same time to adhere to town representation, we can vote that no town or city shall have more than two representatives, and in doing so, shall imitate the example of Connecticut. It would not be just or politic to do that. The people would never accept a proposition that would work so unequally and unjustly.

I have no sympathy with those who declaim against the cities. I shall not join in the hue and cry against them. I believe there is as much patriotism, as much love of liberty, and of devotion to the republic, in cities as in the country.

The tendency of modern civilization is to increase the number of cities, and to concentrate large masses of men in them. It is specially so in this country. One-fourth of the population of the State of New York dwell in its cities. In 1870, the majority of the population of this State will be in its cities. I shall be slow to believe that modern civilization is tending to corruption; and this is in fact what gentlemen would persuade us to believe.

I have never seen cause to impugn the patriotism or the love of liberty on the part of Boston or any other city in the State. I believe the inhabitants of Boston or of New York, are as patriotic as the inhabitants of the country, and would as willingly and as cheerfully give their property and their lives for the defence of our free institutions, and the defence of the country against foreign enemies, as those who dwell in the rural districts. A large portion of the population of cities is of foreign origin—refugees from the oppression and tyranny of the old world. They will be the last to join in any attempt to subvert the liberty or the constitution of the country.

This declamation against cities has no foundation in reason, and is not supported by history. We all know that in 1848, Paris, Vienna, Milan, Pesth, Berlin and Naples, gave evidence that the love of liberty was not extinct in the hearts of their inhabitants. It has been suppressed, it is true, but it will break out again.

London has always been the abode of the spirit of liberty. From the time of Charles I., it has generally sided with liberty, in its contests with power. It has, in every generation, sent to parliament champions of the peoples' rights, and the cause of freedom in Europe and America.

In the middle ages, the cities on the Mediterranean, the Baltic and the North Seas, carried on a warfare with feudalism, and at last overthrew it, and, together with the Catholic Church, emancipated Europe from slavery.

When I said I had made calculations respecting the future result of the proposed scheme of representation, I should have said that those calculations were based not only on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Natick, but on another amendment also to the amendment of the gentleman from Lowell, which, at a proper time, I think I shall show to the Convention, ought to be made. I refer to the future apportionments of the number which shall entitle towns or cities to more than two representatives. It matters little, however, whether the amendment of the gentleman from Lowell shall be modified or not, in that particular. I think it will not vary the number of the House of Representatives more than ten or fifteen, whether it shall remain as it is, or be changed according as I propose. Instead of limiting the number of representatives of cities, or rather instead of diminishing it at every census, as will be the case with Mr. Butler's amendment, I think it would be simpler, and would operate more equally upon the large towns and cities, to say, that in all future apportionments after the first, the Senate shall increase the number which shall entitle any town or city to two or more representatives, in proportion to the entire increase of the population of the whole State. Such a rule would keep the House within a reasonable limit—would provide for the increase of towns which will be entitled to a yearly representation, from the incorporation of new towns, and the elevation of towns of less than one thousand inhabitants to that number—and will increase the number of representatives of the large towns and cities at each decennial census.

Sir, my calculations are based on these two amendments, which I am convinced the Convention will adopt, on a full consideration of their probable future operation. The following tables contain the results of those calculations.

I will also annex a table showing the practical results in 1870, of the present system under which the State is now laboring. It will be seen that no change that this Convention can make, can hardly be worse, and that it is not at all surprising that no member of this Convention has ventured to defend it.

Mr. WILSON, of Natick. I must confess that I feel some surprise at the indications I have witnessed within the last few moments. I have endeavored, throughout the whole of this protracted discussion, to inform myself, as well as I have been able, in regard to all these matters. I am sure no gentleman can charge me with "much speaking." I have generally kept silent, and have not attempted anything like leadership, or to control the mind of any one. I voted against the amendment of my friend from Charlestown, (Mr. Thompson,) with the expectation and purpose of having the amendment of the gentleman from Lowell, (Mr. Butler,) thus amended. So, also, in regard to the proposition of my friend from North Brookfield, (Mr. Walker,) in the hope of making this proposition more perfect. I understand now that gentlemen generally are in favor of it, and think that the proposition, or something resembling it, ought to pass; but it seems that it is not offered at the proper time. Now, according to my judgment, the only proper time is the present, when the whole proposition is fully and distinctly before us.

If gentlemen suppose that I have any leaning in regard to any proposition of my own, merely on that account, all I have to say is, that they are mistaken; I want that which is most likely to meet with the approbation and concurrence of all parties, or, at all events, of that which will command the most general approval. If gentlemen wish this proposition to be adopted, I am willing to withdraw my amendment and leave any other gentleman to offer it who feels disposed to do so, and I will vote for it. I have no personal pride to gratify in the matter. But I certainly cannot vote for the amendment of my friend from Lowell, unless a vote is first taken upon the amendment I have offered, or some amendment resembling it. In order, therefore, that my friend may not take that dreaded leap in the dark, and that he may have time to make the calculations which he desires, I will withdraw my amendment.

Mr. SCHOUER. I am glad that my friend from Natick has withdrawn his proposition, because it was quite evident that something was the matter. Somebody's thunder has evidently been stolen, and the gentlemen from Lowell, (Mr. Butler,) has not had time to cipher out the result. I think, Sir, after all the figuring we have had here, and to such little effect, it would not be a bad move to order the Sergeant-at-Arms to furnish each member with a slate and pencil, and a ready-reckoner, so that gentlemen may try their hands again. I will now offer my amendment. I suppose it will be in order. I do not wish to occupy the time of the House; but I should like to have the yeas and nays upon it, and if necessary, even to have it debated. There are two or three verbal amendments which I have made since the amendment was printed, and with the permission of the Convention, I would like to have the proposition read as modified.

The PRESIDENT. This is a substitute for the amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole. The Chair does not consider it strictly in order, but no objection being made, the Chair will admit it on the same principle as the amendment of the gentleman from Charlestown was admitted.

The amendment, as modified, was read, as follows: strike out all after the word Resolved, and insert the following:—

That whereas, by the theory of our institutions, and the Declaration of Independence, all men are created equal, and have an inherent and inalienable right to an equal voice in electing their rulers, and in making the laws by which they are governed: and whereas, these are the fundamental maxims upon which every truly democratic government is founded, and by which a genuine democracy alone can be maintained: therefore, be it

Resolved, That it is expedient so to amend the Constitution of Massachusetts, that the popular branch of the government,—the House of Representatives,—like the Senate, shall be so constituted that all men shall be equal, in political power, and be equally represented, as near as may be, man for man, by districts based upon population, or legal voters, in the State government.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I perceive that the amendment contains more than one paragraph, and I would therefore ask to have a division of the question.

The PRESIDENT. In such case where a question is proposed to be taken upon a preamble and resolution, the question will be taken upon the resolution first, and afterwards upon the preamble.

Mr. CHURCHILL, of Milton, moved that the Convention adjourn.

The motion was agreed to, and the Convention, at six o'clock, adjourned.

FRIDAY, July 1, 1853.

The Convention assembled pursuant to adjournment, and was called to order at 9 o'clock. Prayer by the Chaplain.

The Journal of yesterday was read.

Incorporated Towns.

Mr. STETSON, of Braintree, submitted the following resolution which was referred to the Committee of the Whole, and ordered to be printed.

Resolved, That the Constitution be so amended that hereafter no town shall be incorporated with less than fifteen hundred inhabitants.

Reports from Committees.

Mr. BRIGGS, of Pittsfield, submitted the following Reports from the Committee on the Encouragement of Literature, which were severally referred to the Committee of the Whole, and ordered to be printed.

Relating to the School Fund.

COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS.

In Convention, July 1, 1853.

The Committee on the Encouragement of Literature, to whom was referred two orders of the Convention, one on the 13th, the other on the 19th of May, on the subject of the school fund of the Commonwealth, with instructions to inquire into the expediency of so altering the Constitution as to provide for the increase of said fund, have considered the same and report:—

That in their opinion, the interests of our common schools would be greatly promoted by increasing the present school fund, which now amounts to about one million of dollars, to two millions.

They respectfully submit, that the permanent prosperity of those ancient, useful, and popular institutions, in which all the children of the State are, in succeeding generations, to be instructed and nurtured, would be rendered more secure by such an increase of the school fund, and by providing that the annual income thereof shall forever be appropriated for their aid and improvement, and for no other purpose.

The Committee are persuaded that this very desirable object can be attained, in the course of a few years, from the avails of the public lands in Maine, and from the stock which the Commonwealth owns in the Western Railroad Corporation, without materially embarrassing the ordinary revenue of the State, or delaying the payment of its debts. They therefore recommend that the Constitution be so amended as to provide for the increase of the said fund, until it shall amount, at least, to two millions of dollars, to be preserved inviolate, and the income thereof to be annually appropriated for the aid and improvement of the common schools, and for no other purpose; and they therefore report the following resolution.

GEO. N. BRIGGS, Chairman.

Resolved, That the legislature shall, as soon as may be, provide for the enlargement of the school fund of this Commonwealth, until it shall amount, at least, to the sum of two millions of dollars; and the said fund shall be preserved inviolate, and the income thereof shall be annually appropriated for the aid and improvement of the common schools of the State, and for no other purpose.

The Cambridge University.

COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS.

In Convention, July 1, 1853.

The Committee on the Encouragement of Literature, to whom was referred the second section of the fifth chapter of the Constitution, have considered the same and report, that in their opinion it is expedient to amend the first section, by striking out therefrom the words "University of Cambridge." They therefore report the following resolve.

GEO. N. BRIGGS, Chairman.

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the second section of the fifth chapter of the Constitution, by striking out therefrom the words "University of Cambridge."

On the Petition of Francis Jackson and others.

Mr. WALKER, of North Brookfield, from the Committee on the Qualifications of Voters, submitted the following Report:—

COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS.

In Convention, July 1, 1853.

The Committee on the Qualifications of Voters, to whom was referred the petitions of Francis Jackson and others, that the word "male" may be stricken from the Constitution, and also of Abby B. Alcott and other women of Massachusetts, that they may be allowed to vote on the amendments that may be made to the Constitution, report that the petitioners have leave to withdraw.

The Committee feel that in making this Report, they should not do justice to themselves or to the intelligent and respectable petitioners, if they did not frankly state the reasons on which their conclusion is founded.

The petitioners ask that women may be allowed the right of suffrage, in matters pertaining to political affairs. The request is a novel one, and so far as known to the Committee, the first ever presented to any government or other political organization.

At the request of the petitioners, a hearing was granted them at two different sittings of the Committee, and patient attention given to the arguments presented by persons of learning and ability of both sexes, who appeared in their behalf. These persons maintained the following propositions:—

1. That women are human beings, and therefore have human rights, one of which, is, that of having a voice in the government under which they live, and in the enactment of laws they are bound to obey.

2. That women have interests and rights, which are not, in fact, and never will be, sufficiently guarded by governments in which they are not allowed any political influence.

3. That they are taxed, and therefore, since taxation and the right of representation are admitted to be inseparable, they have a right to be represented.

4. That so far as education and general intelligence are concerned, they are as well qualified to exercise the elective franchise, as many who now enjoy that right.

5. That in mental capacity and moral endowments, they are not inferior to many who now participate in the affairs of government.

6. That there is nothing in their peculiar position, or appropriate duties, which prevents them from taking a part in political affairs.

Of the truth or fallacy of these several positions, the Committee do not feel called upon to decide.

All questions involving the rights and interests of any part of the human family, should ever be determined by some well-established and generally recognized principle or fundamental maxim of government; otherwise it cannot be expected that such decision will be regarded as reasonable or satisfactory.

Upon what principle, then, shall the present question be decided?

The Declaration of Independence asserts, that "all governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed." By the "consent of the governed," the Committee understand the consent, either express or implied, of the persons concerned. At the present time, there are, within the State of Massachusetts, not far from 200,000, women, over twenty-one years of age. Of these less than 2,000 have asked to be admitted to the right of suffrage. From this fact, the Committee have a right to infer, and also from their personal knowledge of the views and feelings of the class of persons referred to, that a great majority of the women of Massachusetts, do willingly consent that the government of the State should be, as it hitherto has been, in the hands of their fathers, husbands, brothers and sons. Of the correctness of this conclusion, the Committee entertain no doubts.

It may be said, in reply to this, that it cannot be justly inferred from the silence of the women of Massachusetts, that they do consent to the present limitations of the right of suffrage. But the Committee do so infer, because they know that the women aforesaid, do now, and always have, enjoyed the right of petition, to the fullest extent, and have often exercised that right in behalf of the unfortunate and oppressed, and in aid of many noble and philanthropic objects of legislation. In one case, it is believed, that more than 50,000 women petitioned the general court for the enactment of a law for the suppression of the sale of intoxicating drinks.

It may be further urged, that by the same course of reasoning, it might be shown that those who are held in bondage, consent to the laws under which they live. But this is not true. Slaves have no right of petition. They cannot make known their wants to the government. They are speechless and helpless. Their whole existence is a stern and living protest against the wrongs they suffer, and they are kept in subjection only by the strong arm of power.

In view of these indisputable facts in relation to the right of petition, in this Commonwealth, enjoyed by all its inhabitants of both sexes, the Committee feel justified in deciding that a vast proportion of the women of Massachusetts do consent to their political condition, and therefore, that the powers exercised by the government of this Commonwealth, over that class of its population, are "just powers," and it is inexpedient for this Convention to take any action in relation thereto.

Mr. BOUTWELL, for Berlin. I may be allowed to make a single remark before I submit the motion I hold in my hand. The subject which was under consideration when the Convention adjourned yesterday evening, has been discussed for a great while. This is really the last working day that we shall have for some days to come, and we should do what we can on this occasion to forward the business as much as possible. I think that the Convention is ready to come to a conclusion upon the pending question at once, and an ample opportunity will be allowed for the consideration of whatever resolution may be selected by the Convention to pass and be adopted. Under these circumstances, and after a consultation with several gentlemen, I have thought proper to submit the following motion:—

That debate upon the Report of the Committee on the basis of the House of Representatives, and all pending questions thereon, cease at eleven o'clock to-day; but the amendments shall be admitted after debate upon the main question shall cease, and the mover of each amendment shall be allowed ten minutes to explain his amendment; and the same time shall be allowed to members of the Convention who shall obtain the floor to oppose such amendments, when the question thereon shall be taken without further debate.

Mr. EARLE, of Worcester. I would inquire of the gentleman who moved this order, whether it was his intention or not—for the language seems to be somewhat ambiguous, and may be misconstrued—that the opposition to any amendment shall be limited to a single speaker?

Mr. BOUTWELL. As the order was written, it was with a limitation to a single speaker, but I read it, "any member or members." It might be that an individual member could state his objection to an amendment in a single minute; my intention was, that ten minutes should be allowed to the opponents as well as to the friends of the different amendments.

Mr. EARLE. I was merely going to remark, that I understood that there was no limitation; and if the members who are opposed to an amendment are to be allowed to speak, an equal privilege ought to be granted to those who may be disposed to speak in favor of it. If there is no restriction upon one side, there should be none upon the other.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair has stated the order, taking it from the written form. If the gentleman for Berlin desires to modify it, so as to make it conform with the intention he has now expressed, the language should be changed.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I desire to have it read in such a manner that ten minutes shall be allowed to the friends of any amendment—one or more—and ten minutes shall be allowed to those who oppose it.

The PRESIDENT. The order will be modified accordingly.

Mr. BRIGGS. I understand, Sir, and the gentleman will correct me if I am not right, that the intention of the proposition is, that ten minutes shall be given to the mover to explain, and ten minutes shall be given for reply—either to one person speaking ten minutes, or to two speaking five minutes each, or more, in no case to exceed ten minutes on each side. Am I correct in that? I make the inquiry because some gentlemen around me understood that each member who desired to speak should be allowed ten minutes.

Mr. BOUTWELL. The gentleman has stated it correctly.

Mr. BRIGGS. Well, Sir, I regard this as a very reasonable proposition after we have reached this stage of the proceedings, for it gives an opportunity for both sides to be heard briefly on any amendment which may be presented, and at the same time it is reasonable that we should try to come to some result upon this question.

Mr. HALLETT. There is one suggestion which I have to make in connection with this subject, and that is, that the amendments which are to be proposed shall be laid before the Convention, and then when the hour of eleven o'clock comes, they can be taken up and acted upon in the manner which the gentleman has suggested. I think it is very desirable and very important that the amendments which are intended to be offered shall be laid before the Convention long enough to enable members to have some time for reflection upon them. I am very desirous that the amendment of my friend from Natick, which he withdrew yesterday, rather unfortunately, as I think, and which is one that, as it seems to me, will compromise all these difficulties, should be laid before the Convention at an early period, in order that it may be considered beforehand; for I am apprehensive that if that amendment is left until the hour of eleven o'clock arrives, the Convention will be in such a hurry to take the vote, that it will not be fairly considered. If the gentleman will allow this and other amendments to be offered now, so that they may be before the Convention previous to the time when the vote is to be taken, I will concur in it.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that the amendment which was submitted by the gentleman from Natick, or any other amendment, may be informally laid before the Convention, so that they will be in possession of the whole subject; and when the proper time shall come, they can be proposed in due form.

Mr. HALLETT. I understand that the policy of the gentleman is to go on with other business until eleven o'clock; and if the amendments are offered now, we should have an hour or more to reflect upon them, and then they can be taken up and disposed of. If that course will be pursued, I have no objection to the motion of the gentleman; but, as I supposed, it was intended to run off all amendments until the hour of eleven o'clock.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair will inform the gentleman for Wilbraham, that the subject will be taken up whenever the Convention shall determine, and the order will not prevent the offering of amendments previous to the hour of eleven.

Mr. HALLETT. Then I am in favor of the motion.

Mr. WILSON, of Natick. I think the proposition of the gentleman for Berlin, is one which should be sustained, and I hope we shall proceed at once to consider this proposition, and see if we cannot come to a vote upon it. I believe we have already had some ninety-seven or eight speeches on this question, and have consumed forty-seven hours upon it; and I think that is about debate enough.

Mr. SCHOULER. I am in favor of the motion which is made by the gentleman for Berlin, if I understand it correctly. But the remarks of the gentleman for Wilbraham gave a complexion to it, different from what I understood when it was read. It is, if I understand it, that we can proceed, immediately after the adoption of that order, to consider the unfinished business of yesterday. As the gentleman for Wilbraham seemed to understand it, it would preclude us from taking up that subject until eleven o'clock. I wish to inquire whether I am right in my understanding of the effect of the order.

The PRESIDENT. The Convention may proceed to consider the unfinished business of yesterday, immediately after it shall so order. The order now under consideration does not affect that question at all. The Chair will state the question. The gentleman for Berlin moves that debate upon the main proposition shall cease at eleven o'clock this day, when amendments may be offered, and the mover of each amendment shall be allowed ten minutes to explain it; the same time shall be allowed to members of the Convention who shall obtain the floor to oppose such amendment, and the question shall then be taken without further debate.

Mr. HALE, of Boston. I beg leave to ask the Chair, if that order should be passed, whether there will be any opportunity to take the question upon more than one amendment, in case the first amendment, which is in the nature of a substitute, shall be adopted. For example, the proposition which has been most debated here, and which, if I understand it, stands foremost before the Convention at this time, with the exception of the amendment of the gentleman from Natick, is in the nature of a substitute for the Report of the Committee. If the question is taken upon the amendment of the gentleman from Natick, the motion of the gentleman from Lowell will then be in order; and that being in the form of an amendment to the Report of the Committee, if adopted, will cut off all votes upon other amendments. Am I correct in this, Mr. President?

The PRESIDENT. That question is not affected by this order at all, but the gentleman has stated the fact correctly. If the Convention should agree to that amendment which has been reported by the Committee of the Whole, it must stand in that form, and can be no longer open to amendment.

Mr. HALE. I am desirous, Mr. President, that the matter may stand in such a form that the question can be taken upon all amendments. A number of amendments have been offered which were designed to perfect the plan of representation, but they were amendments to the original Report of the Committee; whereas, the amendment of the gentleman from Lowell, being a substitute for the proposition of the Committee, if that substitute should be adopted, it will cut off all opportunity to take a vote upon the proposition submitted by the minority of the Committee on which there has been no vote taken in Convention, and, as gentlemen will remember, the vote was taken upon it in Committee in a thin House, and when it had been but partially debated. It has since been fully discussed, and gentlemen may have changed their minds; at any rate, one-third of the House were not present when the vote was taken upon it in Committee. The friends of that proposition are desirous to have a vote taken upon it, in Convention, by the yeas and nays; but, if this order should be passed, limiting the time to ten minutes upon each proposition, for and against, it appears to me that the friends of that amendment are shut off from any opportunity to take a vote upon it.

The PRESIDENT. The order moved by the gentleman for Berlin does not affect the question at all, which is raised by the gentleman from Boston. The amendment reported to the Convention, by the Committee of the Whole, being in the nature of a substitute for the original proposition, if the Convention shall agree to it, it must stand, at this stage of the business, in the same form in which it is agreed to; but, previous to a vote upon it, it is competent for the Convention to perfect it by amendments, and the Chair has admitted, in every instance, against the usual parliamentary law, and by the general consent of the Convention, other substitutes for the original proposition, and would admit the proposition named by the gentleman from Boston.

Mr. HALE. I shall not introduce that proposition myself, but, at the proper time some friend will submit it, and ask to have the sense of the Convention taken upon it.

Mr. BRIGGS. As I understand it, the proposition of the gentleman for Berlin is merely to stop debate at eleven o'clock, except upon amendments which may be offered; but it does not change the order of proceeding in any respect.

The PRESIDENT. That is the effect of the order.

The question being then taken, the order was agreed to.

Basis of Representation.

Mr. BRIGGS then moved that the Convention proceed to consider the Orders of the Day, being the unfinished business of yesterday; which was agreed to.

Mr. HALLETT. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT. With the permission of the gentleman for Wilbraham, the Chair will state the question. The question before the Convention is the Report of the Committee upon the Basis of the House of Representatives, which is printed in Document No. 18 of the Convention. That resolve has been referred to the Committee of the Whole, and the Committee of the Whole have reported a resolve to the Convention as an amendment, standing in the nature of a substitute, which is printed in Document No. 65 of the Convention, and which has been modified by a vote of the Convention. Pending the question upon the amendment reported by the Committee of the Whole, by the general consent of the Convention, the gentleman from Boston, (Mr. Schouler,) moves an amendment to the amendment, which is also in the nature of a substitute, and which is printed in Document No. 66 of the Convention. This amendment is as follows:—

Strike out all after the word Resolved, and insert the following:

That whereas, by the theory of our institutions, and the "Declaration of Independence," all men are created equal, and have an inherent and inalienable right to an equal voice in electing their rulers, and in making the laws by which they are governed: and whereas, these are the fundamental maxims upon which every truly democratic government is founded, and by which a genuine democracy alone can be maintained: therefore be it

Resolved, That it is expedient so to amend the Constitution of Massachusetts, that the popular branch of the government—the House of Representatives—like the Senate, shall be so constituted that all men shall be equal in political power and authority in the Commonwealth, and be equally represented, as near as may be, man for man, in the State government.

The gentleman for Berlin requested a division of the proposition, and the Chair stated, that although under the rules of the Convention it was not strictly susceptible of a division, yet, by general consent, it would be considered as two propositions—one being the preamble and the other the resolve; and the sense of the Convention will first be taken on the resolve. Upon that question, on motion of the gentleman from Boston, the Convention has ordered the yeas and nays; and the gentleman for Wilbraham is now entitled to the floor.

Mr. SCHOULER. Mr. President, I wish to modify my motion. I thought that I was entitled to the floor, as the mover of the amendment now under consideration; but aside from that, I wish to modify the amendment, and I do not wish the gentleman for Wilbraham to discuss a proposition which I intend to change.

Mr. HALLETT. I do not propose to discuss that proposition at all.

Mr. SCHOULER. I should like to have my proposition before the Convention in a modified form. I do not desire to occupy two minutes of the time of the Convention.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that the gentleman from Boston was entitled to the floor, but he moved the yeas and nays and took his seat, and thus lost his right to the floor.

Mr. HALLETT. I understand that the resolution before the Convention is now open to amendment.

The PRESIDENT. Does the gentleman purpose to offer an amendment to the amendment?

Mr. HALLETT. Yes, Sir, if it is in order to do so.

The PRESIDENT. It is in order for the member for Wilbraham, to perfect the part to be inserted, or the part to be stricken out, by amendments. The gentleman from Boston claims the floor, upon the ground that he made the motion which is now the pending question. If he has not had the floor, he is entitled to it by parliamentary courtesy; but the Chair understood that the gentleman had had the floor, moved the yeas and nays, and took his seat.

Mr. SCHOULER. I gave way merely to allow a motion to be made for adjournment.

The PRESIDENT. In that case the gentleman from Boston is entitled to the floor.

Mr. SCHOULER. After I offered the proposition, last evening, which is now before the Convention, the gentleman for Berlin, (Mr. Boutwell,) called for a division of the question. I wish merely to ask the Chair, so that I may understand it, as well as the Convention—for I believe a division of the question brought the vote upon the resolution, and not upon the preamble—I wish to ask the Chair whether, if the resolution should be defeated, any vote could be had upon the preamble. I understand that there could not.

The PRESIDENT. That is the fact.

Mr. SCHOULER. I therefore wish to withdraw that amendment, and substitute the following, which I have put into the shape of two resolutions:—

1. Resolved, That by the theory of our government and the "Declaration of Independence," all men are created equal, and have a right to an equal voice in electing their rulers, and in making the laws by which they are governed: and that, these are fundamental maxims upon which every truly democratic government is founded, particularly where the people, as in Massachusetts, are kindred and homogeneous, and by which alone a genuine democracy can permanently be maintained.

2. Resolved, That it is expedient so to amend the Constitution of Massachusetts, that the popular branch of the government, the House of Representatives, shall be based upon population, ratable polls, or upon legal voters, to the end that all men shall be equal in power and be equally represented, as near as may be, man for man, in the State government.

Mr. HALLETT. Mr. President—

Mr. MORTON, of Taunton. Mr. President, I rise to a question of order. I believe it is one of the rules of this Convention that no member shall be allowed to speak twice upon the same subject until others who desire it are allowed to speak once. Upon that ground I claim the privilege of addressing the Convention.

The PRESIDENT. The gentleman for Wilbraham first addressed the Chair, and he has not spoken.

Mr. MORTON. I thought he had spoken.

The PRESIDENT. The question now before the Convention, is on the amendment moved by the gentleman from Boston, and on that amendment the gentleman for Wilbraham, has not spoken.

Mr. MORTON. I supposed that the general subject was open to debate. If that is the only question before the Convention, I acquiesce in the decision of the Chair.

The PRESIDENT. The question pending is on the amendment of the gentleman from Boston; and that question has not been debated except by the gentleman from Boston himself. The Chair therefore awards the floor to the gentleman for Wilbraham, who first addressed him.

Mr. HALLETT. I desire, Mr. President, fully to understand this question, and hope it may be fully understood by the Convention before it is acted upon; and in rising to propose an amendment to the same effect as that which was advocated by me on Saturday, and very unexpectedly to myself, withdrawn by the gentleman from Natick. I can assure the gentleman from Taunton, (Mr. Morton,) that I am not desirous of occupying the floor except for that single purpose, and will give him time to be heard.

The gentleman from Boston, (Mr. Schouler,) offered an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Lowell, (Mr. Butler,) in the nature of a preamble and resolution, and, upon a call for a division of the question, at the last session, the Chair decided that the amendment being in the nature of a preamble and resolution, the question would be upon the resolution first. The resolution being first in order, it was competent for the Convention to amend it before being passed upon. The gentleman has offered a modification of his preamble; but I understand that the amendment as now offered, is a substitute for the Majority Report of the Committee on representation, and it is, therefore, I presume, first in order to perfect that proposition, before the question is taken on striking it out and substituting another?

The PRESIDENT. The gentleman from Boston, (Mr. Schouler,) has withdrawn that preamble and substituted for it another resolution. An amendment perfecting the amendment reported by the Committee of the Whole is now in order.

Mr. HALLETT. Then I propose substantially the amendment which was offered by the gentleman from Natick, (Mr. Wilson,) and withdrawn by him, and which I desire may be regarded as his amendment. I move to strike out the paragraph as it now stands:—

Every city or town of 15,000 inhabitants and upwards, shall be entitled to one representative, and as many additional in each year as the number of times five thousand may be contained in the whole number of the inhabitants thereof.

And insert—

Every city or town, containing over 12,000 inhabitants, shall be entitled to elect one additional representative for every four thousand inhabitants it may contain over twelve thousand.

I desire briefly to explain what alteration that proposition makes in the amendment of the gentlemen from Lowell, (Mr. Butler,) and its general bearing upon the whole question. I disclaim all personal interference in or with questions which have been agitated here. I have designed from the beginning, simply to lay down a principle which will best meet with our general views, and those of the people, upon this difficult question of representation, and then trust to the people to adopt it.

The suggestion contained in my amendment was originally the suggestion of the gentleman from Quincy, (Mr. White,) who I desire should have the merit of developing it; and, taking that suggestion and applying it to the proposition of the gentleman from Lowell, it is, in my judgment, as uniform, equal and perfect a system as can be arrived at without disfranchising the towns. It is a question of compromise, as far as common right and uniform principle is concerned, rather than a matter of originality of invention. In regard to who is the author of a proposition, I presume that that is a matter of trifling consequence, provided that we can mutually agree upon something that may be approved by the people.

The great question here, as has often been stated, is to determine whether or not we would retain and to some extent restore our system of town representation; if not entire, then as nearly as we can retain and restore it. I believe that we have agreed by general acquiescence, to be inferred from all the votes that have been taken, that we would not start from the position of a representation every other year for the sixty-four towns having less than one thousand inhabitants. I believe, also, that these sixty-four towns will be content with that, and this proposition gives them thirty-two representatives annually, besides valuation year. The other proposition is that all towns of one thousand inhabitants should not be disturbed in their representation, and that point is also settled. We then propose, by this amendment, to go on with a progressive increase in relation to the larger towns, of one for every additional four thousand. The proposition of the gentleman from Lowell, as it now stands, is to make a divisor of 5,000, to be applied to the inhabitants of any city having over 15,000 inhabitants, as the rule of increase. The amendment I offer, is to substitute for this divisor of 5,000, a ratio or "mean increasing number" of 4,000, for every additional representative over the basis of 4,000 inhabitants, up to which number the towns over 1,000 inhabitants are to have one representative.

Now, the amendment of the gentleman from Lowell embraces all these propositions except the last. After taking the sixty-four towns of less than 1,000 inhabitants and giving them thirty-two representatives, he preserves to the towns having 1,000 inhabitants and under 4,000, their representation annually. To towns of 4,000 and under 8,000, he gives two representatives; to towns of over 8,000 and under 12,000, he gives three representatives—and so he goes on up to 12,000. Then the ratio is changed, so that towns having over 15,000 shall have a representative for every time that the whole number of inhabitants thereof can be divided by 5,000. That seems to me to be an arbitrary proposition. It is of precisely the same character as the present mode of apportionment—though different in its ratio and results—which gives a divisor of 160 to be applied to the smaller towns; whereas it is now proposed that a common divisor of 5,000 should be applied to the larger towns and cities. Either of those principles, I think, are not well founded. Neither of them have any proper basis to rest upon, and I will say here that the only decided objection I have ever had to the proposition of the gentleman from Lowell has been to the absence of principle which I perceive in that arbitrary divisor, and the placing the larger towns and cities upon a basis of absolute limitation in the relative increase of representation and population.

The gentleman from Quincy, (Mr. White,) suggested originally, a different ratio, which to my mind, completely meets every objection, and when the gentleman from Natick, (Mr. Wilson,) offered this amendment on Saturday, though not in the same terms as I now submit it, I was satisfied that, had it not been withdrawn by him, it would have been adopted. The gentleman from Lowell, however, opposed its consideration at that time, thinking it had not been sufficiently considered. The amendment itself is a familiar one to me, because I have seen, and have tested the figures and illustrations of the gentleman from Quincy, on the subject. The only substantial change made by this amendment, is by adopting "a mean increasing number," instead of a common divisor. The latter has no fixed rule, while the former involves a principle based upon a mathematical rule of progression, which is in direct conformity with the old Constitution of 1780, and which, by that rule, makes "the representation of the citizens of this Commonwealth founded upon the principle of equality," which that Constitution declared its design to establish. That Constitution, after fixing the number of polls for one, two, and three representatives, says: "and proceeding in that manner, making 225 ratable polls the mean increasing number for every additional representative."

The proposition embraced in the amendment I offer, conforms precisely to that; and, if it was justified and justifiable in 1780, why is it not so in 1853? And in farther conformity, they went on in 1780, and said, that every town having less than one hundred and fifty polls, should be represented, and we go on and say that every town having less than a thousand inhabitants, shall be represented at least every other year.

Now, with regard to the amendment I propose, the difference in the actual working between it and the proposition of the gentleman from Lowell, will be not very large, as to aggregate numbers, while that difference involved in the principle itself, is very material. The matter of representation, as it will stand under the proposition of the gentleman from Lowell, (Mr. Butler,) will be thus: there will be sixty-four towns having less than a thousand inhabitants, with thirty-two representatives annually; over one thousand and under four thousand, two hundred and nineteen towns with one representative each, which, added to thirty-two, gives two hundred and fifty-one representatives; over four thousand and under eight thousand, thirty towns, two representatives each, making three hundred and eleven representatives; then over eight thousand and under twelve thousand, you have eleven towns with three representatives each, in all, thus far, three hundred and thirty-two; then of towns over twelve thousand, you have nine, viz:—

		No. of Representatives.
Towns.	Population.	Ratio of 4,000	of 5,000
Boston,	138,000.	35	29
Lowell,	32,000	9	8
Salem,	18,000	5	5
Roxbury,	18,000	5	5
N. Bedford,	16,000	5	4
Worcester,	15,000	4	4
Charlestown,	15,000	4	4
Cambridge,	14,000	4	4
Lynn,	13,000	4	4
Total,		75	67
To which, add the total for the other towns,		332	332
And you have the grand total of		407	399

Thus it will be seen, that the whole amount of difference at present, is eight representatives, of which Boston will have an increase of six, Lowell one, and New Bedford one; and this is simply giving to Boston in 1854, what you will have to give her after 1855, and I do not see that any sound objection can be raised, to giving to Boston this additional number two years in advance to which she will unquestionably be entitled at that time. The totals, as I have already stated, will amount, (except in valuation year,) in the one case to four hundred and seven, and in the other three hundred and ninety-nine representatives. We arrive at this representation, on the basis of three hundred and twenty-nine towns, as follows:—

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES. — HALLETT — MORTON.

[July 1st.

	Population.	Towns.
Below	1,000	64
Between	1,000 and 4,000	219
"	4,000 " 8,000	30
"	8,000 " 12,000	7
Over	12,000	9
Total,		329

In valuation year this would give a House of four hundred and thirty-nine, if all were elected, but ordinarily and practically, as we see here in the Convention, and as is always the case in the legislature, and will be so, especially if the majority rule continues, the actual working number of the House will be much less. For the future, you have a ratio of limitation provided.

This proposition, I think, Sir, embraces a principle upon which we can all stand; and although it increases the size of the House some, though not over its present number, let it be understood distinctly, here and elsewhere, that that increase is for the benefit of the larger towns; and, if they come here and insist upon having a smaller House than that, then the decrease must be taken from them; because we can go no further in cutting down the representation of the smaller towns. It being conceded, that the sixty-four towns of less than a thousand inhabitants, are to have thirty-two representatives annually, amongst them, and the towns having one thousand inhabitants, to be entitled each to a full representation, whatever increase is made over that number, on a progressive ratio, must be made solely for the benefit of the larger towns and cities; and if they object, and insist upon a smaller House, theirs must be the loss. No town or city wants a small House at its own loss. If, then, they would not be willing to be excluded themselves, they must be content not to exclude others.

The proposition gives seventy-five representatives to these nine cities, instead of sixty-seven, making a difference of eight, and the whole effect of the amendment is to give an increase to the large towns, but it is nothing but right that they should have an increase as their ratio of population increases, or that the whole towns, having over one representative, should apportion among themselves, their representation after 1860, so as not to exceed a certain number or rate of addition to the House.

Now, we may be told that 1870 this will make an excessive House. But we may let that future, at least, take care of itself. I am somewhat of the opinion of Sir James Mackintosh—on a matter of mere calculations and estimates—as quoted by the gentleman from Boston, (Mr. Hillard,) the other day, when he said we should not attempt, in our legislation, to look too far into futurity. If we should go as far as twenty years, I think that is quite enough for us to provide for, in this matter of representation, and the people who may be then living, having had some experience of the effect of our work, can change it if they deem it necessary, so as to suit themselves. Taking, then, the operation of this mode of representation up to the years 1860 or 1870 even, I do not see that there is any likelihood of an increase sufficient to conflict with the principle contemplated by this amendment, and the customary size of a Massachusetts House of Representatives. By the proposition of the gentleman for Berlin, you are not to increase over three hundred and seventy-five, exclusive of the towns having less than one thousand inhabitants, which will give thirty-two more, making in all four hundred and seven. Then, exclusive of these small towns, your House will not exceed three hundred and seventy-five in 1860, and cannot exceed three hundred and eighty-five at any time, because, according to the subsequent contemplated ratio in the next decennial period, the number of representatives cannot increase more than ten; so that, up to 1870, you can have no apprehension of any considerable increase. Why, Sir, Boston would have to increase to 150,000 to give her two additional representatives; Lowell must increase to 40,000 for the same purpose; and the other smaller towns and cities of this class to 20,000 to gain one; so that in regard to these large towns there must be a larger increase of population than I can think it is probable we shall arrive at. It will make but an increase of ten representatives on which you can possibly calculate in ten years, and then the largest House that you can have will not number over four hundred and seventeen, and that is no real inconvenience, as we are dealing daily here in this Convention, and can easily be put up with.

I think, therefore, upon the whole, that this is a proposition which will commend itself to the judgment of the Convention, and that if we adopt it, we bring together on a principle, of reform of the Constitution, as many friends as we can expect to go out of this Convention with before the people.

There is another reason why this amendment should be adopted. The majority of the Convention has undoubtedly come to the conclusion that the basis of the proposition of the gentleman from Lowell is the one which is to be regarded as the most favorable; yet, notwithstanding this, gentlemen of large ability, friendly to reform, have pledged themselves here against that amendment as it now stands, according to the proposition of the gentleman from Lowell; and we cannot well expect of them to go before the people and take back their own declarations made here. Gentlemen in various parts of this House have expressed themselves as dissatisfied with the amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole; but if the proposition I have suggested, should be adopted, I cannot but think that its adoption as an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Lowell, will take from that amendment the principal feature which has given rise to the objections against it. It will bring together the friends of the new Constitution to a greater extent than it is possible to do upon the basis now proposed, and will, at the same time, take away from the opponents of the new Constitution—if there shall be any—the only substantial objection they can have, except that which relates to town representation; and upon town representation the people will show their strength.

Mr. MORTON, of Taunton. Mr. President,

I rise on this occasion with a great deal of reluctance, and under somewhat peculiar embarrassment. I had designed, at an early stage of the debate upon this subject, to express my views at length in relation to it, and accordingly had prepared minutes or notes in reference to many facts which might be important to notice in this discussion. I was prevented from doing that, and therefore, I am now constrained to throw myself upon the indulgence of the Convention, knowing, as I do, that their patience is worn out, and that what I shall say may be a repetition of what has been said heretofore.

I was anxious to get the floor upon this occasion, because it seemed to me to be the last opportunity that I should have, and having understood from the Chair that the whole subject was before the Convention, I supposed I was entitled to the floor, in preference to the gentleman who represents Wilbraham, (Mr. Hallett). I acquiesce, however, in the decision of the Chair, and wish to apologize to that gentleman, because, under any other circumstances I would not have interposed an effort to take his place, even if I had the right.

I have, Sir, a proposition which I wish to submit, and therefore I rise, more for the purpose of putting that in a proper situation to be acted upon, than for the purpose of discussing the subject. It brings up a proposition which many gentlemen have supposed had been settled by the Convention. But I assure you and the Convention, that if I supposed that the proposition, or the substance of the proposition, which I am about to make, had been deliberately decided by this Convention, nobody would be more ready to acquiesce in that decision, and nobody more unwilling to trouble the Convention with an attempt to reverse it, than I should be. It is true it is a proposition somewhat similar to the one offered by the minority of the Committee. That proposition was acted upon, as I learn—for I was not able to be present myself—in a very thin House, and at a time when the whole Convention had not an opportunity of expressing their opinion upon it. Therefore, it is that I propose to offer it at some stage of the proceedings, when, under the present rule or order of the Convention—in which I most cheerfully acquiesce—it may be deemed to be in order, and to ask the deliberate decision of the Convention upon it. But, Sir, I suppose that in my statement I may be allowed to read the proposition, so that the Convention may be apprised of the nature of it. Gentlemen of the Convention, doubtless, already understand that it relates to the question whether the Commonwealth, in the matter of representation, shall be districted or not. I have endeavored—though it does not essentially vary the propositions which have been offered—to put it in a form which, I thought, would render it acceptable to every gentleman who had any disposition to adopt the districting system. I have no predilection myself for the form in which I have placed it; but I present it in the shape I do, because it occurred to me that it would be more acceptable to the Convention. The amendment is this:—

The House of Representatives shall consist of — members, which shall be divided among the several counties of the Commonwealth, as nearly as possible, according to the number of — by the last preceding decennial census. As soon as may be, after each decennial census, the Senate shall divide each county into as many representative districts, as it may deem expedient, so that the basis of each representative shall be as nearly the same number as possible, without the division of towns or the wards of cities; provided no district shall be entitled to more than three representatives, and provided that Nantucket and Dukes Counties shall each form one district, and be entitled to at least one representative.

I have intentionally left two or three blanks in the amendment, in order that the Convention, if they felt favorably disposed to this plan, might fill them as they should think proper. The first blank relates to the number of members of which the House shall be composed; and the second refers to the basis upon which the ratio shall be ascertained; that is to say, whether it shall be inhabitants, legal voters, or ratable polls. My own choice would be inhabitants, but many gentlemen, and perhaps a majority, would prefer either legal voters or ratable polls, and I have no such predilections towards one or the other, as to prevent me from acceding to any proposition, in that respect, which shall be acceptable to the Convention. Perhaps I may as well say here, that I prefer inhabitants to either of the others, as a basis, because their numbers may be ascertained with greater ease and certainty. You have that in the census which is taken every ten years, and there can be no uncertainty or dispute about it. In relation to the number of legal votes or ratable polls, its correctness depends upon the action of town officers, who may or may not be faithful and honest, and especially, who may not be correct; for it is notorious to all of us, who have had much to do with political affairs, that no town officers, however desirous of ascertaining the exact number of ratable polls, or legal voters, can ever attain entire accuracy in that object, and therefore there is an uncertainty about it. Yet there may be an approximation to correctness, and if either of those is preferred as a basis, they come near enough to correctness to meet with my approbation.

Having stated my amendment, I should like to avail myself of this opportunity to make some remarks upon the general subject, which, I understand from the President, is now open to discussion. Almost all the gentlemen who have spoken upon this subject have said, in the outset, that this was an important and difficult subject. It certainly is important. The first important step in the establishment or formation of a government is to fix the qualification of voters. The second is to determine the ratio of representation. There is no doubt, therefore, that it is an important subject. It is true that it may be one of difficulty, but that depends upon the light in which we view it. In itself, it is not a very difficult subject. Here, in a Commonwealth compact in territory, settled all over, not sparsely, but densely; arranged into counties and towns, convenient for a division into sections of any shape, you may please, you have an intelligent, well-educated, and moral population to act upon. Taking these things into view, and the fact that the inhabitants are of the same race and kind, and in every respect homogeneous, that we have no moral or political line of division, with slavery on the one side, and freedom on the other, like Virginia, nor are divided by mountains, like Tennessee and many other States, but every part accessible to the people of the other, and the population of every section more or less acquainted with the population of every other—taking these things into view, I say, it would seem that we need meet with no difficulty in settling a basis and executing it by drawing out the line of division. Sir, if such men as Franklin and Jefferson could be brought here to determine upon the representation of this Commonwealth, the only surprise they would feel would be that we should have occasion to call upon anybody to perform a service so easy and plain. They would sit down and determine deliberately what would be the proper number, and then, proceeding upon the republican doctrine of equality, apportion them among the people of the Commonwealth. The first question relates to the number of representatives. That is a matter which may not involve principle. It may be a matter of expediency,—though I reluctantly use the word,—but it would undoubtedly have reference to the amount of population, the extent of territory, the business of the inhabitants, the homogeneity of the population, and to the fact that, although some diversity of pursuit and interest might exist, yet that there was a general unity and community of feeling, taste, and principles. The inquiry would be, how many members would perform the public service in the best way, and best maintain and preserve the rights, and promote the interests and welfare of the Commonwealth? But I do not mean to express surprise that this subject is now surrounded with difficulties. That would be absurd after the efforts made here to determine upon some basis of representation. But what are these differences, and whence do they arise? not from the subject itself, as we have seen; Not from the inherent difficulty of performing the task, but from preconceived notions and prejudices, and perhaps from personal feelings and interests. In approaching a subject of so much importance as that of settling the principle upon which the government is to be administered, ought we not to lay aside those prejudices, and discard all preconceived opinions? Ought we not to cast behind us any political feelings, or interests, or aspirations which we may be supposed to have? In proceeding to the investigation of this subject, after we have determined in our own minds, what the right number is, and what should be the relative proportion between the two Houses, we ought to ascertain upon what principle this object should be accomplished. I do not hesitate to say, that all sound principle, that justice and right, point to equality as the only righteous basis upon which a democratic government can be established. But before we proceed to discuss this principle, I should be glad to ascertain from what point I am to start. It is impossible to go on and investigate a subject unless we have some data from which to reason, some postulatam from which to draw inferences. I am astonished to find how entirely we are afloat upon the subject, and how difficult it seems to be to find any common principle or basis upon which we can reason. If we say that justice—the eternal principles of justice—should govern us, we are told that this matter of government is one of expediency. Sir, I detest this notion of resorting to expediency as a guide in accomplishing any great object. Let us adopt principles and carry them out. True principles never can mislead. Principle, like truth, is ever consistent and eternal. No one truth, from the foundation of the world to the present day, was ever inconsistent with any other truth, and no one principle was ever inconsistent with any other principle. No just principle, if followed out truly, will ever mislead, but will always tend to wise and just results. Talk about rights in this case, and about the rights of the people, and we are told that government is an artificial system, a mere matter of convention. Talk about the great principle laid down in the Bill of Rights, in the Constitution, and in the Declaration of Independence, that all men are born free and equal, and how are they regarded? Have you not been told here, to secure freedom first, and let equality follow it if it can, or else lag behind? I say you never can secure liberty unless it is based upon equality. Everybody loves power. It gives its possessors advantages. Let them belong to what class they may—I care not how honorable and upright they may be—they will use the advantages which power gives them, and they will not willingly yield it. I could illustrate it by facts in relation to this very subject. In a former distribution of representation we gave to some a disproportionate power, and to others less than their share, and now we come here as the representatives of the people upon the basis of that distribution. You find one county with 30,000 inhabitants with a representation equal to another having 75,000. I wish to be understood that I impute blame to no one, in this respect. But what is the consequence of that state of things? Those who have enjoyed more than their equal share of power, now claim and demand that it should not only be continued to them in the same proportion, but absolutely increased.

But to recur again to the doctrine of our Declaration of Independence, and of our Bill of Rights—the doctrine of equality and liberty which we have all learned from our infancy. What are they? Our Constitution says that our government is a social compact; that every man shall have an equal right to elect and be elected to office. Shall we allow this to remain as it is, or shall we refuse to re-establish the Bill of Rights by striking it out of the Constitution?

Well, Sir, shall we disregard these principles held so sacred by our fathers? I know how very liable we are to overlook principles when they stand in the way of our interests or our desires. The struggles of our friends to resist the application of the great doctrines of the Declaration of Independence and our Bill of Rights, may be illustrated by an anecdote which the view of my clerical friend before me has brought to my mind. I am tempted to offer this illustration, drawn from his profession, and I hope I shall not be considered irreverent, or as departing from proper dignity or decorum in debate, in relating the anecdote. We are told that in a certain part of the country there was a very orthodox congregation who had settled a minister very much to their minds. But, in the process of time that minister grew more liberal in his mode of thinking and he wanted to initiate his flock a little into his new doctrines. He began by little and little to show his liberality, and to try his flock he preached a sermon looking towards Unitarianism. Unluckily he selected for his text the exclamation of Thomas, "My Lord and My God!" His sermon from this text caused some disturbance in his congregation. Thereupon the deacons of the church waited upon him and questioned the orthodoxy of the doctrines which he had advanced in his sermon the Sabbath before. He of course defended himself and they went into an argument, and either because the deacons had the best side of the question, or because they were a little the most skillful in argument, they succeeded in entangling the reverend gentleman so much that he found it very difficult to extricate himself. At last, a little vexed, he says, "Well, my friends, to be honest with you, I really wish Thomas had not said it." [Laughter.] Now, when our friends in the Convention find it so extremely difficult to reconcile the doctrines which they find themselves constrained to adopt with the principles of our Declaration of Independence and Bill of Rights, I believe they really wish our fathers had not put such principles into these immortal documents.

But, Mr. President, we will look seriously to the highest source for information upon this subject. I do not refer to the "higher law," which has been so much talked about by politicians, but if we will look at the highest source of information—to the Bible itself, what do we find? I look there for the principles of democracy. It is there that we shall find the true principles of democratic institutions and in that book is the command, "Whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you do ye even so to them," and the command to love our neighbors as we love ourselves. Now, Sir, do the people of Franklin love the people of Barnstable as they love themselves? Do the people of Berkshire do to the people of Bristol as they would that the people of Bristol should do to them? Sir, I suppose I shall be told again as I have been told before, that the Bible is out of place in political conventions and that these principles are not applicable to constitutions of human governments—that we must resort to expediency.

I had prepared somewhat extended notes for remarks upon another occasion in reference to this subject, which I shall not now feel myself at liberty to enlarge upon as I had intended, and I fear I shall be compelled in making selections from them, to proceed in a somewhat desultory manner. However, before I enter upon this argument I wish to find some sound basis upon which we can stand, and whatever may be the views of other gentlemen, I know of no better way than to go back to the first principles upon which our government was founded. The Constitution recommends a frequent recurrence to fundamental principles. The gentleman for Wilbraham, (Mr. Hallett,) has told us—and I do not propose to go into that matter—that when the country was first settled, a pure democracy was established where every man was precisely equal with every other man. But they could not continue this form of government long. On account of the increase of population and the consequent inconvenience of the people acting en masse, they were compelled to adopt a different mode. They could not act in general assembly, and, therefore, they must adopt some other mode of expressing their opinions. And how did they proceed? Did any one give up his rights to others? By no means. They selected certain persons who should express the opinions of the whole, to transact such business as should become necessary to be done in the same manner as if the whole people had been assembled. It was not yielding any right, but each man was to have his opinion expressed through those who were selected to represent him, the same as if he had expressed it himself. It was a principle of equal representation. And, Sir, that has been the doctrine upon which our government has been founded, upon which it has existed, and it is the doctrine of every free government which has ever existed. It was the basis upon which our government was instituted at that time, and it is the basis upon which I think the government should proceed in future. Now when you come to this point and admit that this is the true theory, the true basis of government, why can we not follow it out? I maintain that this is the only true principle, and when gentlemen say that when our fathers permitted themselves to be represented by delegates chosen by themselves, they gave up any natural right, I deny the doctrine. Sir, when men declare their views or vote, it is not by any grant from others, it is the exercise of their own natural inherent right. Who has the power to make such grant? If they do not possess the right by nature, whence do they derive it? Who can confer it? This right has been called a conventional right. The regulation of its exercise is undoubtedly conventional, but the right itself is inherent in man and was conferred by the Almighty when he created man.

The right of voting has also been called a privilege. A privilege! What is a privilege? It is a favor conferred; a peculiar benefit or advantage, right or immunity, not common to others of the human race. Whence was this peculiar advantage derived? Who, in a natural state, can confer it? If a man does not possess it himself, how can he confer it on others? I maintain, that it is a right which nobody can give, and nobody can take away. It is the province of government to regulate and protect it, but never to weaken or impair it.

But whatever may, in the estimation of any of us, have been its origin, it is an acknowledged legal right, recognized by law, and maintained and enforced by our courts. The right of voting has ever been held as sacred as the right of property, and a violation of the one right subjects the aggressor to punishment, and to a civil remedy just as much as the other. Would you, by any action of the Convention, deprive a man of his property? If not, how can you deprive a man of his right of suffrage? Many a freeman would surrender his property much sooner than the elective franchise.

And the question we are to determine is not to whom the right of voting shall be given, for that is a right which every freeman possesses, but to determine how that right can most fairly and freely be carried into effect? If private individuals or the selectmen of a town deprive a man of his right of voting, or essentially infringe it, they are liable to indictment for it; and he can recover judgment against them for the violation of this right, just as he can for impairing or destroying his property.

Sir, what right have we to say that one man shall have three or four times the power of another man? What right have you to say that the vote of one man shall count as much as the votes of three or four other men? It is just the same, if you give to one man four times the right of another, as if you actually took from that other man three-quarters of his right. As a matter of principle, you can neither do one nor the other.

I say you have just as good a right to deprive a man of his property as you have to deprive him of his right to vote. But this Convention in its sovereign capacity is omnipotent and irresponsible. No other power can call it to account. Let it not be said, that there are no principles by which we are bound. Sir, I say this Convention is bound by the same rules of right and justice which bind a judicial tribunal or any other body, in deciding the questions before them. Suppose we were called upon to distribute the property of an intestate or insolvent, among his children or creditors, and we should deliberately give to one $10,000, and to another only $500, would that be in accordance with the principles of right and justice? Is there a man here who would consent to do it? Is it not as much a violation of duty to give to one man or the inhabitants of one town or county, four or five times as much power as we give to others?

You see, Mr. President, that my argument tends, or at least that my aim is to establish the principle that in the distribution of power, we are bound by the principles of equality and justice so to distribute political rights among all men that at all times and under all circumstances, one man shall enjoy the same right precisely as another man. I do not pretend to say it can be carried out with perfect accuracy. And gentlemen have undertaken to prove that it was mathematically impossible, and have reasoned therefrom that no such principle could exist in practice. Well, Sir, if we cannot carry out the principle with mathematical exactness, is that any good reason why we should not endeavor to approximate to it? Nothing is perfect in this world. And if we cannot attain perfect equality, shall we not endeavor to arrive as near to it as possible? And will any man pretend that to divide the State into districts as nearly equal as may be, in population, or legal voters, will not be a nearer approach to that principle, than to base your House upon town representation?

I concur entirely in the position assumed by the chairman of the Committee, (Mr. Griswold,) who made the first report to the Convention upon this subject, that you must adopt one system or the other. There is no other alternative, you must either have a district system or a town system of representation. I regret that the gentleman for Erving has seen reason to recede from that position, for so far as I can judge, I would much rather have the original report of that Committee, than the substitute of the gentleman from Lowell, (Mr. Butler,) because I think it violates fewer principles, and although the people of the Commonwealth would be unequally and unjustly represented by that, I should prefer it because it contains fewer inconsistencies and violations of principle.

Mr. GRISWOLD, for Erving, (interrupting). If the gentleman will allow me a moment, I desire to say a word of personal explanation. Several gentlemen have alluded to the fact of my yielding to the plan which was presented by the gentleman from Lowell, as a compromise. I wish to say in reply to those allusions, and in answer to the calls of several gentlemen for explanation, that I found, so far as I could ascertain by inquiry of the members of the Convention, and others, that the people of these sixty-four towns, with less than one thousand inhabitants each, would much rather be represented six years out of ten, than to be connected with other towns by any district system that you could make.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES. — MORTON.

[July 1st.

Mr. MORTON, (resuming). Well, Sir, I am not disposed to dispute the gentleman's information, though some of the people from those towns have told me that they would much prefer the district system. But I have made no inquiries upon the subject, and, therefore, the gentleman may be better informed than I am.

But, Mr. President, we are met in the outset with the objection that the district system cannot prevail. It is said that it is in vain to bring it forward again, because it cannot be carried in this Convention. Well, Sir, I do not know whether it can or not. All I ask is that it should have a fair trial, and I will cheerfully acquiesce in whatever may be the will of the Convention. I have heard many gentlemen say that they were in favor of a district system, but that we had better give it up, because it cannot be carried in this Convention. Well, Sir, if gentlemen give it up, and will not vote for it because they believe it cannot be carried, it of course will not be carried.

But another argument was urged at an early stage of this debate, that if the Convention were to submit the district system to the people, they would reject it. There I must take issue with the gentleman. I profess to have no more knowledge in relation to the opinions of the people than is possessed by other members of this Convention, and perhaps I may have less, but I believe the moment you submit a plan for a district system to the people, they will adopt it by an overwhelming majority. My honorable and frank friend from Fitchburg, (Mr. Wood,) let us into the secret of this matter. He was of the opinion that a district system would not prevail with the people, because in every town there are some half dozen, or a dozen, or two dozen persons who are looking forward to an election to some Convention or to the general court, and they will go before the people and for good reasons, or bad reasons, persuade them that the district system ought not to be adopted. Sir, I have no doubt that there are a great many men who are influenced in their action by motives of this kind, but I do not believe they will carry the people with them in the settlement of a question of this importance, I think better of the intelligence of the people than to suppose that half a dozen or a dozen aspiring, ambitious men, seeking their own promotion could persuade the people of the different towns to act against the justice of the measure, their own equal rights, and the best good of the whole State. I believe the people will judge for themselves, and when we present them with a system which will secure an essential reduction in the House, and at the same time an equal and just representation, that they will go for it with a perfect avalanche. I do not speak in reference to this matter so much from personal knowledge, or from consultation with many people, as from very general knowledge of their convictions in relation to the principles of a basis of representation, and from what I know to be their desire to do justice to all parts of the Commonwealth. And I believe that you will even gain the support of many of that class of persons to whom my friend from Fitchburg alluded. I recollect the remark of a shrewd, practiced politician, who said that nothing was easier than to lead the people, all you had got to do was to see which way the current was running and to jump in before it, and thus lead them. [Laughter.] Now, Sir, I apprehend that a great many of these aspirants to office, who are to control the wishes of the people would find that the current was running in favor of the district system and would jump in before it, lead the people in that direction and be its loudest advocates.

But, Sir, I must pass very rapidly over many points which it was my intention to have noticed more at length, and I am the more willing to pass over one very important branch of the subject because it was presented by the gentleman from Ipswich, (Mr. Haskell,) with more clearness than I should be able to present it. He laid down three propositions which I as sincerely believe in as I do in the justice of an overruling Providence. One was that people demand a large reduction of this House. Everywhere it has been called for. Another was, that every man should be represented, not in alternate years, but always represented. And the third was, that representation should be equal. But I will not stop to illustrate what my friend from Ipswich has done so well before me. I say then that there must be a very great reduction of the House and if I had time I should be very glad to illustrate that position by a reference to other States in the Union. Why is it that Massachusetts should stand up here differing from all the other States of the Union? Far be it from me to detract from her good name. I love her and I will defend her wherever and whenever she is assailed. But there are other States of the Union quite as prosperous and quite as respectable. And their business is just as well and just as honestly done with less than half the number of members in their legislatures that we have. And however wise and perfect we may esteem ourselves, I apprehend that we are not too wise and too perfect to improve by the example of others. Sir, we cannot claim to be exempt from the charges brought against others. We have seen various charges brought against the legislatures of other States, but we should remember that others can bring the same charges against us. Gentlemen talk about the legislature of New York being corrupt, but they should remember that New York talks about Massachusetts too; that she tells us about excursions on the Western Railroad,—excursion, not through the Hoosac Tunnel, but around it,—and that these circumstances will bear more than one construction. I make no complaint of them, but how do they look abroad? How are they construed? As a means of influence. And for what purpose? Why, Sir, when a railroad company wish to carry out a certain project and have not the money to do it with, it is a very easy matter to incur the expense of carrying two or three hundred representatives upon an excursion. I do not say for corrupt purposes, but every gentleman can see what influence it is calculated to have.

I wish to refer to some of the States to show the number of representatives which they severally have. I took the pains very early in the progress of this discussion, to prepare a table, showing the extent of territory and the amount of population represented by each member in every State in the Union; but, gentlemen need not fear that I shall trouble them with presenting anything of the kind now. I will merely say, that the great State of New York, unexampled in her growth and prosperity, with a territory five or six times as large as our own, and a population three times as large, has only one hundred and twenty-eight members. Pennsylvania, the Keystone State, as she is called, one of the richest States of the Union, though imprudently involved in debt, twice as large as our own State in population, and four times as large in extent of territory, has one hundred representatives. Ohio, that great State, peopled by sons of New England, with her immense population and territory, has only one hundred members. Since we have been discussing this very matter, I had an opportunity of having a conversation with a distinguished individual from Tennessee, a State many times larger than our own in territory, and quite as large in population—and he tells me that that State has only seventy-five representatives. In answer to my inquiry, how the district system operated there, he said, that it gave great satisfaction, and that they had no desire to change it at all, and, that if they were to make any change, they would reduce their house rather than increase it. Although, I know my own views upon this subject will not meet the views of the Convention, and I do not intend to trouble the Committee by thrusting my opinions upon them in this matter. Yet, I must say, on my conscience, that if we could agree to reduce the House to one hundred and twenty members, I would be rejoiced at the result. I know that this statement will not aid my argument, because, I know that the opinions and prejudices of the people are against it; but, as an honest man standing here, I am willing to avow it, and let it be known. I have not thought proper to fill the blank in my resolution, leaving it to the Committee to insert such number as they should see fit to select. I do not propose any number, because I intend to accede to the wishes of the majority of this Convention, whether they should adopt a basis of two hundred, two hundred and fifty, three hundred or three hundred and fifty. I am in favor of the district system, because we can reduce the House, because we can fix upon a number the best calculated to perform the duties which devolve upon them, and because it insures equality. I have not time to enter into an argument upon this subject at any length, but I wish to refer to one or two other subjects before the hour arrives for closing the debate. There is one argument that I will take this opportunity to advance. I had, originally, as I thought, built a very strong and unanswerable argument upon a certain proposition, but, I confess, that this has been somewhat weakened by the course of argument which has been employed in debate here. I have always heard, not only in party meetings, but in many other places, that there was a centralizing influence exerted here in the metropolis, and that great danger was to be apprehended from it. That feeling has grown up with me, and I thought that great danger resulted from that source, and I think now, that there is great danger from it. But, I confess, the argument of my distinguished friend for Berlin, (Mr. Boutwell,) weakened my convictions upon this subject. He said that your talented ministers, your learned doctors, your eloquent lawyers, your enterprising merchants, the great body of your industrious laborers, all find their way from the country to the city. If this is the case, do they not bring with them the sentiments, feelings and sympathies of the country. I have some personal recollections upon this subject, and I cannot think of the homely place where I was born, without feeling a strong attachment for it, and those, feelings and impressions which were implanted

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.—MORTON—BURLINGAME.

then, still follow me, let me go where I may, in town or country. Therefore, as it seems to me, this argument goes far to show that the power of centralization is not quite so dangerous after all, as I once apprehended, and that there is not quite so much opposition between the city and country as I had been inclined to believe. I was very much obliged to the member from my own county, who represents Easton, (Mr. Sheldon,) who made an effort to show that there was an overwhelming tendency to centralization, and that it would govern and control the Commonwealth. I wish his argument had been stronger, I wish to make as much as I can of the danger of centralization, and then comes the duty to neutralize and guard against it. How can this be done? The district system does it completely. You do not want to array the country against the city. You do not want to bring a double representation from Berkshire or Franklin, or any where else, to vote down Boston. I am aware, that in Boston and its vicinity, on account of the compactness of its population there is a great deal of central power exerted, but I am aware also, that there is a great diversity of opinions, pursuits, interests and tastes, nay, that that diversity is altogether greater here than in any part of the country. All you have got to do to destroy centralization, is to make your districts equal throughout the State, and then be assured that one district will be played off against the other, and your centralization will be all scattered and annihilated. Let us look a little for example, in this matter. Look at the great city of New York, containing more than half as many people as this whole State of Massachusetts. Under the district system she chooses seventeen representatives, and is it not notorious to everybody who has read the newspapers, that there are no seventeen representatives in the legislature who have so little influence as these seventeen members from the city of New York. Look, too, at Philadelphia, a city larger by far, than Boston, and how is it there? We all know that Philadelphia exerts but little influence in the legislature of Pennsylvania, and the result would be the same here. I should like to say something more upon this subject, but I find that I have not the time to do so, and must hurry on to glance at one or two other topics. I desire to say a little something to my friends from Franklin, for I have very great respect for them, and I should like to say in this connection, that nobody has a higher respect for the farmers of the country than I have. I was brought up on a farm, and there are all my attachments. I know thoroughly, that class of people, and I was grieved to hear my honest friend in the gallery, (Mr. Whitney, of Boylston,) depreciate the farmers and mechanics of the country, by saying, that if you form districts, you will have none of them here. He did them great injustice when he made that remark. They will take care of themselves, and will see to it that they are duly represented. There is no danger in forming districts, because your independent, respectable and intelligent farmers will not be represented. I will say of them, what I intended to say when I began the sentence, that I consider the farmers as respectable, as intelligent, and more honest than any other class of the community. I hold, that, all classes are honest in proportion to the absence of temptation to which they are exposed, and I think that the farmers are more honest, for the reason that they have less temptation to be dishonest. I think that is a fact which can be easily established.

Perhaps I ought to make one exception, when I speak of the farmers being more honest than other people, and that is, in favor of the fishermen of Cape Cod, and the whalemens of Nantucket. The whalemen are upon the ocean more than half of the time, and they cannot be exposed to very great temptation there, while the fishermen pursue their occupation in small vessels, but few being associated together, and they have but very little temptation, and I presume you will agree with me, that these fishermen, when at their homes on Cape Cod, have quite as few temptations to dissipation and profligacy, as the farmers of Franklin. But I may not strike the balance between these two classes. I desired to say a word or two to my friends from Franklin, who have been a little disturbed at some sensitiveness exhibited on the part of the south-eastern section of this State. They thought that it showed an unbecoming spirit, and it was bandied about from one to the other, that there was caucusing to effect a certain object. I do not believe much in caucuses, nor do I proscribe them. In matters of this kind, we must all have consultations, and do we not all want some inducement to bestir ourselves, and try to claim our rights. I wish to look at this thing and see, if the younger branch of our delegation showed a little warmth, if they were not excited to do so by what happened between Bristol and Franklin. Upon principles of equality, we are entitled to two and a half times as many representatives as they are in Franklin. But, by the original Report which is but little varied by the proposed amendment, Bristol had just the same number as Franklin. If we have a just and equal representation, instead of having twenty-six members, we should have sixty-four. Barnstable with 35,000 inhabitants, has thirteen members, while Franklin with 30,000 has twenty-six—just double. The same ratio of representation which gives to Franklin twenty-six members, gives to Bristol sixty-four, and Barnstable twenty-eight. Is it strange that such gross inequality and injustice should produce some little excitement in those counties? Is it wrong that some few of their members should get together and try to make an arrangement by which something like equality should be secured? Their submission is much more remarkable. Let us reverse this picture, and see what word we should have heard from Franklin. I am going to pass over Plymouth, whose claims have been so well presented by the member from Duxbury, (Mr. Weston). Supposing there had been assigned to Bristol and Barnstable as great a proportional excess over Franklin, as Franklin has over those two counties. How would the account have stood? Gentlemen will hardly believe a statement so monstrous. I doubted it myself, when I made the computation; and I was not convinced of its accuracy, until I called in a mathematician to revise and test the calculation. If the same disproportion existed in favor of Bristol and Barnstable, which by the Report exists in favor of Franklin, while Franklin would have twenty-six members, Bristol would have one hundred and sixty, and Barnstable sixty-two. Now reduce these figures to comprehensible numbers, and Franklin would have five, Bristol thirty-two, and Barnstable twelve. If such a report had been brought in, what should we have heard from Franklin? Would she have been as quiet and tame as was the Old Colony? No, Sir. The voice of my friend from Freetown would have been like the cooing of a dove compared with the thunder which would have come from the mountains. Erving, and Montague, and Conway, and Deerfield would have opened their batteries upon us, and Warwick would have carried our works by storm. [Laughter.] And I should forever have honored and respected them for doing it. Men who will not resist the invasion of their just and equal rights, are hardly worthy to possess them, and will not be likely long to retain them. Now is there a man here from Bristol or Barnstable who has so little regard to his just rights, and so little self-respect that he is willing to confess himself but one-half or one-third of a man compared with a citizen of Franklin or Berkshire? If there be one—

Here the President's hammer fell.

THE PRESIDENT. The Convention has ordered debate upon the main proposition, and the pending amendments, to cease at this time. The first question before the Convention is upon the motion of the gentleman representing Wilbraham, (Mr. Hallett). The Chair will state the position of the question. The first proposition is the Report of the majority of the Committee. That resolve was committed to the Committee of the Whole, who have reported it to the Convention with an amendment in the nature of a substitute. The question, therefore, is upon agreeing to the amendment reported by the Committee of the Whole. Pending that question, the gentleman from Boston, (Mr. Schouler,) by unanimous consent of the Convention, had leave to present an amendment to the amendment which is in itself in the nature of a substitute. Pending the question, the gentleman for Wilbraham, (Mr. Hallett,) moved to perfect the amendment by striking out the following words in the last paragraph of the first resolve:—

Every city or town of 15,000 inhabitants and upwards, shall be entitled to one representative, and as many additional in each year as the number of times 5,000 may be contained in the whole number of the inhabitants thereof.

And insert in lieu thereof the following words:

Every city and town containing over 12,000 inhabitants shall be entitled to elect one additional representative for every 4,000 inhabitants it may contain over 12,000.

The question is upon this amendment perfecting the paragraph in Document No. 65, which has just been read.

The question was then taken upon Mr. Hallett's amendment, and a count being had, there were—ayes, 149; noes, 67.

So the amendment was agreed to.

THE PRESIDENT. The question recurs upon the amendment moved by the gentleman from Boston, (Mr. Schouler,) which is to strike out certain words, standing as the amendment reported by the Committee of the Whole, as printed in Document, No. 65, and insert as a substitute, the words as printed in Document No. 66, as modified by the gentleman.

MR. BURLINGAME, for Northborough. Is it order, Mr. President, to offer an amendment?

THE PRESIDENT. The gentleman will state his amendment.

MR. BURLINGAME. I wish to move to

Friday,]

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES. — DANA — BRIGGS.

[July 1st.

strike out certain words, and insert the following:—

Resolved, That by the theory of government, and the Declaration of Independence, all men are created equal, and are endowed by their Creator, with certain inalienable rights, that among these are life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness, and that to secure these rights, governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed, and that these are fundamental maxims, upon which every truly democratic government is founded, and upon which alone genuine democracy can be permanently maintained.

Mr. SCHOULER. I will accept that amendment.

The PRESIDENT. The question is then upon the resolution as modified.

Mr. DANA. I move to amend the second resolution, by inserting after the words "man for man," the words, "woman for woman, child for child, and irrespective of citizenship or residence," so that it will read—

Resolved, That it is expedient so to amend the Constitution of Massachusetts, that the popular branch of the government—the House of Representatives—like the Senate, shall be so constituted that all men shall be equal, in political power and authority in the Commonwealth, and be equally represented, as near as may be, man for man, woman for woman, child for child, and irrespective of residence, in the State government.

Mr. SCHOULER. I call for the yeas and nays on that amendment.

Mr. DANA. I will not take up the time of the Convention except to say that my desire is to perfect the amendment offered by the gentleman from Boston. [Laughter.] He has evidently an impression, that there is some principle which has been violated by the Commonwealth of Massachusetts from the beginning. As his resolution stood yesterday, it seemed to carry with it an inference that there was but one system of representation consistent with the Declaration of Independence and true democracy, and that was the district system. Well, inasmuch as we have never had a district system, of course it follows that we have uniformly violated the Declaration of Independence and the principles of democracy, from the beginning of the government to the present time.

But as he has withdrawn the preamble, nothing stands but his resolution, and I wish to perfect it and show that the only principle which our ancestors have violated and the only principle we shall violate, if we adhere to town representation, is not that of equality, not equality of citizens, but the equality of such numbers as the census counts. I did not mean to say a word, but I cannot avoid the temptation to say one thing which I think is legitimately connected with my amendment. I wish to call the attention of the Convention to what I believe a fallacy—an unintentional one, no doubt—on the part of those persons who contend that we violate by the principle of town representation, the true principle of equality. Now, I know that the democratic instincts of those members in this part of the House, who spoke yesterday, and the long and consistent democratic lives which they have led so many years, are very much agitated and distressed by the idea that the principle of town representation is to be adhered to. I feel for them. [Laughter.]

I have listened to the earnest appeals they have made, and the deep anxiety they have manifested, lest true democratic principles should not be adhered to in this Commonwealth, and I wish to administer some relief to my conservative friends on that point. I wish to assure them that, so far as I know, no democratic principle has been violated for two hundred years, and no democratic principle will be violated now. What is Democracy? If I have to learn what the democratic principle is, since I have never ranged myself in the Democratic party, they must pardon me if I do not go to my conservative friends, but rather to those who are older soldiers in the cause; but if I understand the democratic principle at all, it is not that political power must be based upon numbers merely, irrespective of what it is that you number, but upon numbers substantially, on the assumption that those numbers are composed of citizens.

We are in a peculiar state of things, such as the world never saw from the days of Noah to the present time. There is a tide of immigration setting into this country and especially into the Atlantic cities, such as was never seen. It is a transient population and an alien population. It counts in the census. Now I ask whether in this State of things, that is the kind of numbers to which the democratic principle of political equality in basing political representation, is to apply. I apprehend not. When Louis Napoleon was elected president, the soldiers voted by regiments and battalions and companies; and if a division of soldiers was stationed here, would it be counted in settling the basis of power? Would you count the tenants of the amphitheatre at the foot of the common, and all the people at the hotels? Would you count the transient alien population, as it passes over your stage in its course of emigration? You might as well count among the stock of a farm, the crows that alight upon his fields, and the wild geese that fly over them. It is unjust to seek to gain the benefit of this population in arranging the political power of the State. There, I take it, is the fallacy and the injustice respecting this extraordinary accident in the history of the world, this tide of immigration, and of transient population. If you count human beings, you get at numbers, to which the democratic principle never ought, in justice to apply. Here is the great difficulty.

In the State of New York, which is a democratic State, they do not base their political power upon numbers, but upon numbers exclusive of aliens; and by the consent of the city of New York, the entire alien population is excluded in making out the political power of the State. But we have included here, this transient population in making up the basis, of the Senate, and in making up the basis of the council; and in making up the basis of representatives in congress, our national power is founded upon counting in this alien transient population. Now, we are asked to extend it one step further, in order to get the benefit of it in breaking up the entire system of town representation, I mean to say, the political power of the towns in Massachusetts.

I beg my friends not to be deluded any longer with the idea that they are violating the principle of equality by adhering to the principles of town representation; and if they throw overboard this principle, I hope they will understand that they are throwing it overboard only for the purpose of giving the benefit of the power of representation more fully to the great cities. New York has not the benefit of this alien population, and no city has so much of that population as Boston, except New York.

I desire to put this matter fairly before the Convention. I think it would be an injustice to every department of the government to reckon in this floating alien population. Would it not be an injustice thus to apply the democratic principle of equality to a system of numbers to which it was never intended to apply?

Now, in moving my amendment, I purpose to expose that fallacy. I hope the Convention will adopt my amendment. It will include all transient persons, staying for a day or an hour, irrespective of age or sex or anything else, and this will expose the fallacy contained in the amendment of the gentleman from Boston. It will carry it out to its legitimate conclusion. If, then, the gentleman from Boston approves it, I hope he will vote for it.

Mr. BRIGGS, of Pittsfield, asked for the reading of the amendments.

They were read by the Secretary.

Mr. BRIGGS. We have reached a point in the progress of this most interesting discussion, of very great importance to us and those whom we represent here. The great question to be settled this day, Sir, is between a just and equal system of representation, founded upon population, ratable polls, or legal voters, and the present system of town representation. The gentleman from Boston has introduced two propositions here, calculated to bring the mind of this Convention directly to the point; and he has declared in one of them the rights of men to participate in the affairs of government, man and man-like. And the gentleman from Manchester has introduced a proposition to enlarge this. Sir, if he believed in extending the principle to the length that he has proposed, would he have made his proposition, or is he playing with this Convention? Does he wish to sport with us, here? He proposes, in direct terms, the absurdity which he so fairly illustrates here. And why does he do it? Is it to defeat a grave and serious proposition, by engrafting upon it that which he himself says is an absurdity? Does he wish to enumerate in this population the company that are now performing at the bottom of the Common? He says he does; but does the proposition of my friend embrace them? No Sir; he says it does not; but the gentleman wants the proposition to embrace them, and yet he calls upon the friends of the towns to vote for his proposition. Sir, I have a respect for the towns and the representatives of the towns, and I hope that the representatives of the small towns will pause before they vote for such a proposition as this. Sir, let us seriously approach the main point in this case. The gentleman assures this Convention,—and that is something of an assumption for him,—“calm your fears; allay your apprehensions that this system of town representation violates the principles of equality and justice.” I see before me my friend from the little town of New Ashford, (Mr. Harmon,) one of those from my own native county, who represents two hundred and ten as good and true men and women as are to be found in any other town in this Commonwealth; and let me appeal to his sense of justice, and his notions of equality,—let me ask him, if he believes that it violates no such principle that he is to represent two hundred and ten inhabitants, and another town with one, two, or three thousand inhabitants, is to have only one representative. Where are we, Sir? We hear it asserted, day after day, that if one town, having five hundred inhabitants, has one representative, and another town, of two thousand inhabitants, has one representative, yet that violates no principle of republican equality. Tell me, Sir, if one man in Berkshire County, or in Franklin County, is worth three men in Boston. You talk about the "solid men" of the country; what is a solid man? He is a man endowed with all the rights of a man; and what is he when he comes into the city and takes up his abode here? Is he any the less a man? Sir, take a man from one of those corporate towns that my friend represented to us a few days ago, and which he so undervalues. He comes down from his native hills of New Hampshire, a man—one of the "solid men" of New Hampshire; he comes down to Lowell and takes his stand at a loom; but just as soon as he does that he loses the respect of my friend, or, at least, his political consequence, and becomes but one-half or one-third of a man; and yet they tell us this violates no principle of republican equality! Sir, I believe in no such democracy as this. I said once, upon another occasion, that I was born a Democrat, and that was a little too original for some Democrats present; but I know no other sentiment than that of true republican democracy, and that democracy dates back to the time when Jefferson raised the banner in the days when they reckoned all men as men. They say that a man in Berkshire, or in Middlesex, because he follows the plough, is a solid man; but when he removes his residence, and comes into a city, he becomes less of a man. Now, Sir, let us approach this subject at the point which we have now reached, seriously and gravely, and vote upon the propositions which are before us. They are sensible, direct propositions, intended to proclaim the true principle of the district system, based either upon population, ratable polls, or legal voters, as contrasted with the principle of town representation in any of the plans which have been laid before us. I came here, Mr. President, with the feeling, and I now entertain it, deeply and sincerely, that if any plan can be devised by which this system of town representation can be maintained with anything approximating to justice to the large towns and the cities, and at the same time keeping the House within reasonable limits, I would go for it, and go for it cheerfully; but unless it can be done, and done without violating the great principles of equality, and our Declaration of Rights, which was read yesterday by the gentleman from Boston, (Mr. Crowninshield,) and alluded to to-day by the venerable gentleman from Taunton, (Mr. Morton,)—planting myself upon that, I say, that if it cannot be done without violating that great principle, I cannot go for it. Sir, frankness leads me to declare, that in my estimation no plan which has yet been presented to this Convention, accomplishes that desirable object. I shall therefore be compelled to vote against them all, and if nothing better can be devised, I shall vote for an equal district system,—that system which shall give to every voter in the Commonwealth the same right every year, and which shall give to every district in the Commonwealth the same power.

Mr. SCHOULER, of Boston, called for the yeas and nays on the amendment submitted by Mr. Dana.

Mr. DANA. I am informed that an amendment is now in preparation, which will accomplish my object as well, or better than the one which I have offered, and I therefore withdraw it. I wish the Convention to understand, however, that when I submitted it, it was with the intention of having the question taken upon it.

The question then recurred on the amendment submitted by Mr. Schouler.

Mr. GRISWOLD, for Erving. I now move to amend the second resolution proposed by the gentleman from Boston, by striking out the words "ratable polls or upon legal voters," and inserting instead thereof, the words, "as near as may be, by a system of town representation, adjusted in a manner as near equal and just as is practicable," so that the resolution will read as follows:—

Resolved second, That it is expedient so to amend the Constitution of Massachusetts, that the popular branch of the government, the House of Representatives, shall be based upon population, as near as may be, by a system of town representation, adjusted in a manner as near equal and just as is practicable, to the end that all men shall be equal in power, and be equally represented, as near as may be, man for man, in the State government.

So far as I can judge, from the resolution which the gentleman from Boston has offered, it seems to be his object to bring this Convention to a declaration of some naked principle upon this subject. I have no objection, Mr. President, to making that declaration, except that it is taking up the time of the Convention, perhaps somewhat uselessly. But I wish, if that declaration is to go forth, to have it qualified by a fact which has been settled, over and over again, by the votes of this Convention, viz: that they are in favor of town representation. Now, Mr. President, we hear a great deal of talk here about the principles of equality; and, although there has been no numerical equality from the first origin of our government—neither under the colonial or the provincial charters, nor in the Constitution framed by the greatest men who ever lived in Massachusetts, nor, since that time, by any amendments to the Constitution—gentlemen keep getting up here and talking about the principle of equality, numerical equality, as though that had always been the basis of representation, and as though men in Boston and men in Plymouth—men in Berkshire and men in Franklin—had always been precisely equally represented. Out, Sir, upon such hypocrisy and nonsense! It never has been so under our government, and the gentleman from Boston, (Mr. Crowninshield,) who made a very able speech, yesterday, upon this subject, in laying down the doctrine of popular rights—those great general principles which every man, woman and child in Massachusetts will endorse—and in passing a eulogium upon John Adams, and his democracy and love for equality, took great care to keep back the proposition which Mr. Adams, in his own handwriting, incorporated into that Constitution, of town representation which had no equality about it, so far as population is concerned. It was quite as unequal, if not more unequal than the proposition of the gentleman from Lowell; and quite as unequal, as the gentleman must admit, if he will take the census and examine the population of the various towns at that time, as the proposition which I had the honor to submit. Sir, I make no objection to this; but, as this Convention have, by various votes, decided, as I think, upon the system of town representation in some form or other, it seems to me that we would better put forth this proposition, qualified as Mr. Adams put it forth, in the very able address which that gentleman drew up and sent out to the people of the Commonwealth, at the time when the Constitution was adopted—that they had fixed it equal as far as it was practicable. My friend from Pittsfield, (Mr. Briggs,) thinks that this is a very serious question; but, Sir, it is a mere naked proposition, and what is to be gained by adopting it in this form? I want to know what that gentleman desires, practically?—that is the question. It is all very well to talk about the naked theory of equality, but we want something practical, and what shall it be? I offer this amendment, Mr. President, because I think that its adoption will make the amendment conform more nearly to the provisions of the amendment submitted by the gentleman from Lowell, which, so far as I can judge of the feelings of this Convention, is more likely to be adopted than any other proposition.

Mr. SCHOULER. I supposed, Mr. President, that it was generally understood; that the proposition which I offered, was to be treated fairly, and that we were to have an opportunity to try the sense of the Convention upon it; but, instead of letting it come to a vote, and treating it fairly, the gentleman from Manchester gets up here, and, with all his legal ability, opposes it with something of the art of a pedagogue or a demagogue.

The PRESIDENT. It is not in order for the gentleman to use language of that kind in debate.

Mr. SCHOULER. I suppose the Chair considered it perfectly in order for the gentleman to speak about foreigners in this country as though they were mere beasts. That is the way that the gentleman for Manchester talks about us; for, Sir, I happen to be one of that class to which he alludes.

Mr. DANA. Mr. President, I rise for an explanation.

Mr. SCHOULER. I will state what the gentleman said, and then he may explain it, if he chooses. He said that these foreigners came over here, and that if we were to treat them as though they were born here, we might just as well take a catalogue or census of the beasts in a farmer's yard, or the birds which fly over his field.

Mr. DANA. If the gentleman will permit me, I will state, that he entirely misapprehended the purport of my remark. I said that the farmer might as well count, in the stock on his farm, the crows that alight upon his fields, as to have our representation based upon floating population. There was no relative comparison between them. One class are birds of passage and the other are birds of residence, relatively; they are, in other respects, the same. I thought that my argument would be understood.

Mr. SCHOULER. I am content then to let that go as he has reported it. Now, Sir, we have another amendment, proposed by the gentleman for Erving; and we know exactly what his proposition is. He wants to get a system of town representation; but why cannot he allow us to have a square and direct vote upon a plain proposition, which a large number of the members of this House desire to have a vote upon? I ask if it is treating us fairly? Does he not dare to let us have a vote upon that proposition? Of course he does not; because he offers his amendment here, which amounts to nothing. We understand what he wants; we all know that the equal representation that he speaks about, is the plan of the gentleman from Lowell; but we want to have a trial of the sense of this Convention upon the fair proposition, whether we shall have the representation in the House of Representatives based either upon population, legal voters, or ratable polls. If the majority of the Convention are opposed to it, they will say so; but we are now hampered with one amendment after another, and if we go on in this way, we never can get a direct vote upon that proposition. The gentleman says, that the Convention have already decided, over and over again, that they will have town representation. But there has been but one question submitted on the district system, and that was on the proposition reported by the minority of the Committee, which was voted down.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.—SCHOULER—GRISWOLD—JENKS—EARLE.

But it was not a single district system; it was a system in which the senatorial districts were to be cut up into two representative districts. I ask why we cannot have a vote upon this question? I ask why a majority of the Convention are afraid to let us have a vote upon it so that we may know whether or not we are to have a fair representation on the floor of this House?

The gentleman for Manchester spoke about the democracy. I believe that he belongs to the true democratic party. He is one of the democracy. But the other day he made a distinction among the people; and seemed to think that of all classes and occupations the farmers were the best, the mercantile the next best in comparison with the farmers, and the mechanic the next best in comparison with the merchant.

Mr. DANA. The gentleman has entirely mistaken what I said.

Mr. SCHOULER. Then I cannot understand the gentleman at all.

Mr. DANA. I am sorry for that for I generally endeavor to make myself understood when I have anything to say.

Mr. SCHOULER. I hold in my hand a paper of this morning called the Boston Commonwealth, and which, I believe, is the organ of the Convention, and in it they say:—

"Some Americans, called democrats, in virtue of their birth-place, (nothing else,) dislike the Hebraic terseness of 'ALL MEN are created free and equal,' and they would amend the phrase thus: 'A FEW MEN are created free and equal—the rest are only 'niggers,' in our country,—serfs in Russia.'"

Now the gentleman for Manchester, (Mr. Dana,) has spoken a great deal about the equal rights of colored persons, and I agree with him when we come to that; but when we come to consider the equal rights of white men, he is all flat, and argues that there must be a distinction, and that that distinction must be on account of town lines. [A laugh.]

But, Mr. President, I ask not to occupy the time of the House, but that the gentleman for Erving, (Mr. Griswold,) will withdraw his amendment and let us have a vote upon the naked question as it is presented in the resolution I have offered, and not embarrass the question by having these amendments put upon it, so as to endeavor to destroy a reasonable proposition by ridicule.

Mr. GRISWOLD. I do not rise for the purpose of prolonging discussion upon this amendment, but simply with the view of inquiring of the Chair what will be the effect if the amendment I have offered should be adopted, and then the proposition of the gentleman from Boston, (Mr. Schouler,) should be adopted as amended? How would it affect the proposition of the gentleman from Lowell, (Mr. Butler)?

The PRESIDENT. The gentleman for Erving presents a very complicated question as to the effect of certain votes upon an amendment now pending, as reported to the Convention from the Committee of the Whole. The Chair can only intimate to the gentleman that he does not feel at liberty to go into an explanation of this kind because he might mislead members of the Convention.

Mr. GRISWOLD. I am inclined to think that, on the spur of the moment, I labored under misapprehension as to the effect of the passage of the resolution even if thus amended. I supposed that if my amendment was adopted to the resolution of the gentleman from Boston, and that that resolution, as thus amended, should be adopted, it would not be a substitute for the proposition of the gentleman from Lowell. In that I am conscious that I am mistaken. It would still be a substitute.

The PRESIDENT. In the present condition of business a strict enforcement of the rules must be observed, and the Chair can only ask the gentleman for what purpose he rose.

Mr. GRISWOLD. I rose to withdraw my amendment, and also for the purpose of asking the privilege of making an explanation.

The PRESIDENT. The gentleman can withdraw his amendment, but his explanation can only be made by unanimous consent.

No objection was made.

Mr. GRISWOLD. I offered my amendment honestly and in perfect good faith; but as I find that the effect of it will be somewhat different from what I anticipated, I shall vote against the amendment offered by the gentleman from Boston.

The PRESIDENT. The question then will be upon the amendment of the gentleman from Boston which is offered as a substitute for the amendment from the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BUTLER. I call for a division of the question.

The PRESIDENT. The question then will be on the first resolution, and on that question the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. BUTLER. In order to save time I will withdraw the call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. BIRD, of Walpole. Then I renew the motion for a division of the question.

Mr. CROWNINSHIELD, of Boston. Will it be in order to move a reconsideration of the vote ordering the yeas and nays?

Mr. BIRD. If the question is to be taken by yeas and nays on each of these resolutions I will withdraw the call for a division of the question.

Mr. SCHOULER. Is it in order to withdraw the first of these resolutions?

The PRESIDENT. It is in order.

Mr. SCHOULER. Then I withdraw the first resolution, and will ask for the yeas and nays on the next one.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the resolution which was offered as a substitute for the Report of the Committee of the Whole was read as follows:—

Resolved, That it is expedient so to amend the Constitution of Massachusetts, that the popular branch of the government, the House of Representatives, shall be based upon population, ratable polls, or upon legal voters in this Commonwealth; that all men shall be equal in power, and be equally represented, as near as may be, man for man, in the State government.

Mr. JENKS, of Boston. Is it in order to amend the resolution before the question is taken?

The PRESIDENT. It is in order.

Mr. JENKS. Then I move to amend it by adding the following paragraph:—

Resolved, That it is expedient so to amend the Constitution as to provide that the several counties of the Commonwealth shall constitute representative districts, each of which shall be entitled to elect such number of representatives as may correspond with its voting population, to be apportioned as equally as practicable, so that the aggregate shall at no time exceed six times the number of senators authorized to be chosen by this Constitution; said elections to be made in such manner as may be prescribed by law; every representative so elected to be a legal voter in the district for which he is chosen; and not more than three representatives to be inhabitants of any one town, or of any one ward of a city within any district.

The PRESIDENT. Will the gentleman from Boston have the goodness to send his amendment to the Chair?

Mr. JENKS. On reflection I think I will withdraw it for the present, and will probably offer it in another form.

Mr. EARLE, of Worcester. I desire to make an inquiry of the Chair as to the effect of this amendment, because I apprehend that, to some extent it is misunderstood.

The PRESIDENT. It is not for the Chair to state anything in regard to the operation of this amendment. Gentlemen have heard the amendment read, and also the Report of the Committee to which it is offered as a substitute.

Mr. EARLE. It was not exactly on that point that I desired information. I wanted to know what would be the effect of the amendment as a substitute.

Cries of "question, question."

The PRESIDENT. If the gentleman from Worcester rises to a question of order he will state what his point of order is; but further debate is now out of order.

Mr. EARLE. I want to know whether if we pass the amendment of the gentleman from Boston, which is a substitute for the proposition of the gentleman from Lowell, (Mr. Butler,) we will not be adopting as a substitute for something which is substantial, and gives us a certain scale of representation, a proposition which is a mere abstraction, and which furnishes no scale at all?

The PRESIDENT. The proposition of the gentleman from Boston is to strike out, entirely, the amendment reported by the Committee of the Whole, which is printed in Convention Document No. 65, and which was substituted for the resolves reported by the chairman of the Committee on the House of Representatives, and to substitute in its stead the resolution he has offered, and on that question the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question was then taken, by the calling of the roll, and resulted—yeas, 182; nays, 223—as follows:—

Absent and not voting, 64.

So the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT. The question now recurs on the proposition reported from the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MORTON, of Taunton. I move a substitute for the report of the Committee, which is to strike out all after the word resolved, and insert what I will read—

Mr. BUTLER, of Lowell. I rise to a question of order. We have before us already a substitute for another proposition; and, as I understand that the gentleman from Taunton proposes to offer a substitute for a substitute, and as I further understand that such a proposition can only be in order by general consent, I must, without intending any discourtesy to the gentleman, object to its being received.

The PRESIDENT again stated the exact position of the question, and decided that, as the offer of the gentleman from Taunton was a substitute for a substitute, it could not be received except by general consent, and that as objection had been made it could not be offered at this time.

Mr. MORTON. With the permission of the Chair, I will state, that when the order was made

Friday,]

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.—BUTLER—MORTON—BEACH.

[July 1st.

this morning to close the debate at eleven o'clock, and to take the question at that time, I understood that the question would be upon amendments which might be offered, and that each individual would have ten minutes to explain the object and effect of his amendment, and that ten minutes would be allowed in reply. It was on the faith of that being the operation of the order, that I withdrew my motion before, expecting that I would have an opportunity to offer it, with at least ten minutes for its explanation.

Mr. BUTLER. I am very anxious to have the question taken, but in order to accommodate the gentleman from Taunton, I withdraw my objection.

The substitute offered by Mr. Morton, was then read, as follows:—

That the House of Representatives shall consist of _____ members, which shall be divided among the several counties of the Commonwealth, as nearly as possible according to the number of _____ by the last preceding decennial census.

As soon as may be after each decennial census, the Senate shall divide each county into as many representative districts as it may deem expedient, so that the basis of each representative shall be as nearly the same number of _____ as possible without the division of towns, or the wards of cities: Provided, that no district shall be entitled to more than three representatives, and provided further, that Nantucket and Dukes counties shall each form one district, and be entitled to at least one representative.

Mr. MORTON. I do not mean to make any speech or argument upon the subject, but merely to occupy about half of the time allowed me for the purpose of explaining the object of this amendment.

I believe, Sir, that there has been no direct proposition made or voted upon in Convention in regard to the district system; and I have drawn up this amendment with the view of bringing up the direct question in regard to that system in contradistinction from the town system; and finding the question once truly settled I will give the Convention no further trouble, however much objection there may be to my plan. As this proposition has not been printed, I fear it is not entirely understood by the Convention from my reading it. I will, therefore, occupy a few moments in explaining it.

In the first place, it proposes to fix the number of the House of Representatives. The number of which that house should consist was left blank, in order that the Convention might insert just such number as they might please. These members are to be divided among the several counties as nearly as may be, either upon the basis of ratable polls, legal voters, or inhabitants as the Convention may think proper. When they are to be districted, the districts are not to elect more than three representatives each. The reason is, that in dividing the counties into districts it is proposed to leave to the Senate to equalize the districts so that the counties may include one or two districts, and thereby obtain a more equal representation than they can gain in any other way. I have no particular attachment to this mode of districting the Commonwealth, but I merely wish to test this question fairly. I have intentionally left these blanks in the proposition, one of them in relation to the number of the members of the House. I leave it to the Convention to fill that blank, of course, and will accept any number which the Convention may see proper to adopt.

Then again as to the basis on which an equal distribution is to be made. I have left that blank also, so that the Convention may either adopt ratable polls, or legal voters, or population, as they please. I hope that the Convention will fill these blanks with such numbers of representatives, and such class of voters as may suit them.

As no yeas and nays have been taken on this question, I feel obliged to ask for the yeas and nays upon my amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BUTLER, of Lowell. When, Sir, the gentleman from Taunton, (Mr. Morton,) moved his amendment, I objected to its reception. I withdrew the objection in order that the business of the House might go on, but I supposed that if he came in with his amendment, merely as a matter of courtesy, he would not have insisted upon consuming the time of the Convention with a call for the yeas and nays upon a proposition which, if he is not satisfied that this Convention has voted down, everybody else is. Why, Sir, we have been obliged to vote against the amendment of the gentleman from Boston, (Mr. Schouler,) which as an abstract proposition, is well enough, and to which no man in the world could have any earthly objection, except that it is to be made a substitute for a matured plan. I voted against the proposition of the gentleman from Boston, because it was proposed to be substituted for a mature plan, and thus compel us to begin again to reconstruct the system. That being so, it involved the whole district system proposed by the gentleman from Taunton, and which he argued for an hour, yes, and the last hour given to us too, and then by a majority of nearly two to one, it went to the tomb of all the Capulets. Now, Sir, it is to be brought up again, and another hour of the valuable time of this Convention is to be consumed in its discussion.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair would suggest to the gentleman, that he is speaking against the past action of the Convention, which is not strictly in order.

Mr. BUTLER. I am not intending to reflect upon the past action of the Convention. I am content with it, and I did not vote against the yeas and nays upon the gentleman's proposition, for I hold that every man who calls for the yeas and nays has a right to have them. But I was arguing upon the effect of the motion, and it is to consume another hour of our time, and upon what? Upon the district system, upon blank districts, for a blank number of representatives, to be elected upon a blank basis. And are we to spend an hour on three blanks—nothing multiplied by three? There we have it, man for man, woman for woman, and child for child, for the gentleman says he wants us to fill up the blanks as we please. There is no proposition as to the number, of which the House shall consist, and in my judgment, it is only a firebrand thrown in among us; an endeavor if, by some means, it may not deceive the elect. [Laughter.] I trust we shall not be deceived by it. I trust we shall understand it, and whence it comes, and I am only sorry that I withdrew the objection, and that I did not insist that we should have no more of these propositions. But the gentleman will be satisfied with the call of the roll upon his proposition, and I am ready for one, to meet the issue.

Mr. BEACH, of Springfield. I desire to offer an amendment to the proposition submitted by the gentleman from Taunton, (Mr. Morton). I propose, if it is in order, to fill the first blank with the number "two hundred and sixty-one," and the second and third blanks, with the words "legal voters."

This proposition, thus amended, meets my cordial approbation. It is, in my judgment, the only complete and effectual cure for the two great evils in the present provision—the great size of the House, and the great inequality in the distribution of political power—of which the people have most, and justly complained. The great size of the House, and the consequent great length of the sessions, has been matter of universal complaint.

I take this number because it gives one representative to every seven hundred voters and accomplishes a great reduction of the House. I should prefer, personally, a still smaller number, but as many gentlemen have expressed a preference for a large House, and feel that there is more safety in a large than a small House, I am content with the number proposed.

Several gentlemen have urged as of great importance, the necessity of establishing the House on a different basis from the Senate, to enable each to be a suitable check on the other. I do not share with them fully in the views and fears they express on this subject, but my proposition, basing the House on legal voters, secures this check, and thus answers the end they seem so much to desire. I think that legal voters constitute a just and proper basis. They are our immediate constituents. They are to pass on our acts here. They are the only safe depositories of political power. With them resides the sovereignty of the Commonwealth. This proposition distributes the political power of the Commonwealth with exact equality throughout its whole extent, favoring no class or section, and disparaging no class or section. The voter of Boston has the same voice, and exerts by his vote the same power, no more and no less, with the voter on the banks of the Connecticut in Franklin, and the voter on the glorious hills of Berkshire. A man is a man wherever in the Commonwealth he may chance to be. He makes nothing by going from Boston to Erving, and loses nothing by coming from Erving to Boston. Place gives no advantage, confers no merit. By this plan, justice is done to all throughout the Commonwealth. The cry of inequality—that cry, which more than anything else caused us to be summoned here—is forever silenced. It is republican in all its features and just in all its details. It enables every man to be equally represented every year of his life. Anything short of this, is neither republican nor just. Everything points in this direction. Sooner or later we shall, and must adopt the district system. Gentlemen affect to doubt if the people are ready for it, and present to the Convention the disagreeable alternative of the existing provisions or the plan before us. In my judgment the people are not only ready for the district system, but are expecting it from us.

Mr. President, let me for a moment glance at the plan proposed by the gentleman from Lowell, (Mr. Butler,) for the limited period allowed under the vote just adopted, will enable me only to glance at it.

Friday,]

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.—BEACH—KINGMAN—MORTON—BUTLER—BOUTWELL.

[July 1st.

When the debate was first opened on this subject, the gentleman for Erving, (Mr. Griswold,) portrayed to us the unequal and unjust provisions of the Constitution, in terms well calculated to arouse the Convention into a remedy which should cure the evil. That gentleman gave us as a remedy, a system ten fold more unequal and unjust. This was soon abandoned for the plan now before us, (Mr. Butler's,) which is termed a compromise between town representation and the district system. This too, is unequal, and consequently unjust. It surrenders at once into the hands of less than one-third of the people of this Commonwealth the right to elect a majority of the representatives in the popular or most numerous branch of the government. This is its operation now, the moment it is ratified by the people. It is infinitely more unequal and unjust than the present provisions. But its worst feature is its prospective operation. No one can calculate with certain accuracy the extent of this inequality ten and twenty years hence. But, Sir, from the best calculations I can make, this plan will give to about one-fourth of the people of this Commonwealth, according to the estimated census of 1860, the election of a majority of representatives; and in 1870, seventeen years hence, about one-fifth of the people will elect a majority of the representatives. This is the remedy offered, this is the cure for the inequality and injustice of the present system.

Constituted as this Convention is, it may find favor here, but gentlemen should not forget that whatever is agreed upon here, has to pass another ordeal infinitely more searching and more exacting than this. Men are tenacious of their political rights. They are jealous and suspicious of every proposition which surrenders in any degree their natural rights. They cannot be too jealous or too watchful in this respect, for every step in departure from perfect equality is a dangerous step, and is so far a departure from true republican principle.

What is the proposition proposed to be submitted to the people? Not the surrender of a mere privilege, but of a great political right. To abrogate, not in terms, but in fact, the ninth article in the Bill of Rights, which declares that "all the inhabitants of this Commonwealth have an equal right to elect officers and to be elected, for public employments."

Do you think, Sir, the people of Massachusetts are prepared to abolish from the Bill of Rights this article, and to surrender the great political right of electing and being elected? If they are just and true to themselves they will not. I go further, Sir. I maintain that we have no right, moral or political, to make this surrender for ourselves, much less for our children and their posterity.

I am aware that gentlemen have again and again declared on this floor that political inequality is not injustice, is not anti-republican, is not violative of the spirit of the Declaration of Independence and our Bill of Rights. If it be so, then, Sir, I have learned my moral and political creed to no purpose.

But, Sir, the plan of the gentleman from Lowell is not only more unequal than the present provision, which is its great objection, but it increases the present size of the House, already twice as large as it should be.

There is but one effectual remedy for all these evils, and that is the plan, or something like the plan, submitted by the gentleman from Taunton, (Mr. Morton,) amended as I propose.

I have prepared a table showing the operation of this plan in the several counties. Seven hundred voters is the basis for each representative. Fractions are omitted:—

Suffolk,	32	Reps.,	or 1 to every	4,773	inhab.
Essex,	35	"	1	"	3,633
Middlesex,	39	"	1	"	3,993
Worcester,	34	"	1	"	3,514
Hampshire,	11	"	1	"	3,116
Hampden,	14	"	1	"	3,587
Franklin,	10	"	1	"	3,088
Berkshire,	14	"	1	"	3,495
Norfolk,	20	"	1	"	3,872
Bristol,	19	"	1	"	3,946
Plymouth,	18	"	1	"	3,027
Barnstable,	10	"	1	"	3,399
Dukes,	1	"	1	"	4,416
Nantucket,	2	"	1	"	4,389

261

These tables show at a glance the just and equal operation of this plan throughout the Commonwealth. It reduces the House to a reasonable size. It favors no party or section of the State.

I fear it is to share here the fate of other plans presented, but I trust gentlemen will not reject it they have at least examined it.

Mr. PHINNEY, for Chatham. I rise to inquire if it is in order to move to lay the Orders of the Day upon the table?

The PRESIDENT. It is not.

Mr. PHINNEY. Then I move to extend the time of adjournment, for this day, from one to two o'clock.

The question was taken, and there were, on a division—ayes, 125; noes 142.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. KINGMAN, of West Bridgewater. I rise to ask if it is in order to move to strike out the number "two hundred and sixty-one," and insert in lieu thereof "three hundred and twenty?"

The PRESIDENT. The rule of the Convention in filling blanks, gives to any member the liberty of proposing amendments in that respect: If the gentlemen proposes a larger number it will be stated by the Chair.

Mr. BEACH. I accept the amendment.

Mr. MORTON, of Taunton. I rise for the purpose of making a personal explanation. I understood the gentleman from Lowell charged me with introducing this proposition with the view of delaying and embarrassing the action of this Convention.

Mr. BUTLER. I said, and I repeat, that the introduction of this proposition was calculated to embarrass the business of the Convention, an almost precisely similar proposition having been voted down. That was what I said. I made no imputation as regards intention, for that would have been unparliamentary. I leave that to every man's conscience.

Mr. MORTON. Then I have nothing further to say in relation to it. Gentlemen of the Convention will judge of my course, whether I have attempted to do anything to delay and embarrass the business of the Convention. I desire to say, however, that in offering this amendment, containing, as it did, blanks. I not only followed what I believe to be a parliamentary course, but the most parliamentary course that could be adopted.

Mr. BUTLER, (interposing). I rise to a question of order. If the gentleman is making a personal explanation, I have no objection; but if what he is saying is argument, I do object, unless I can have an opportunity of replying.

The PRESIDENT. The Convention has given the gentleman leave to make a personal explanation, and it is for him to judge what that personal explanation shall be. The Chair thinks the gentleman from Taunton is not travelling out of the latitude allowed him.

Mr. MORTON. I thought an insinuation was made, of which gentlemen will judge, that the blanks which were left in my amendment were left there for the purpose of embarrassing the Convention, and leading them into difficulty. All I wish is, to disclaim any such intention for this and every other action of mine during the session. I adopted that course because I thought the Convention would rather decide how the blanks should be filled, and because I thought it was the most parliamentary course which could be adopted. I was willing that the Convention should fill the blanks with whatever qualification and whatever ratio they thought proper. I have been requested to accept the amendments which have been proposed for filling the blanks, but I do not think I have the power now, and I prefer that the sense of the Convention should be taken upon that question.

Mr. KINGMAN, from West Bridgewater. It has been suggested to me that it would be better to modify the amendment which the gentleman from Springfield has been kind enough to accept, so as to provide that the House shall not consist of less than three hundred, nor more than three hundred and twenty. I suggest that modification, if the gentleman from Springfield is willing to accept it.

Mr. BEACH, of Springfield. I cannot accept that, and upon the whole, I prefer that my amendment should stand as I first offered it, with the number of two hundred and sixty-one.

Mr. KINGMAN. Then I move to substitute for that number not less than three hundred, nor more than three hundred and twenty.

Mr. MORTON, of Taunton. I rise to a question of order. Is that amendment in order?

The PRESIDENT. It is not. The gentleman can move to fill it with any specific number, if he pleases.

Mr. KINGMAN. I move then to fill the blank with three hundred and twenty.

Mr. BOUTWELL, for Berlin. I am opposed to the amendment because I am opposed to the whole proposition, and because I do not desire that the plan submitted by the gentleman from Taunton should be perfected, which is substantially an abolition of town representation. It seems to me, that although there may be some difference of opinion as to the precise application of the principle, a large majority of this Convention are in favor of sustaining town representation, and, therefore, I am opposed to the perfecting of any plan which leads to the abolition of this system, and this plan certainly does lead to its abolition. It is a district system with a basis, I think, substantially the same as that proposed by the gentleman from Boston, (Mr. Schouler,) that of legal voters. Well, Sir, having had the judgment of the Convention upon a plan analogous to this, if not precisely the same, I do not think it worth while to perfect any other plan that leads to the same result. I see no difference between this plan and the one upon which the Convention last voted, except that the plan of the gentleman from Boston was a general one, and this goes into details. It is entirely immaterial so far as the character of the plan is concerned, whether we district the State by county lines, or by any other rule, if the basis of representation be that of legal voters. And if the plan reported by the Committee of the Whole as amended, shall stand as the judgment of the Convention, I think it will be in the power of its friends, when it shall again come upon its final passage, to show that in every particular, so far as regards legal voters, and so far as regards the rights of every individual in the Commonwealth, it is substantially just. It may operate to produce slight inequalities in some sections, but it is substantially just. If it cannot stand upon the principle of justice, with my consent, it shall not stand at all. Therefore, I desire now to say that the plan reported by the Committee of the Whole, if it shall meet the approval, finally, as I believe it will, of the Convention, may be sustained upon the principle of justice, while it maintains the principle of town representation, and I am opposed to the perfecting of any plan that shall look to the abolition of that town representation.

Mr. MORTON, of Taunton. At the request of gentlemen round me, I am willing to accept the amendment of the gentleman from Springfield, that the first blank shall be filled with the number two hundred and sixty-one, and that the second and third blanks shall be filled with the words "legal voters."

Mr. HATHAWAY, of Freetown. I regret that the number had not been left a blank so that we might have taken the question upon the naked proposition of the gentleman from Taunton, whether the State shall be districted as first presented. And now with reference to county lines of which the gentleman for Berlin spoke, I remark that it is a matter which the Convention can hereafter settle, if the proposition for districts shall be adopted, as it pleases. Whether county lines shall or shall not be regarded in the formation of districts. It is in this stage of the subject a matter of no consequence to me, so long as the principle is adopted. We can, hereafter, amend the proposition, if county lines should not be regarded.

Mr. BUTLER, of Lowell. I rise to a question of order. I understand that the time for debate allowed under the rule of the Convention upon this proposition has been consumed by the gentleman from Taunton and myself. I object, therefore, to the gentleman from Freetown, (Mr. Hathaway,) proceeding, unless I can have an opportunity to reply.

The PRESIDENT. The gentleman from Lowell, (Mr. Butler,) did not speak his ten minutes. He only spoke five minutes, and there are five minutes left for any one else to occupy. The Chair, therefore, thinks the gentleman from Freetown is perfectly in order.

Mr. HATHAWAY. I see the moment has arrived for adjournment, and as I suppose I can occupy more time in the afternoon, I move that the Convention do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to and the Convention accordingly adjourned till this afternoon at three o'clock.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The Convention reassembled at three o'clock.

Adjournment.

Mr. BRIGGS, of Pittsfield, moved that when the Convention adjourn, it adjourn to meet on Wednesday next, at nine o'clock, A. M. Mr. Briggs remarked, that he desired to give the country members an opportunity to go home during the coming anniversary, and had made the motion with the view of giving them time for that, as well as to attend to their own private affairs.

Mr. GRISWOLD, for Erving, said he hoped the gentleman from Pittsfield, would withdraw the motion, and allow the Orders of the Day to be taken up, otherwise he should feel constrained to move to lay it upon the table. He was satisfied that it would give rise to a long discussion. The Convention was now ready to take the vote upon the questions involved in the subject first in the Orders of the Day, and he thought we had better proceed at once to their consideration. If the members from the country were interested in the question of adjournment, they would remain and dispose of it in the evening. He appealed to the gentleman to withdraw the motion.

Mr. BRIGGS said he could not consent to withdraw the motion. He was satisfied it would give rise to no debate, and he hoped the gentleman for Erving would not make the motion to lay it on the table. It would require but a moment to dispose of it.

Mr. GRISWOLD said, that whenever the motion was to be acted upon, he had an amendment to propose. If the gentleman was anxious to press his motion at this time, he would move his amendment now, though if any discussion should arise upon it, he gave notice that he should move to lay it on the table. He moved that the word "Wednesday" be stricken out, and that "Tuesday, at ten o'clock, A. M." be substituted. The question was taken and the amendment of the gentleman for Erving, was adopted—ayes, 126; noes, 58.

The motion as amended, was then agreed to.

On motion of Mr. BREED, of Lynn, the Convention then proceeded to the consideration of the Orders of the Day.

The PRESIDENT stated that the first business in the Orders of the Day, was the consideration of the Report of the Committee of the Whole upon

The Basis of Representation.

The question pending being upon the adoption of the substitute offered by the gentleman from Taunton, (Mr. Morton,) as modified by himself. Mr. HATHAWAY, of Freetown. When the gentleman from Lowell, (Mr. Butler,) interrupted me, this morning, I was proceeding to say that in reference to the matter of districting the Commonwealth by county lines, according to the plan proposed in this proposition, it is a matter that may be provided for hereafter, if the proposition should be accepted by the Convention, in a manner that would prove most acceptable to all parties.

But, inasmuch as the gentleman from West Bridgewater, (Mr. Kingman,) has made the motion to fill the blank for the number of representatives in the House, with the number three hundred and twenty, I desire to state what would be the effect if three hundred and twenty shall be the number of representatives, and their election based upon the legal voters, that being the basis which I prefer. The gentleman from Springfield, (Mr. Beach,) stated what would be the effect of adopting the number two hundred and sixty-one. Now, if the Convention should adopt three hundred and twenty as their number, it would give the following result:—

There is, Sir, a loss of the fractions in part in this statement, but it is substantially correct; and the gentleman from Lowell, in his dear Middlesex, would lose ten representatives and a fraction over; and Plymouth County, with a House of three hundred and twenty members, would have a fraction over her present representation in a House of three hundred and seventy-three members. The rural districts would generally gain in their relative power in this branch of the government, while the commercial and manufacturing districts would lose.

Now, Sir, gentlemen have said, in reference to this matter, that taxation and representation ought to go together. Well, Sir, I really have had to restrain myself from the temptation to offer a proposition that each town should be required to pay towards such State taxes as may be hereafter assessed, in proportion to its representation—so that taxation and representation might go hand in hand, and thus be equalized.

Now, Sir, a word in reference to the statement made by my honorable friend for Berlin, (Mr. Boutwell). That gentleman said he had no doubt that the proposition of the gentleman from Lowell, as amended, would be just to all portions of the State. Sir, gentlemen may cipher it out for themselves. I do not say that it would not be just, but there is, at least, a doubt upon that subject in the minds of many, even of its friends. Now, Sir, the proposition of the gentleman from Taunton is just and equal. No one doubts it for a moment; and I would submit, whether it would not be better to take it upon that ground, rather than to take another upon the same ground, but in relation to which there is at least a doubt?—

Here the hammer fell; the time allotted for debate under the order of the Convention having expired.

Mr. BEACH, of Springfield. I move to strike out "two hundred and sixty-one," and insert "three hundred and twenty."

Mr. MORTON, of Taunton. I am afraid that my proposition will fare very much like the parson's wig—there will be so much clipped from it, that I shall not be able to recognize it. My sole object is to test the question for the district representation; and although I am in favor of the small towns, I am very willing to agree to the proposition of the gentlemen from Springfield, (Mr. Beach).

Mr. DAVIS, of Plymouth. I rise to make an inquiry of the gentleman from Taunton. I understand him to say that he offers this proposition as a test question concerning the district system. I wish to ask him, Mr. President, whether, by testing the question for district representation, he means the district system in the abstract, or the district system founded upon voters, as against the amendment of the gentleman from Lowell, (Mr. Butler).

The PRESIDENT. The Chair must suggest to the gentleman that debate is precluded by order of the Convention. The question which the gentleman asks is in the nature of debate.

Mr. DAVIS. I understood the gentleman to say that it was a test question. I only ask for what purpose it is made a test.

The PRESIDENT. The gentleman is not in order, and the Chair must enforce the rules.

The yeas and nays having been ordered the question was then taken upon Mr. Morton's amendment, and the result was—yeas, 119; nays, 196—as follows:—

Absent and not voting, 104.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HALE, of Boston. I wish to ask the attention of the Convention to an amendment refused by the Committee of the Whole. It was offered in Convention before they went into Committee of the Whole upon this subject, by myself, with the concurrence of ten members of the Committee. It was made a subject of consideration in Committee of the Whole, but was voted down there. No vote has been taken upon it in Convention. I move it as an amendment to the amendment reported by the Committee of the Whole.

The PRESIDENT. As this is a substitute for the amendment, the Chair rules that it can be received only by unanimous consent.

Objection was made.

Mr. WHITNEY, of Conway. I rise to make a motion which I feel very reluctant to make. I believe we have arrived at that point of time.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair must inform the gentleman that debate is not in order.

Mr. WHITNEY. I move the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The PRESIDENT. The Convention having ordered the main question, the first question is upon the amendment reported by the Committee of the Whole, and contained in document No. 65, being the amendment offered by the gentleman from Lowell, (Mr. Butler).

Mr. WEEKS, of Harwich, demanded the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. HATHAWAY. I ask for a division of the question, as I would like to get an independent vote upon the last proposition.

The PRESIDENT. The question will first be taken by yeas and nays, upon the 1st, 2d, 3d, and 4th resolves. The Secretary proceeded to call the roll, and the vote stood—yeas, 206; nays, 112—as follows:—

And the resolves were adopted.

The question recurred on the passage of the remaining portion of the resolves, and being taken, there were, upon a division—ayes, 189 : noes, 27.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The resolves were then ordered to a second reading.

Mr. BOUTWELL, for Berlin. I move that the resolves as amended, be printed, and their further consideration be made the Order of the Day for Wednesday next, at half past ten o'clock, A. M.

The motion was agreed to.

Reconsideration.

Mr. WILSON, of Natick. I see that the two gentlemen are here, on whose account the subject of the reconsideration of the vote on the final passage of the third resolve in Document No. 30, relating to the Secretary, Treasurer, &c., was laid upon the table. Those gentlemen, the gentleman for Manchester, (Mr. Dana,) and the gentleman from Lenox, (Mr. Bishop,) being now present, I move that the motion for the reconsideration of the vote, by which that resolve was passed, be taken up for consideration.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT. The resolves are those reported by the Committee to whom was referred so much of the Constitution as relates to Secretary, Treasurer, and Attorney-General, &c. The resolves were ordered to their final passage on the 13th of June. On the 14th of June, the gentleman for Manchester, (Mr. Dana,) moved the reconsideration of the vote by which the Convention had passed the third resolve, and the question is on the motion to reconsider that vote.

Mr. DANA. Mr. President, this is not a very favorable time to occupy the attention of the Convention, for our minds are exhausted with the subject we have just been considering, and this is far less interesting; but I would like to have the favorable attention of the House for a few moments, upon Document No. 30, which is now before the Convention. The last resolve but one of that document is as follows:—

Resolved, That Judges of Probate, Clerks of the Courts, Commissioners of Insolvency, District Attorneys, Registers of Deeds, County Treasurers and County Commissioners, be elected triennially, by the people of their respective counties and districts.

I asked for the reconsideration of that resolution, for certain reasons which I will take the liberty of now placing before the Convention. The Convention will perceive that it is purposed to make the district attorneys and clerks of the courts elective, as well as the judges of probate, and to elect them once in every three years; and the sheriffs also are to be elected once in three years. I would like, first, to ask the attention of the Convention to the subject of the election of the sheriffs. The Constitution of Massachusetts is divided into three departments: legislative, judicial and executive. The governor is responsible for the executive department. He is the great executive officer, and his duty is to see to the execution of the laws. 'It is nothing, Mr. President, to have laws passed by the legislature, and it is nothing to have laws interpreted by the court. If they are not executed what are they good for? And what are they made for but to be executed? The governor is to see to the execution of the laws, and, to a great extent, the sheriff in each county is the active executive officer. The duty of the sheriff is not by any means limited to the serving of writs and processes between man and man, but in the exigencies of a State, when the very existence of a State is at stake, in times of insurrection and civil disturbance, these great crises which are liable to occur—for in times of perfect quietness you can get along without any government, almost—in times of storm, of peril, then the sheriff and his deputies are the chief executive officers of the county. Now it strikes me that these sheriffs should be persons over whom the governor, as the chief executive officer of the Commonwealth, should possess some control. Imagine an army, with officers in the field over whom the commanding officer possessed no control. If the officer is unfaithful or timid in a moment of danger, and fails to discharge his duties, the commanding officer ought to have the power to remove or suspend him immediately; and there never was an army in the world where that power did not exist. Now I submit to the judgment of every gentleman in this Convention, whether that should not be the case in regard to sheriffs? Whether the governor ought not to have power to put his hand on an unfaithful sheriff in a moment, to remove him from office, or suspend him? Now you have adopted, or you will adopt, a provision by which a sheriff can hold his office for a term of three years, in spite of the governor, whatever his conduct may be, subject to nothing but impeachment; and that remedy, of course, would be too late. Now I put it to the judgment of every gentleman here, what he thinks of the action of an unfaithful sheriff in a time of peril, being entirely independent of the chief executive officer of the Commonwealth. He will say that he was elected for three years, that his time is not out, and that he cannot be touched. You have not conferred upon your governor power to remove him, and he has not the power even to suspend him, or to appoint a temporary sheriff in his place. Here you put the entire executive power of the State, in times of peril, in the hands of a sheriff and his deputies, who are entirely independent of the governor. Now I cannot believe that this Convention means to do any such thing. I admit that the exigency is not likely to occur, and I pray that it may never occur, when we may want a sheriff to aid in sustaining an unpopular law, at the peril of his life or fortunes. But it may occur; and, when we are laying the foundations of government, we should lay them so that they will stand in times of danger. We should not be like the man who builds his house upon the sand, and thinks it well enough because it happens to be fine weather the day when he lays the foundation.

Mr. CHAPIN, of Worcester. If I may make a suggestion, I wish to state, that I understand the motion to reconsider was to reconsider the vote by which the first resolve was passed.

Mr. DANA. I intended to have my motion apply to all the resolves.

Mr. CHAPIN. The election of sheriffs is provided for in the first resolve.

Mr. DANA. I supposed the motion related to the whole of the resolves.

The PRESIDENT. If that was the motion, there has been a mistake in the record; but if there is no objection, the Chair will so state it.

Mr. DANA. It may be that I did not look carefully enough into the details of the resolutions, but I meant to include the portion which related to the sheriffs.

Mr. BRIGGS. I will state, that soon after the motion was made, the gentleman for Manchester suggested to me that he had made the motion in the form which he now suggests.

Mr. BATES, of Plymouth. It appears to me there can be no question about this matter. The gentleman for Manchester, in the first place, discussed the matters contained in the third resolution for two or three hours—

The PRESIDENT. The question is, the Chair would suggest, whether the record is made correctly, whether the gentleman for Manchester moved the reconsideration of the vote by which the resolves were put on their final passage. If there is no objection made, inasmuch as the gentleman for Manchester states that that was his proposition, the Chair will state that the question is upon the reconsideration of the vote by which the resolves were put upon their final passage.

Mr. DANA. I will not undertake to say that that was the form in which I put the motion, but that was my intent. I hope the Convention will not regard the consideration of this question as needless.

You have made no provision authorizing the governor either to remove or to suspend these executive officers. It strikes me that it is an oversight. I am not opposed to the election of the Sheriffs by the people triennially, so much as I am to their being entirely independent of the governor, in his office of the chief executive of the State.

Mr. BISHOP, of Lenox. There are resolves which are about to be reported, authorizing the executive officer of the State to remove a sheriff and other officers at any time, for good cause; so that when the resolutions in relation to this subject shall have all come in, it will be seen by the gentleman for Manchester that ample provision is made for the removal of the sheriff in case of any dereliction of duty or malfeasance in office of any kind, and that, too, immediately upon an exhibition of proof made to the executive officer that such malfeasance or any delinquency in duty exists. That is our purpose. But by these resolves we meant to make the sheriffs elective, and proceed no further. We did not intend to make them irresponsible to the executive, subject to no removal in case they departed from their duty; but after being elected by the people, we propose to place them where they should be placed—directly under the control of the executive. If the gentleman for Manchester will wait till those resolves are in and explained, he will find ample provision made for the exigency to which he refers. I do not wish to stop the force of the gentleman's argument, however.

SECRETARY, TREASURER, &c. — DANA — SUMNER.

[July 1st.

Mr. DANA. I am much obliged to the gentleman. He has answered my objection entirely. I have no objection to the mode at all. I would ask whether any provision is made to authorize the courts to suspend a clerk under similar circumstances.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair would suggest that any reference to the course of committees, is not proper at the present time.

Mr. BISHOP. Provision is made for the removal of all officers in case of delinquency of duty. With regard to the particular case to which the gentleman refers, I will not determine. When the matter is presented—and it is already presented—the objection of the gentleman may possibly be obviated.

Mr. DANA. I will take the liberty to suggest that there would be propriety in giving the judges of the courts power to remove a clerk, in case he should refuse to sign a paper or fix a seal to a document, in the same manner that there would be in giving power to the governor to remove a sheriff.

I was so unfortunate as not to be present when the subject of the Judges of Probate was under discussion, and I do not know but that what I am about to say on that subject, has been already presented in a better manner than I am able to present it. But I think that the time when that subject was under discussion, was the only whole day that I have been absent from the Convention since its commencement, except I was prevented from attendance by sickness, and I would like very much to impress again on the minds of gentlemen, the importance of the office of the Judge of Probate. I do not object so much to his election as to his re-election. That is, I object to the Judge of Probate being a candidate for the office as often as once in three years. It is not the source from which he obtains his power to which I object, but it is to his being dependent upon influential persons for the renewal of his office. I cannot agree with my learned friend from Lenox, (Mr. Bishop,) that the first requisite of a Judge of Probate is urbanity. I do not know, in fact, that he considers it the first requisite; but the very highest requisite of a Judge of Probate in my opinion should be absolute integrity and then we should clothe him with power to maintain his integrity. He must start honest, and you must keep him honest. It is not enough to say you have an honest man, for a knowledge of human nature should teach us not to lead ourselves or others into temptation. A Judge of Probate is clothed with great discretionary power; he has to approve the bonds of all trustees, guardians, executors, and administrators; and he must approve or disapprove officially without fear, favor, affection or hope of reward. He is to examine the accounts of executors, trustees, guardians, and administrators, and he must cut down these accounts if necessary. He must be entirely independent and fearless.

There is another peculiarity in the office of the Judge of Probate. He stands between the strong and the weak. On the one hand are women, children, wards, minors and widows; persons without political power and influence of any kind; and on the other hand are the executors, guardians and trustees, who are the influential men of the county. In other words, the Judge of Probate has to stand and deal with the influential men of the county, with their bonds and accounts on the one side; and on the other he has the powerless and uninfluential persons in the community whom he is to protect. Now, it appears to me you are placing him in circumstances of great temptation. You are putting him in the power, substantially, of these very men upon whom he is to exercise this oversight. I would not put the custody of the estates of minors and helpless people in the charge of those persons who must necessarily look to the powerful for their continuance in office if they are subject to re-election.

It may be said that the people will judge correctly. I have no doubt that they will generally judge correctly when they have the means of doing so. But re-election will depend upon re-nomination, and re-nomination will depend upon a few influential men. When you take the whole State, a few persons have not influence enough to overturn a judge in office; but in a county, some three or four or five active, influential men may prevent the re-nomination of a judge; and the very men who go to the judge with accounts to be approved, are the men on whom he depends for continuance in office.

Now, believing there is this real peril, I suggest that we should protect the judge and these parties who need protection against the powerful. Why make this proposed change? Has there been any complaint made against the present system? I have heard of none. They may be removed by impeachment if they behave badly; and they may be removed by address. It takes no more power to remove a judge than to change a man's name. A simple majority in the two houses of the legislature may do either. I ask gentlemen if this is not enough? If removable by impeachment and by address, is not that enough? We have a judge now, who is entirely independent, and at the same time, he is not irresponsible. He is responsible to both branches of the legislature, and to the Senate on impeachment. He is as responsible as any man can be, and at the same time be independent. You propose, without adding to his responsibility, to diminish his independence. I think there is where we ought to draw the line. I cannot see any objection to judges of probate going on as they have gone on; and I believe the people, when they consider the nature of the office of the judge of probate, as they will consider it, will be perfectly willing that he should remain as he is. I cannot conceive that we have such a determination to vote for officers in all cases as to gratify that purpose at the expense of those persons who are to be placed under the custody of the judge of probate; and it seems to me it would be carrying out the principle of election at the expense of the Commonwealth and of those persons who need to be protected.

I know I present these views under a disadvantage, because under the circumstances of the case, as there has been a discussion once had upon the subject, gentlemen may have made up their minds, and they may think that it is tedious to renew the discussion. But it strikes me to be of importance that the subject should be considered; and I hope the Convention will think with me so far at least as that we shall endeavor to protect the rights of persons who have no other protection than the independence of the judge.

Mr. SUMNER, for Otis. I do not understand, Mr. President, that there is any motion upon this question distinctly before the Convention.

The PRESIDENT. The motion is to reconsider the vote by which the Convention orders the resolves to their final passage.

Mr. SUMNER. And those resolves provide for the election of judges of probate once in three years. I am in favor, Mr. President, of the election of the judges of probate by the people, but I am opposed to that election once in three years as is proposed by the resolutions before us. I think the people of the county in which the judge of probate has his jurisdiction, are pre-eminently qualified to make a selection and elect a judge. I am in favor of extending the time of election beyond the period which is provided in the resolution, which it seems has been passed in the Convention. I prefer to extend the term of the office of judge of probate from three to six years. There is, in my opinion, a very great difference in relation to the election of the judiciary from that of the other officers which are merely ministerial in the character of their offices.

When the office is judicial it of course requires a greater degree of study and examination with regard to the duties which are incumbent upon them; and it requires a longer tenure of office, in my opinion, than that which appertains to officers of a different order. This is peculiarly true in relation to judicial officers. I would not have any judicial office founded upon the same tenure as that of offices of a ministerial character; and in relation to judges of probate, theirs is pre-eminently, from beginning to end a judicial office. There is no doubt about that. It is one of that kind of offices, however, although judicial in its character, the duties of which, may be performed by those who do not belong to legal profession; and this is not true of other judicial offices. This may not be true in relation to the judges of probate in counties embracing cities, where the duties devolving upon the office are of a more complicated nature, owing to the different kinds of business questions which arise in cities; but in the country the duties of the office are more simple, and they may be performed, and indeed they have been performed in some cases, by persons who are not of the legal profession. For instance, in one of the western counties of this State, for more than a quarter of a century, the duties of judge of probate were performed by a gentleman who was not of the legal profession; he was a farmer, but he performed those duties with great skill and ability. But if you limit the tenure of this office to the term of three years, it will be impossible for men who are not of the legal profession, in the town or the country, in the cities or the rural districts, to become sufficiently acquainted in that time with the duties of their office so as to render themselves acceptable to their constituents, or in such a manner as to show their competency, that they can acquire sufficient learning to discharge their duties. I hope, Sir, that the tenure of the office of judge of probate may be fixed at six years instead of three, and I hope therefore, that the motion for reconsideration will prevail.

SECRETARY, TREASURER, &c.—HILLARD—SUMNER—BUTLER.

[July 1st.

Mr. HILLARD, of Boston. I am well aware, Mr. President, that this is not a happy time for addressing the Convention upon any subject; and I should have held my peace now, because I know that there is a wall between the Convention and any speaker, but that I feel so deeply and so strongly upon this matter that I flatter myself that my words and my thoughts may overleap this wall of division. I am opposed to this mode of electing a judge of probate by the people, and I ask the Convention to reconsider their steps on this subject. I am opposed to it not merely because of its operation upon this particular office, but because this is the beginning of an end—because this is an entering wedge which opens the way to the introduction of a principle which I consider fatal to all that is valuable in the judiciary. First of all, I take issue with my brother from Berkshire upon the character of the functions of a judge of probate. I contend that that office requires a particular training and a measure of learning such as ordinarily cannot be acquired except in the legal profession. It is no answer to tell me that here and there a man of an uncommon legal understanding becomes qualified to perform the duties of that office.

Mr. SUMNER, for Otis. If the gentleman will allow me, I will state that I said it required a member of the legal profession to perform the duties of judge of probate in the cities, and especially in the city of Boston; but that in the rural districts a man who was not a member of the legal profession could discharge the duties of the office acceptably, and I gave an illustration to show that this had been done.

Mr. HILLARD. I cannot perceive the difference in principle; the only difference is in the extent of the field on which the accomplishments and training are to operate, and therein there is no difference in principle. I say that in ordinary circumstances a measure of legal learning such as cannot be acquired except by practice at the bar, is requisite for a proper discharge of the functions of a judge of probate; and, Sir, I do not put the scale of general qualifications so low as many gentlemen are disposed to do. I think that the action of a judge of probate is important within his sphere; that sphere, to be sure, is not the very highest. I admit that you do not want eloquence—you do not want original genius or profound learning, although the more learning in a man is better, other things being equal; but what you do want is good sense and experience—you want conscientiousness, and above all you want firmness and independence. Now, Mr. President, I say that the qualifications which enable a man to discharge the functions of a judge of probate are not those which win popular favor and which are likely to secure to a man a liberal harvest of votes. Popularity is the result of a facile character and a flexible nature. That man is a popular man whose sympathies are ready but not deep—who has no deep and strong convictions, such as readily yield to the touch of outward circumstances. A popular man is a man who has no enemies, and in my opinion a man who has no enemies deserves to have no friends. Independence and firmness, Mr. President, are the cardinal virtues of a judge, whether he be judge of the supreme court or judge of probate. Independence is to a judge what courage is to a man, and what chastity is to a woman; it is the guardian virtue that keeps watch over all the rest, and without which we have no security in any other one. The great Sir Thomas Moore, speaking of the motives which guided him, in a discourse to a member of his family, says: "If there came before me, on the one side my father, whom of all men I most love and honor, and on the other the devil, whom of all beings I most hate and abhor, yet if the justice of the case lay with the devil, he should have right at my hands." I do not suppose that the devil will ever appear before a court of probate, either in person or by attorney; but I do submit that there may be occasions which put the virtue of a judge of probate to something of a severe test. I will suppose that on the one side there is a widow, poor, friendless and unprotected; and on the other side a man of powerful influence in the party which has put that judge into office. I will suppose further, that the day of re-election is near at hand, and that his circumstances are such that it is of great importance to him that he should be re-elected. He may have a son at college; he may be about to marry a daughter; he may be building a new house or refurbishing an old one, so that the abstraction of his salary may be felt to be a great inconvenience. With that pressure upon him, perhaps the judge will not yield; if he be an angel he certainly will not yield, but we cannot have angels for five, six, or seven hundred dollars a year. Being a man, with the infirmities and liabilities to temptation of humanity, although I should look forward to the result with something of hope, yet it would also be with something of fear.

But further, Mr. President, I contend that in devolving the selection of the judges of probate upon the executive, we do no more than follow out the analogy which runs through the whole of life, in all our business relations and in our political administration; and that is this: wherever peculiar functions are required, wherever a peculiar training is necessary for the proper discharge of the duties of any office, the selection of that office is devolved upon a smaller body—either upon a particular individual or upon bodies of two or three or more. Take, for instance, this very Convention, with regard to the selection of the committees, to whom we are intrusting all these important questions. Should we have done, so wisely if we had elected them all ourselves? We never could have attained a satisfactory result; but we chose you, Mr. President, and one of the motives that induced us to vote for you was the confidence that we reposed in the discretion which you would exercise in the selection of these committees. By so doing we have done far more wisely than if we had elected them ourselves. How is it managed in a bank? The shareholders come together and choose a board of directors, because their functions are such as most men can discharge; but they do not choose a teller or book-keeper, because peculiar qualifications are required for those stations. The selection of these officers is devolved upon the directors, and by them it is usually given to a smaller committee, upon whom personal responsibility is brought as it were to a focal point; the stockholders in a bank would act with a great want of wisdom if they were to take such things into their own hands. So it is with a railroad corporation. The shareholders select the board of directors, and the directors themselves choose the engineer because his functions require peculiar qualifications.

So, if we should want to select an artist to paint a picture or to carve a statue, would the legislature be wise to make the selection themselves? No! they would devolve it upon a smaller body, and throw such responsibilities upon them as would compel every man of the committee to give his mind seriously and exclusively to the subject.

I am arguing now, upon the supposition that this is a question between the executive and the people; but, Mr. President, it is no such thing. I wonder that any man can ever maintain, with a sober countenance, that such is the case. If the executive were to nominate a committee composed of discreet men in each town and county, that they should come together and choose a judge of probate, I might yield some of my objections. But we know perfectly well that the result of this thing will be that the judge of probate will be nominated by a caucus, and we know perfectly well that the men who will compose that caucus will be men not remarkable for their discretion, not remarkable for their judgment, not remarkable for the amount of interest which they have at stake, but rather remarkable for their zeal and activity, and for the personal interests they have in serving as apprentices and journeymen in the great trade of politics. I submit that if you devolve the nomination of this officer on a body like that, which merely sends forth its edicts and they are conformed to by the people, you will be abandoning an excellent system, one which has always worked well, for one which contains too many dangerous elements for any wise State to adopt it.

I do not know that I have anything further to say. I concur entirely in what has been said by the gentleman for Manchester. I suppose that the result is a foregone conclusion; but in view of the fact that no petition has come up from any part of the State for a change, but all are content with the present system, and in view of the dangers which lie in trying any new path, I will ask this Convention whether, in regard to this officer at least, they will not pause and retrace their steps.

Mr. BUTLER, of Lowell. I wish to say a few words upon this subject, and but a few, because it is a subject that needs not from me, certainly, much talk; but the premises being granted from which, the gentleman from Boston will excuse me if I say, he suggests that men ought to act, I will agree with him that judges ought not to be elected by the people; but, the radical difference between us is, that we disagree upon the premises. He sets out, if I understand him—and I would not do him injustice—with the belief that men ought to act in conformity with the desire of "the hands that feed them." Sir, that puts an end to all independence. I do not set out with that belief, and, therefore, I think that judges may be independent, although elected by the people—and much more independent than if they were appointed; but, even if I agreed with him that a man ought to look to those who feed him for his rules of action, I should still be unwilling to have this judge appointed; for, although I would not expect to have him an angel, yet I think that, on the other hand, a man should have what has been not inaptly expressed a "supremacy over his accidents,"—that he should stand up wholly independent of, and looking beyond any considerations of what may be about him; and believing, Sir, that men will do so, I am constrained to believe that judges of probate may be elected, and yet be reasonably independent men. But, Sir, there seems to have been one thing overlooked by the gentleman for Manchester in his argument; and that is, that the judge of probate is but a subordinate office after all, and in case of corruption, partiality, or any undue influence being allowed to control his actions, those who feel themselves aggrieved can at any time make it the subject of an appeal to the supreme court, as a supreme court of probate is always open and the decision can at once be corrected. On the other hand, his acts of discretion are so guarded that no injury can be done. My friend, who is so well "posted up" in all these matters, to use a cant phrase which I know I ought to be ashamed of—my friend, who so well understands this thing, speaks of the approval of bonds as an instance of the exercise of this discretion. Now, Sir, what earthly inducement can a judge of probate have to approve a bad bond? Will you tell me, Sir, where you can conceive a motive for his doing it? I hold that men will not act wrongly unless they have a motive for it; and it should be constantly remembered that if a judge of probate should be guilty of any improper act in regard to the administration of estates, every decree he may make is examinable in the supreme court, and subject to be reversed by that tribunal.

SECRETARY, TREASURER, &c.—BUTLER—DANA—BISHOP.

Another thing my friend from Boston seems to be afraid of, is that if you make the office of judge of probate elective, it will be an office which will at once come into the political arena, and which will always be subject to change in the incumbency on the occasion of every election. These fears may do very well to speak about, but it so happens that we rarely see them realized; because in this case particularly, the people in the election of such a judge, are looking immediately and at once to their own interests. Let me speak a little from experience in regard to this matter. In the county of Middlesex, in which, as gentlemen know, we carry politics quite as far as is good for ourselves, and certainly a little too far for the benefit of our opponents, the best and most lucrative office in the gift of the people—that of county treasurer—has been held by one man as long as I can remember, and the office is elective annually.

A MEMBER. There have only been two county treasurers in Middlesex during the last thirty years.

Mr. BUTLER. I am reminded by a friend near me that there have only been two treasurers in that county during the last thirty years. At all events, as long as I can remember, that office has been filled by one man; and, pecuniarily considered, it is the best office in the gift of the people of Middlesex. It would be the highest prize in point of remuneration, that a man could win in our county elections; and, although there have been from time to time, nominations of opposition candidates, these nominations have been formal, merely, as the nominees could not secure an election.

—So, also, in regard to our register of deeds; the result at elections has been precisely similar. When the people get a good man, they keep him in office; and so unquestionably it would be with judges of probate. If he is a bad judge the widow and the orphan will be his accusers; if he is a good judge they will be his friends, and his re-election will be secured. If he should abuse his office, then there would be no hope for him, and there ought to be none. He does not and cannot separate himself from the people.

Now, I agree with what was said by the chairman of the Committee—that good manners and unity are requisites which strongly appertain to a judge of any court. I am almost inclined to say that they are the first and most essential requisites—and above all in the case of a judge of probate. Urbanity, good manners, kindness of temper, and a disposition to be obliging as well as just, are among the great prerequisites in any judge, whether high or low. I have seen in my time—and who amongst us has not seen the same thing?—judges who marred their great ability by their want of these qualities, whose lack of them was as notorious as their legal attainments were great; so that while we almost worshipped the lawyer, almost all of us despised the gentleman. These qualities, are doubly requisite in a judge of probate. Why, Sir, the judge of probate in our county has quite spoiled all business in relation to the administration of the estates of the deceased—so far as the profession of the law is concerned—by taking it into his own hands; that is to say, he is ever ready to give the best advice to administrators and widows in regard to their duties. He takes care of the whole of it; does everything honestly and pleasantly; so that, in that business a lawyer is like a fifth wheel to a coach. He sees to it that all the business is properly done, and the legal profession find nothing whatever to do in his court. The gentleman is no particular friend of mine, and there are certainly no personal reasons subsisting between us, why I should pay him a compliment; but what I have said is but just. He is a man of very accomplished manners, and of gentle and obliging disposition; and hence, this is added to business habits and strict integrity. If he has these qualities, and having to appeal to the electors for their suffrages, his re-election would be always a matter of certainty. Besides all this, Sir, I cannot but think that one of the best methods of polishing the manners of some of our judges is to subject their office to the popular vote. "While I am far from believing that it would alter their integrity, I cannot but think it would have the effect of rounding off some of their rough corners, or, to speak in more polished phrase, to smooth some of the asperities of their conduct. I would not sleep less soundly o' nights, nor sell any piece of property I might possess, one cent cheaper, even if our supreme judges were subjected to the ordeal of a popular election annually. I should have no fear of consequences in regard to the common welfare, if all our judges from the highest to the lowest, were made elective—but I have a little fear of the arguments of my friend, (Mr. Dana,) for Manchester. [A laugh.]

Now, to show how much we differ, I will say that I think there is a good deal more danger in making the office of sheriff elective, although that does not appear to strike my friend from Boston, (Mr. Hillard,) as being the case. Yet even in regard to sheriffs, I have no objection to their being made elective. Still he is strictly an executive officer. He has to execute the hard sentence of the law. On him devolves the duty, under the decisions of our courts, not unfrequently to turn the widow and the orphan from their homestead; to seize not only the property, sometimes the persons of men; and, there is in my mind much more danger that he might be subject to influences and biases in the discharge of his duty, in order to secure his re-election than there is in the case of a judge of probate, or any other judge. I trust, therefore, that the motion to reconsider will not prevail if the only object of the motion is that intimated by the gentleman from Boston, to move to amend by making the office of the judge an office for life, or even as desired by my friend for Manchester, to make the tenure of the office a tenure of six years. I do not see that even this latter suggestion would mend the matter at all; for, during the last three years the judge would be in precisely the same position in which we place him by the resolution as it now stands.

In neither case do I think there is any danger in trusting the people with the election of those officers who are to protect their liberties, and take care of their estates. The people themselves, are most interested in these matters, and are the best judges of whom it is proper to trust in the discharge of these important duties.

Mr. BISHOP, of Lenox. The question before the Convention is two-fold; or, rather I should say two questions have been presented by the gentlemen who are opposed to the election of the judges of probate. In the first place they are opposed to the election of these officers by the people; and in the few remarks which I intend to submit to the Convention I shall confine myself strictly to the election of this judicial officer. This matter was fully and deliberately considered by the Committee which had it in charge.

Mr. DANA, for Manchester. Will the gentleman from Lenox allow me to interrupt him one moment for the purpose of explanation?

Mr. BISHOP. Certainly.

Mr. DANA. I did not put my motion on the ground of election in the first instance, but on the question of re-election at the expiration of three years.

Mr. BISHOP. That question has been frequently discussed, and I may say, perhaps, more freely than any other connected with this topic. I was stating that this matter had been under the careful consideration of the Committee, and was not passed upon by them until they had entered into the most scrutinizing investigation of the subject. Sir, what is a judge of probate? He is an officer of limited jurisdiction, and is responsible not only to the people for the faithful discharge of his duty, but amenable also to a higher tribunal to which appeal may be made. Being then a local officer, whose jurisdiction is limited by county lines, the question is, where does the proper legitimate appointing power reside—by whom should it be exercised? Should he be appointed by the people, or by the executive? The Committee thought, and I concurred with them entirely, that the proper legitimate appointing power is the people of the county over which he has jurisdiction and should be by them exercised; and for this reason, the people of the county are supposed to be intimately acquainted with every prominent individual within the county qualified for the office. They are presumed, and not without good reason, to know the qualifications of those who may be proposed as candidates for the office; and I venture to say, that there is not a county in this Commonwealth whose inhabitants are not intimately acquainted with the character and learning, integrity and accuracy in business, of any individual who may be proposed as such candidate. The executive is not, and from the very nature of things cannot be, thus well advised of the most fit and suitable persons to fill such positions. He may be a wise and good man; his acquaintance with the people of the Commonwealth may be extensive; he may be acquainted with all the prominent professional men in the Commonwealth; and possibly may be better able than the people to select judges of the supreme court, and other judges having general jurisdiction, but I deny that this is the case in reference to judges of probate. The people of the several counties know the qualifications of their men for this office better than anybody else can know them; they know better than anybody else who is competent to discharge the duties of this office—and I admit that these duties are very important ones—therefore, I contend that the appointing power is well and wisely left to remain in the people themselves—in other words, the power being originally in its full extent with them, this is a proper case in which they should directly exercise it.

SECRETARY, TREASURER, &c.—BISHOP.

One word further? What is the objection to this? It is this—judges made elective are dependent. I deny this. It is an unsupported assertion. No connection between the premises and conclusion is shown. On the contrary, I contend that, if they are made elective, they are made independent, so far as the discharge of their duties and the maintenance of their integrity are concerned. I do not admit that they must necessarily be “popular men” in the low sense which has been given to that phrase by my friend from Boston. They must most certainly be popular men; but in order to this they must be independent. They should be anything but “facile or obsequious” men—for I can assure my friend that “facile and obsequious” men are not popular with the people. The independent men, who are the friends of the people, and whom the people befriend. The independent, who are such because they are firm and intelligent, are the men who command the people's votes—the men who stand true to their principles. These are the men who are respected and supported by the people, and the “facile” are the men whom the people despise, and whose honesty they distrust and whose services they reject—men quite as little trusted and quite as much despised by the people as they would be by my friend from Boston himself. No, Sir, these men will never become the elect of the people. The firm and independent men will be their elect—men who discharge their duty fearlessly. The slight acquaintance which I have with the people justifies and vindicates this opinion; and, if my friend from Boston will mingle a little more with the people, my word for it, he will exercise a more charitable and just view in relation to them.

Now, Sir, what further? It is said that in the probate courts the strong and the weak come in conflict with each other. I do not understand what is meant by the strong and the weak in this respect; but I admit that the widow is weak; that the orphan is weak; and that the guardian and administrator may be strong and influential men. If these parties come in conflict, any individual who is to judge between them thinks to secure himself in his office by yielding to the temptations which may be offered him by the stronger, I can assure him who thinks by such yielding to remain quietly in place, that he will find himself most deplorably mistaken. Everything officially done in his office is placed upon the record; and if a widow is wronged by an executor or administrator, that wrong becomes known, and that widow is stronger in her wrongs, than the strongest man armed. Let it once be known that she is injured by unrighteous judgment, and she immediately acquires a strength and power which neither wealth nor influence can impart. If she is wronged these records show it; and weak as the widow and the orphan may be, their interests are not only under the supervision of their guardians and administrators, but of their friends and relatives, who watch those guardians and administrators, and will soon discover and understand full well if any injustice has been done; and, if it has been done, the whole matter will be on the record; and that record will be disclosed to the people, and known by every-body interested, and become the death warrant of any judge of probate shown by it to have departed from the right line of his duty.

Sir, gentlemen mistake in regard to this matter. Place the judge of probate under the supervision of the people of his county. Make him answerable to them, and not to an executive who is nominated by a caucus, and elected by a party; make him answerable to those whose business he is transacting; make him answerable to the widow who has strength in her tears, to the orphan who has strength in his weakness, and to the friends of both, who feel bound by every consideration of consanguinity and duty to look to their interests. And election ahead, and his eligibility to re-election, will form the strongest inducement which can be presented to the judge of probate, not to pervert judgment, but to show himself the fearless, uncorrupted and incorruptible friend of the widow and the fatherless.

I go further, Sir. The people of their own counties know their own men full well. There is no one of prominence enough to be selected for any county office, who is not either well known personally, or by reputation, by every man of the county. His capacity, integrity, and fitness for the office for which he is selected, will be thoroughly canvassed, examined and discussed. Close inquiry will be made, and if he cannot stand its scrutiny, he will be rejected—certainly, inevitably rejected. There are no political services which he may have rendered, that will save him. The people see clearly the difference which often exists between the wishes of partizan leaders and their own interests,—between the claims of political adventurers, and their own right and claims to be faithfully and ably served. They will never stop to inquire whether the candidate has been an active organ of his party, till after they have determined whether he be fit to serve them in the important work of the office. False, dishonest, and incapable men, never have been, and never will be popular favorites. They may occasionally steal the march of the people, but are sure of being reached and sent back again to obscurity, if not disgrace. In almost every county in the State, will be found officials, who have sat quietly in their places amidst all the shifts and violence of party; caucus nominations and chicanery have never been able to displace them. The approbation and confidence of the people have been their safeguard and reward, as I trust they always will be, of inflexible uprightness and tried capacity. When the people shall have been bereft of the love of virtue and intelligence, and the intuitions which perceive, and the sound sense which justly estimate them, then, and not till then, should they transfer their appointing power to agents and attorneys.

In relation to the judge of probate, there is a security, which the records of the probate jurisdiction furnish. No executor can defraud the legatees of his testator,—no administrator can wrong the widow and heirs of his intestate, if it be seen to, that the estate effects and credits are placed upon the inventory, the accounts are fairly stated, and the records accurately kept. Those who have the administration of property of deceased persons, are constantly under the supervision of watchful creditors and jealous expectants. No decree, affecting the interest of every one, is passed till after due notice, and not only the doings of the administrative agents, but the orders and decrees of the judge in relation thereto, are matters of careful inspection. There is no danger from the sources which the gentleman has suggested.

I fully agree with my friend for Otis, (Mr. Sumner,) that every man is not competent, although a man of good sense, to discharge the duties of judge of probate as they should be discharged. These duties have become various and complicated, and are becoming more and more so, as business and social relationships increase in number and complexity. A capacity and talent to examine long and involved accounts,—to detect the errors which often occur in such accounts, and so to classify the statements, that they may be easily seen and fully understood, are very necessary to this officer. If he be not a lawyer, an intimate acquaintance with those branches of the law which relate to the construction of wills, the duties of executors, guardians, and trustees, the marshalling and distribution of assets, &c., is indispensable. These are matters which require a sound judgment, no little learning, and a good deal of critical examination. Now, I ask, will the people of the several counties, who are so directly and largely interested in the able and faithful discharge of these duties, be likely to select either careless, or dishonest, or incapable men to perform them. Will they be controlled in any considerable degree, by political considerations in their selections? When they become so reckless, so wild; so insane, as to throw away their regard for a good name after death, and their love and affection for their children, they may do so; but not till then. Instances are by no means rare, they are very frequent indeed, where political considerations have been entirely absorbed by the much greater considerations of faithfulness and capacity. That this will be the case in relation to all officers to whom are committed the charge and control of the business of the people, I have no doubt. It is unwise, in my opinion, for the people to make an assignment of their appointing power, in any case, where they have the opportunity and ability to exercise it themselves. All human experience shows that agencies to create agencies, are avoided by prudent men, and associations of men, whenever they can be. It is a trust-power which cannot be prudently transferred and imparted. The mass is governed by the same motives which direct the individual. That business should not only be done, but well done, is quite as important, and quite as much regarded, in the one case as the other. The people would no sooner appoint to an important office, where the candidates are known, and their qualifications canvassed, a man unsuited to it, than my friend from Boston, had he a temple to erect, would select for the drawings of the plan and the supervision of their execution, an ordinary house-carpenter from the country. The people will act very much as he would—select the very best man they can find. As with individuals in this respect, so with the people in mass. It is said that this will be made a purely political matter. Party politics may enter into it, but, I believe, to no dangerous or mischievous extent. I have satisfaction in the conviction that the people, collectively, care very much less about party organization, and party victory, than of the public good and prosperity. Indeed, if I mistake not, in local matters, the time is at-hand, if not now, when the first inquiry will be, not to what party he the candidate belongs, but who is he, what sort of man, and what he does believe in—is he morally trust-worthy? It is to draw these county officers as far away from politics and its agitations as they can be taken, that I would make them elective. They are now subjects of executive appointment. Who is the executive? Is he no partizan? Was he not thrown out of the boiling chaldron of party strife? Is he not the product of party fermentation? Is he not often both the cause and the effect of party bitterness and violence? Is the standard bearer of the party influenced by no party considerations in his appointments to offices of trust and honor? Will he not do what he has promised to do, and for which he was chosen? Does the history of the past leave a lingering doubt? No, Sir; a man nominated by a caucus, puffed by caucus appointees for that purpose, sustained by one party, opposed bitterly by the other, will be true to his prejudices, true to the expectations which he has raised, until the standard of political morality becomes more elevated than it is at present. Hit or miss, he will discharge his obligations to his friends, and it may be often irrespective of the interests of the people. I concede, that he may pick out, if he can discover him, the very best man of his own party. He can go no further, without incurring the disapprobation, and may be the bitter vituperation and vindictive persecution of his political friends. The people are not thus straightened and circumscribed. They can, if they will, and they will if they can, select from any and all parties the man of their choice,—and who can cite them to account? Their appointee is independent, not an appointee accountable to an appointee compelled to answer over. Such, Sir, is the appointing power, and such the appointments, which your Committee would have.

A word, Mr. President, in relation to the tenure of county and district officers.

The Committee have reported in favor of their election triennially. I do not regard this particular limitation as a very important matter. It may be enlarged without affecting the principle which governed your Committee; yet, I think, the period recommended a proper and judicious one, and, perhaps, the wisest limitation which can be made, not because the judge of probate, whose term is sought to be enlarged, will become thoroughly and intimately acquainted with all the duties of his office in the course of a year or two, but because in the time limited in the report his capacity and fitness can be ascertained, and if the people have made a mistaken choice, if they discover they have selected a man for the office, incompetent to the discharge of its duties, or unqualified in any respect, or faithless to the trusts committed to him, they may have an opportunity to rectify the mistake. Three years is long enough to test and try him in, and if he be found wanting, the people should not be required, he should not require them, to endure him longer.

If, on the other hand, he be found learned, faithful, capable and competent to the discharge of his duties, and I will also add,—though perhaps of less moment,—if he be found courteous and gentle, kind and friendly to the widow and the orphan, over whom, by law, he is appointed the overseer; if he do not repulse them by an impatient frown, as they approach him, but meets them with the sympathetic cordiality which should characterize their legal protector and guardian; he will be selected over and over again. It has been my pleasure, for a quarter of a century, to look on such judges, and no other; to admire, and covet, too, as one of the things most worth living for—the love, confidence, and respect which they received. I would ask for no other earthly reward, no higher felicity, than the thanks and gratitude of the widows and orphans of the dead, who have been faithfully looked after and kindly cared for, and I venture to predict that, he who now exercises the probate jurisdiction in my own county of high hills and large hearts, will sit where he is just so long as he chooses to do so.

When the people have found a man popular,—in the sense in which I would use that word, not popular in the sense given to it by my friend from Boston, that is, a facile man, fawning and obsequious to the people,—when they have found a man straight, erect, capable, prompt, always ready and willing to discharge his duties, they will stick to him, re-elect him, and never, till obliged, incur the hazards of change. How is it with our sergeant-at-arms, now in this town? He has stayed here for years, amidst all the changes and agitations of party, and why? Because he is the very man to perform the duties of that office which he fills to the entire satisfaction of all men, cliques, and parties; and here, I venture to say, he will stay, if God spares him, legislature after legislature, be its political complexion what it may, because, first, he is a man of integrity; second he is equipped for his duties; third, he is not a facile and obsequious, but a firm, decided man; and last, a courteous and urbane man. One with such a combination of qualities is too high and strong to be pulled down even by disciplined party violence.

Sir, I maintain that there is little danger of political influence or interference with the election of judge of probate; little, indeed, with that of any other county officer, whose duties are not of a political character, and do not connect him, necessarily, with the leaders of political parties. A good man, a faithful and a wise, is sure of his reward. The people will reward him. They are disposed to do so. It is for their interest to do so; and if that reward is re-election, he is sure of it.

Mr. LORD, of Salem. I do not think, when these resolves were under discussion before, that any particular objection was made to the manner of electing these officers; and, I propose now not to discuss the question how the judges of probate should be put into office, whether by the people, or by the executive, because I deem that to be comparatively an unimportant matter. I am willing to agree with gentlemen that upon the original selection of persons for local offices, the people are quite as likely to make a wise choice as the executive is; but, this is not a question of original appointment. The difficulty does not lie in that at all, but in the dependence of the officer. I care but little about the manner of the election of these judges, or of any judges, provided you make them independent, and put them out of the way of temptation; provided you put them in a position where women's tears cannot affect them. That is the place where we want a judge. If you make a judge of probate eligible for only three years, do you not recognize again the principle that men are influenced by the hand that feeds them. And has not this Convention not only recognized that principle, but have they not also determined that poor human nature requires protection against it—that it is our duty to render man, in the discharge of important functions, entirely independent of the hand that feeds him. Will they tell me what their secret ballot is made for? Is it not because there is a class of men, a class of voters, who have not the independence to act contrary to the wishes of the hand that feeds them? Have we not, by putting that provision into the fundamental law of the land, acknowledged that human nature is so constituted that men will yield to the hand that feeds them? Now, Sir, my doctrine is, that men ought not to yield to the hand that feeds them, and the man who is not capable of withstanding that temptation, is not fit to exercise the duties which devolve upon him. I care not who the judge is, whether he be a judge of probate, or any other judge, if he cannot perform his duties without yielding to the hand that feeds him, he cannot perform them well, and ought not to be intrusted with them. I want the judge of probate—and I deem his office one susceptible of great abuse—elective, in the sense in which I use that term. I would not make the incumbent dependent upon the caucus for his continuance in office. I do not speak of the original appointment. I agree with the eloquent speech of the gentleman from Lenox, (Mr. Bishop,) in that there is nothing so powerful as a woman's tears. I agree in that, and you may put Gabriel in the place of a judge of probate, and send before a caucus, to nominate a successor, a woman in her tears, with her professed and apparent wrongs, and Gabriel cannot so far sustain himself as to be re-nominated.

Well now, Sir, I know the tendency of the minds of men are always sympathetically inclined to the widow. The widow and the orphan are always powerful before any tribunal. It is because of the abuse of that power, and because it will be wielded not for right, but for wrong, that I do not want the continuance of the judge of probate to depend upon that. We all know that the exercise of the power by the judge of probate is so delicate, that with all his sympathy, and all his disposition to mete out justice to the widow and to the fatherless, there will be cases where exact right, and exact justice, is apparent wrong, and that cases of apparent wrong will hurl a just magistrate from his place, and put an unjust one in. It is for that reason that I would not have been a magistrate, dependent for his continuance in office, upon a widow's tears.

SECRETARY, TREASURER, &c. — LORD.

[July 1st.

But, Sir, I have not yet said, and I am not quite prepared to say, how I would have the original selection made for the office of the judge of probate. I am quite prepared, however, to say, that the tenure of his office shall be an independent one, and one in which he should not be moved by the cries of distress which the gentleman from Lenox has portrayed.

I agree that it is a court of inferior jurisdiction, but every act of discretion of a judge of probate may be reversed upon appeal. I do not agree with the gentleman from Lowell, (Mr. Butler,) and with the gentleman from Manchester, (Mr. Dana,) that the acts of discretion of a judge of probate cannot be revised. I believe they were led away by a false analogy. They supposed, that because the supreme court, having appellate jurisdiction in matters of law, cannot revise the discretionary acts of the court of common pleas, therefore, they cannot revise the discretion of the court of probate. But the analogy does not hold and the supreme court may revise the judgment of a judge of probate upon the sufficiency of a bond, as well as upon a decree of distribution, or any other decree. Whatever act is discretionary may be revised by the supreme court, it being the supreme court of probate.

But is it an argument that, because, when you put an unfit man into office, there is a remedy for the wrong which he will do, therefore, you will take such a course as will lead to the selection of a man who will be likely to do wrong? Although I agree with the gentleman from Boston, that it is desirable to have a judge of probate who is learned, not only in all the mysteries of the law, but in all departments of science, yet it is not really necessary. In the good old county of Essex, we never had but one judge who was a lawyer. I mean a lawyer by profession. Other things being equal, the cultivation and pursuits of a lawyer are of much advantage to a judge.

But, Sir, while I consider it important that the Judge of Probate should hold his office independently, I do not consider that his office is, by any means, the only important one that needs to be carefully guarded in relation to its independence. Nor do I consider that his independence is, by any means, the only one that may be interfered with. I think the gentleman from Lowell, (Mr. Butler,) was right when he said that the office of sheriff was a very important one, and in some respects quite as deserving serious consideration in reference to the manner of selection and tenure, as that of judge of probate. And, Sir, the deputy-sheriffs may also be placed in the same category. I do not know why we should not have our deputy-sheriffs placed upon the same basis with sheriffs, if simply because they are public officers to do the work of citizens, the people should choose them. They are no more and no less executive officers than the sheriffs, and the general line of argument here in favor of the selection of persons to all places of trust or duty as well applies to deputy-sheriffs as to sheriffs.

But, Sir, there is another officer which is also a very important one—I mean the County Treasurer. A gentleman says he is always re-elected. Well, Sir, I believe that is a fact, and I believe it is also a fact that the county treasurer is always from the time he is elected, the most popular man in the county, and why is it? Probably because he never has anything to do with the people of the county except to pay them money. Sir, if you will give me a chance to pay the people all the money I want to, as unpopular as I may be, I will be elected to the Convention to the legislature, or anywhere else. [Laughter.] That is the secret of the county treasurer's popularity. But, while the treasurer is all the time paying money, and doing nothing else, the sheriff is all the time grasping money or grasping men, and you will find the result very different in respect to popularity. I doubt if you can find an instance where the sheriff is re-elected year after year. If you will show me such an instance I will agree that I am mistaken in the considerations which in my judgment will influence the popular mind in elections to offices of this character.

A MEMBER. Registers of deeds are elected, and the people are always paying them instead of receiving from them.

Mr. LORD. Yes. Registers of deeds are officers who receive money from the people, as my friend by me suggests, but the people do not pay them money until they have received from these officers something which does them more good than the money did, for there is nothing gives a man more pleasure than to know he is recorded as a holder of real estate. I believe it is the best feeling in a republican community. I believe there is nothing that makes an individual feel so much his importance and dignity as a man, as to know that he has a deed recorded, showing that he is the possessor of real estate. Well, Sir, he must go to the register of deeds to get his deed recorded, and that makes this officer popular. I am sorry to say that, I have not quite arrived at the dignity of a holder of real estate to any very considerable amount, and I cannot, therefore, speak so much from experience as from observation, nor with quite so much enthusiasm; but, I think the experience and observation of every member of the Convention will testify to the truth of the remark, that the moment you make a man interested in the soil, that moment you make him a good man, and a good public man.

Now, while I think of it, I will say what I have not said before, that I am not at all afraid of the small towns. [Laughter.] I do not care how much you talk about them, they will come out all right in the end, because, almost every voter in them is interested in the land.

Now, take the case of county commissioners, I believe in one county there were only some fourteen or fifteen, or perhaps, nineteen hundred votes cast for them at the last spring's election, out of some seven or eight thousand who usually vote in elections. Well, Sir, what were the reasons which operated to secure their election? Was it the qualifications of the man for the office? No Sir, that consideration was not taken into account at all. It was in some cases, because a particular road was laid out, and in others, because a particular road was not laid out. Now, will any gentleman in this Convention tell me of a single case where county commissioners have been elected upon any other than a mere sectional or local issue—some matter purely local in its character? I believe there are no exceptions, though, possibly there may be some. The elections ordinarily turn upon some considerations of that nature.

We have elected our county commissioners since 1836-7 or '8, I do not recollect precisely the time, and at the last election by the aid of two roads, one bridge, and by two towns wanting to elect a particular man, we made out to re-elect the old commissioners in the county of Essex, but this is the first instance of a re-election of the whole board in that county. There has always been a change in that board. And how does this happen? Do the people come out and canvass the matter? Do they inquire of the qualifications of the candidates? Not at all. Some particular man happens to be out of employment at that particular time; his friends think the old commissioners have made a great blunder with regard to a particular road; that it will be best for their interests to put this man in, and so they go to work to get him elected. That is the way it is done.

As a general thing we have had pretty good county commissioners, but they have been chosen wholly on account of their particular views of a particular road or on account of some matter of mere local importance, and I do not think that is a good principle upon which to act.

Then the office of commissioner of insolvency, is one, in my opinion, of more importance and one from which more danger may be apprehended than that of judge of probate. The general object of insolvents in selecting a commissioner of insolvency to whom to present their petitions, is to get a man that will put them through. Well, Sir, these gentlemen who want to be put through, as a general thing, are pretty active at the caucuses. I do not mean to give them any undue influence there, but they generally act pretty briskly. The only question to be asked, when a man comes to vote for a commissioner of insolvency is, did he put my friend through well? Because, if he did, he is a man of good feelings and a kind disposition; he is disposed to treat the unfortunate leniently. But, if he put the man through rather doubtfully, then the controversy is between the friends of the creditors and the friends of the insolvent. So it is, all these officers will be likely to be chosen from merely local, or partial, or personal considerations.

If a man feels himself crowded by the action of a local tribunal of this kind, he immediately sets himself to work to bring the action of the machinery of a political caucus to bear upon that man. Now, Sir, if the people are to select such an officer as that, I would make him independent, and not obliged so to gauge his conduct so as not to stir up a hornets nest about his ears. We, all of us, know the management of caucuses in relation to these officers. If a commissioner of insolvency, in the honest performance of his duty, refuses to discharge a debtor, the friends of that debtor, or the insolvent himself, and probably both, will almost certainly go privately about, working the wires for packing the caucus so as to prevent the re-election of the commissioner. There is not a man in this House who does not know that it is a matter which can be very easily accomplished in any county where there is nothing to draw public attention to it. Half a dozen men determined to do it, can, at any time, pack a caucus, and out goes the commissioner of insolvency a good deal easier than he came in.

Sir, this is an office of a great deal of importance in the administration of the affairs of this government. The commissioner of insolvency is not only an officer to whom is intrusted the adjudication cation of matters of the highest importance, but of the most delicate nature; matters of a character most likely to excite very strong feelings upon the part of the parties connected with them.

In this view of the case, it seems to me a matter of the first importance, however the appointment of these officers may be originally made, whether by the people or by the governor, that we should endeavor to make them as independent as possible. I do not doubt that these offices may be well filled, even where the tenure is a short one. Fix it at three, five, seven, ten or twelve years; fix it at any limit you choose, but say that the officer shall hold his office during that term, unless he does something for which he may be impeached, and then in no case allow him to be a candidate for re-election,—do that, and I think that many of the evils which some of us apprehend from making so many officers elective for short terms, may be avoided. I do not care to whom is intrusted the original selection of these officers, so that they are made independent.

But, Mr. President, I did not intend to have detained the Convention so long. I thought when I began that I should scarcely occupy the attention of the Convention for five minutes, but I have unconsciously been drawn into what may seem to have been intended as a speech upon the general subject—I feared there was some danger of confounding the original filling of these offices with their subsequent tenure, when the original appointment seemed to me to be the least dangerous part of the matter, and I rose merely to call attention to the distinction.

Mr. DANA, for Manchester, remarked that he wished to reply to some of the suggestions which had been made, and he was ready to do so now if it was the desire of the Convention to take the question to-night; but, upon the suggestion of members around him, that it would not be desirable to vote upon it this evening, he moved to lay the whole subject on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Report from a Committee.

Mr. FROTHINGHAM, of Charlestown, from the Special Committee to whom was referred the subject of Granting Special Charters for Banking purposes, having considered the same, reported the following resolve:—

COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS.

In Convention, July 1, 1853.

Resolved, That it is expedient to insert into the Constitution articles providing:—

1. That the legislature shall have no power to pass any act granting any special charter for banking purposes, or any special act to increase the capital stock of any charter bank; but corporations may be formed for such purposes, or the capital stock of charter banks may be increased, under general laws.

2. That the legislature shall provide by law for the registry of all notes or bills authorized by general laws to be issued or put in circulation as money; and shall require ample security for the redemption of such notes, in specie.

Referred to the Committee of the Whole and ordered to be printed.

Leave of Absence.

Mr. FAY, of Southboro', from the Committee on Leave of Absence, submitted a report granting leave of absence for three weeks to Mr. Houghton, delegate from Stoughton.

The Report was accepted.

At quarter past six o'clock, upon motion of Mr. PHINNEY, for Chatham, the Convention adjourned.

TUESDAY, July 5, 1853.

The Convention assembled pursuant to adjournment, and was called to order by the President, at 10 o'clock.

Prayer by the Chaplain.

The Journal of Friday's proceedings was read.

Communication from the Secretary of the Commonwealth.

The PRESIDENT laid before the Convention a communication from the Secretary of the Commonwealth, furnishing, in conformity with an order of the Convention, a list of the Justices of the Supreme Judicial Court and the Court of Common Pleas; also, enclosing a list of pardons, remissions, restorations and commutations from 1843 to 1852 inclusive.

On motion of Mr. WILSON, of Natick, the communication was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

On motion of Mr. WILSON, of Natick, the Convention resolved itself into

COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE,

Mr. Parker, of Cambridge, in the Chair, on the Report of the Committee on the Encouragement of Literature, to whom had been referred an order of May 20th, concerning

Female Education,

And the petition of Harriot K. Hunt, on the same subject.

The resolve reported by the Committee was read as follows:—

Resolved, That it is not expedient to alter the Constitution so as to confer any additional powers upon the legislature in relation to the education of females.

The resolution was approved by the Committee of the Whole, and on motion of Mr. DAVIS, of Worcester, the Committee rose, and by their chairman reported the same to

THE CONVENTION,

With a recommendation that it do pass.

The Report of the Committee of the Whole, was concurred in, and the resolution was ordered to a second reading.

On motion of Mr. WILSON, of Natick, the Convention resolved itself into

COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE,

Mr. Walker, of North Brookfield, in the Chair, on the Report of the Committee on the Encouragement of Literature, in reference to the establishment of a Board of Education, and a Board of Agriculture, as permanent departments of government, upon which the Committee had reported that it is inexpedient so to alter the Constitution.

The question being on concurring in the resolution reported by the Committee.

Mr. COGSWELL, of Yarmouth, addressed the Committee, as follows: No subject can come before this Convention that is of greater importance than that of popular instruction. The examples of all past ages teach us that education, founded upon principles of virtue and morality, is the most sure, as well as the most desirable defence of the State. Our school-houses and churches are the true symbols of civilization, as temples and pyramids were symbols of ancient civilization. The condition of these is a fair index of the intelligence and virtue of a people.

Learning has ever been the handmaid of virtue and upon these two elements depend our happiness and prosperity as a people. But how are objects so desirable to be fully effected. It is very evident that it is not enough to enact laws favorable to popular education, and not employ sufficient agents, or make sufficient appropriations to carry into effect those laws in their spirit, as well as letter. No reforms can be carried on without reformers; no monied institution is chartered which does not forthwith employ servants to advocate its claims before the public. This is the ordinary and direct way of gaining popular favor, and such a course is equally necessary with all the great moral and educational reforms of the day. Thus, the subject of popular education should be constantly kept before the people; the public sentiment must be educated to appreciate its glories, and its inestimable benefits. Laws are a dead letter upon the statute book, if they be not also borne in remembrance, and cherished in the hearts of the people. They must not be allowed to forget the dignity and beauty, and utility of common schools; official agents need to be constantly engaged in appealing to the good sense and patriotism of the whole community, in informing them, by lectures, essays, reports, statistics and addresses. This had already been accomplished in our Commonwealth, to a great extent, in the establishment of a Board of Education. How well this Board has done its work, it is hardly necessary to remind you. I cannot let the occasion pass, however, without bearing my humble testimony to the distinguished merits of the past and present secretaries of the Board. They have merited, and will enjoy, the grateful remembrance of the people of Massachusetts. The practical utility of this Board has been abundantly tested, and established. It is almost the only agency, or establishment, that has successfully triumphed over popular caprice, and the changes of legislative policy. It is an established and favored organization of the State. On these accounts your Committee think it unnecessary to recognize its existence, and thus virtually endorse its usefulness in the constitutional instrument we are constructing; but, prefer to leave it where it is, and commit its management in all coming times to the wisdom and fostering care of future legislatures. I move, Mr. Chairman, that the Committee rise and report the resolution to the Convention, with a recommendation that it do pass.

The motion was agreed to, and the Committee accordingly rose, and by their chairman reported the resolution to

THE CONVENTION,

With a recommendation that it do pass.

The Report of the Committee of the Whole was concurred in, and the resolution was ordered to a second reading.

On motion of Mr. WILSON, of Natick, the Convention resolved itself into

COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE,

Mr. Schouler, of Boston, in the Chair, on the Report of the Committee on the Encouragement of Literature, in reference to the appropriation of moneys for Sectarian or Denominational Schools.

The Report was read, as follows:—

Resolved, That it is expedient so to amend the Constitution, as to provide that no public money in this Commonwealth, whether accruing from funds or raised by taxation, shall ever be appropriated for the support of sectarian or denominational schools.

On motion of Mr. PUTNAM, of Wenham, the Committee rose and reported the resolution to

THE CONVENTION,

With a recommendation that it do pass.

The Report of the Committee of the Whole was concurred in, and the resolution was ordered to a second reading.

Mr. KINGMAN, of West Bridgewater, moved a suspension of the rules, with the view of taking up for consideration the resolution reported by the Committee on the Encouragement of Literature in reference to the subject of appropriating money for the support of Sectarian Schools.

The motion was, upon a division—ayes, 92; noes, 28; two-thirds of those voting being in favor thereof—decided in the affirmative.

The resolution was again read:—

Resolved, That it is expedient so to amend the Constitution, as to provide that no public money in this Commonwealth, whether accruing from funds or raised by taxation, shall ever be appropriated for the support of sectarian and denominational schools.

The question being on its final passage.

Mr. TYLER. I beg to inquire, Sir, whether the term school, includes all academies and seminaries of learning; or whether it is confined to what are called common schools. It seems to me, the thing is indefinite as it stands. The word school, I apprehend, in its common acceptation, must mean all institutions of learning.

Mr. COGSWELL. As the chairman of the Committee from which this Report was made, is not present to reply to the inquiry of the gentleman, I will state, that the view taken by the Committee was, that the schools intended are those to which public money is appropriated, whether received from the State funds or from taxation. The Committee thought the matter sufficiently plain, and that no further explanation was necessary.

Mr. BIRD, of Walpole, moved that when the question is taken, it be taken by yeas and nays.

The motion was not agreed to—there being, on a division, ayes, 35; nays, 82—and the yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. WARNER, of Wrentham, moved that the further consideration of the subject be postponed until to-morrow.

The motion was, upon a division—ayes, 60; noes, 47—decided in the affirmative.

On motion of Mr. BIRD, of Walpole, the Convention resolved itself into

COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE,

Mr. Sumner, for Otis, in the Chair, and proceeded to consider the series of resolutions reported by the Committee on Oaths and Subscriptions, Concerning Oaths, the Incompatibility of Offices, the Enacting Style, the subject of Attachment on Mesne Process, and Election of Bank Officers.

Mr. HOOPER moved to amend the first resolve, by striking out the words "the legislature," and inserting the word "law."

Mr. BRINLEY, of Boston. I rise, Sir, to move an amendment, though I must confess that I have no great faith in the success of my proposition, because it is one of a rather conservative character. I, nevertheless, move to strike out the third resolve reported by the Committee, which is the following:—

3. Resolved, That the eighth article of the sixth chapter be amended by striking out the words "Senate and House of Representatives in," and the words "assembled" "and by the authority of the same," and by adding the words "of Massachusetts," so that the article as amended shall read:

ARTICLE VIII. The enacting style in making and passing all acts, statutes, and laws, shall be: Be it Enacted by the General Court of Massachusetts.

This resolve proposes to change the form which has always been in use with regard to the enactment of laws. The phraseology which is proposed by the amendment may be a little more terse, but I see no benefit to result from its adoption; and I am indisposed to make changes unless there is some valid and strong reason for them. We have become so much accustomed to the phraseology now in use, that I much prefer to retain it.

I make the motion to strike out the resolve, and those gentlemen who entertain the same regard which I entertain for old forms, will vote for the motion; while those who are disinclined to retain the old phraseology, but prefer that recommended in the Report of the Committee, will, of course, vote against the motion to strike out.

I do not propose to make any extended remarks, but merely to indicate my preference to a form of expression which is old and familiar to us all.

Mr. STETSON, of Braintree. I am not one of the legal profession, and therefore have not that reverence for forms and ceremonies which I otherwise should have. I shall support the resolve as reported by the Committee; and for this reason, I do not see why, in remodeling the frame of government, we should not make use of such terms as will be an improvement upon the old order of things. I am in favor of all improvements which shall conduce to the prosperity and welfare of the Commonwealth. I am not prepared to say whether this change is one calculated to conduce to the general prosperity and welfare or not; but if it is a change that will relieve us from the use of any unnecessary or obsolete term, and which will give us in its place one more brief and more intelligible, I am in favor of it.

Now, Sir, I am aware that gentlemen who have read Blackstone, &c., hold on to the old forms of expression. I do not know whether they are even ready to acquiesce in the new order of things relative to our laws, which was adopted a few years ago, for the reason that they have become so much accustomed to a settled form of expression, that any change disarranges all their order of proceedings and habits of thought. I suppose this is the reason why so many cling to the old forms, originating in the aristocracy of England, and handed down to us by our forefathers, which consisted in a multiplication of words to such an extent that the common people could not understand the purport of a legal document at all. For instance, in filling out a writ, such a confused mass of words were employed that no person but a lawyer could understand it, unless it was that portion which pertains to himself when the officer claps his hand upon his shoulder.

I trust the Convention will adopt the Report as submitted by the Committee, because there is nothing unreasonable about it, and because it proposes a form of expression which it seems to me is preferable to that now used.

Mr. KINGMAN, of West Bridgewater. As the chairman of the Committee which reported these resolutions, (Mr. Butler, of Lowell,) is not now in his seat, and as I am a member of that Committee, I think it proper to state to the Convention that the Committee unanimously recommended this reform. The principle argument urged in Committee was that it would save a great deal of writing. Gentlemen of the legal profession are, of course, more familiar with this subject than I am. But the Committee were unanimously of the opinion that it would be better to shorten the enacting style. In the course of a year, whatever form is adopted, must be repeated a great many times, involving a great amount of writing.

Mr. UPTON, of Boston. I hope the amendment of my colleague will prevail. There is no occasion for using the words "General Court of Massachusetts." If the only object is to shorten the sentence, it would be best to strike out the words "General Court," or "Massachusetts," and insert the words "the legislature." It seems that the phraseology of the Constitution, as it stands at present, although it is rather long, is better than the term "be it enacted by the General Court." But if we are intending to alter the phraseology we had better use the phraseology of my colleague, (Mr. Brinley).

Mr. WILSON. The term "General Court" is the Constitutional name of the legislature. I think the Report of the Committee makes an improvement in the Constitution. The enacting clause now reads as follows:—

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives in General Court assembled, &c."

The proposition now made is simply to say: "Be it enacted by the General Court of Massachusetts." That is the constitutional name of the legislature, and it is as brief as we can make it. I think it is a decided improvement over the present enacting clause, and I hope the motion made by my friend from Boston, (Mr. Brinley,) will not prevail. The expression made use of by the Committee is more brief than the term which the gentleman proposes to retain.

Mr. EARLE, of Worcester. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the words "of Massachusetts," and then it will make it just what I desire. It appears to me that the words "of Massachusetts" are entirely superfluous. They are not used even in the old form, and it seems unnecessary to make use of them here. I suppose that my amendment would strictly take precedence of the other, as it is to perfect the section.

Mr. BRINLEY. I have not, myself, considered that it was incumbent upon us to make great changes in the phraseology of the Constitution, and I presume if I were to sit down and criticize it much, I could find little inaccuracies which would admit of improvement. For instance, in the Constitution the legislature is called a general court, and in one or two instances "General Assembly," but we have been so long acting under these provisions that we perfectly understand them, and although, if we were making a Constitution anew, we might attempt to preserve entire consistency throughout, yet I do not think it is so important in the present instance. I think that the argument used in favor of the expression reported by the Committee, that it is a little more brief, is not entitled to much weight. I have no doubt that most of the members of this Convention, relying upon their memories, would find the words "Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives, in General Court assembled," flowing from their lips more readily than the form of phraseology now used, and those who should try their hands at drafting would make mistakes very often, relying upon their memories.

Mr. EARLE. We have printed blanks before us.

Mr. BRINLEY. I do not think it is necessary, by any means for us, that we should busy ourselves about mere phraseology in the Constitution when we understand it as it now exists. And therefore, although I might say, if it were a new question entirely, that we might use a better form, still, situated as we are, and with the experience of seventy odd years, I would prefer that it should remain as it is, for the very reason that I do not care to change the phraseology of the Constitution. For instance, the phrase "General Assembly" is used. If a motion was made to strike it out, unless it was necessary to do so, I should vote against it, because it produces no harm at present. So with regard to the present enacting clause. If it produces no harm, I shall abide by it, and vote against the adoption of a new form. It is not very probable that any proposition which comes in conflict with the Report of the Committee will be adopted, and I have, therefore, no great faith that the motion I made will succeed. I leave the matter, then, in the hands of the Committee, feeling satisfied that my amendment will be rejected.

The question was then taken upon Mr. Earle's amendment and it was rejected.

Mr. EARLE. I hope now that the motion made by the gentleman from Boston, (Mr. Brinley,) will prevail, inasmuch as the motion which I made has been rejected. The object of the Committee, as I understand it, is merely for the purpose of shortening the phraseology. If this is the object, why incorporate a word in the phrase which adds nothing to its meaning. The laws are headed "Commonwealth of Massachusetts," and then comes the enacting clause. It appears to me that inserting the word Massachusetts there again is tautological, and I should much prefer the present enacting clause to this one with the words "of Massachusetts" remaining in it. I therefore shall vote for striking out, and hope the motion will prevail. I think the existing clause far preferable to the one reported by the Committee.

Mr. WALKER, of North Brookfield. I hope the motion now before the Committee will prevail. If the Constitution should be submitted to the people in detail, this should make one of the questions as much as anything else. I do not think it worth while to encumber ourselves with a matter of so little importance.

Mr. WILSON, of Natick. It seems to me, that these reformers are getting some rather queer notions this morning. A short time since some of us were in favor of changing the Constitution in very many respects. To-day I find that it is not worth while to make a very great change unless it is absolutely necessary. My friend from Worcester, because he lost his amendment, is in hopes that the amendment moved by the gentleman from Boston, (Mr. Brinley,) will prevail. I would have liked his amendment very well, and I think the phrase as reported by the Committee would have been better, if it had been adopted. I hope the resolution as reported by the Committee will be adopted, as I consider it a marked and decided improvement upon the other phraseology. I see no necessity whatever for retaining this long enacting clause now used in acts of the legislature. The one proposed by the Committee is brief, and expresses all that is necessary to be expressed, and I hope that the report of the Committee will be sustained by this Committee and Convention. In some States they use the term "people." In the State of New York the enacting clause is, "Be it enacted by the people of the State of New York in General Assembly." So in some of the Western States they use the same term. We have decided to retain the words "general court" as the title of the legislature of Massachusetts. I hope the Report of the Committee will be sustained, and I think we need not give ourselves any apprehension about the trouble in regard to it, which will be incurred by the people.

Mr. HOOPER, of Fall River. I hope that the Constitution will be amended, whenever it is susceptible of improvement. I did entertain the hope that we were thoroughly revising the Constitution and that we had given up the idea of submitting the amendments separately. I desire to give them all a thorough revision and make improvements wherever we can, whether in matter or phraseology. I think this is an improvement which the Committee have reported, but it does not exactly meet my views. I should prefer a different phraseology. A form of expression like this, "Be it enacted by the people represented in general court," would suit me better. And for the purpose of presenting that question, I would move to amend the proposition of the gentleman from Boston, (Mr. Brinley,) so as to strike out and insert the following:—"Be it enacted by the people represented in general court." I think it will be a decided improvement upon the present amendment and likewise upon the Report of the Committee. I am in hopes that the Committee will change the phraseology of the enacting clause, as I have suggested; otherwise I hope the motion of the gentleman from Boston, (Mr. Brinley,) will not prevail, and that the Report of the Committee may stand as it is at present.

Mr. FROTHINGHAM, of Charlestown. I think in the first place we are considering a matter of considerable consequence to the whole resolve, without the presence of the chairman of the Committee, and I rise merely to make a suggestion whether in this matter of mere phraseology it would not be full as well to let the resolves as they stand go into Convention, and then make the amendments which may be determined upon there. In relation to the enacting style, I have not paid much attention to it, but it seems to me that the suggestion of the gentleman from Fall River, (Mr. Hooper,) is a very good one in the main. It seems to me by that phrase we would retain whatever of the old rust might be agreeable, and at the same time incorporate into the Constitution what there was of the new principle which has been adopted throughout the country.

Now, in New York and other States, the enacting clause is so framed, that it indicates the precise fact in relation to the laws, that the people do ordain their law through their representatives in general court, or in the Senate and House of Representatives assembled. It is worth something to ask, whether it would not be a change, or something more than a mere change in name and form, to alter the enacting style. I believe that, at present, the style is, "Be it enacted by the General Court, &c."

Mr. EARLE. It is, "Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives in General Court assembled."

Mr. FROTHINGHAM. It is quite a long title, and if we could get rid of it, it might be quite well to do it. I retain, however, the impression with which I rose, that it might be well to amend it in Committee, and adopt the substance of the resolve, as reported by the Committee.

Mr. UPTON, of Boston. I suppose the only substance in this resolve, is the change in the phraseology. I regret to see such a difference of opinion among those who are trying to reform the Constitution, this morning. [Laughter.] But it does seem to me there was some little sense in the remark I made when I was up before, that if you make any change from the original form, you had better shorten it as much as possible. It strikes me it would be as well to leave it, "Be it enacted." I do not know about these mere changes of form. I remember that there was a woman who used to style herself Dorcas Sheldon, and who afterwards called herself Dorcas I. Sheldon. I do not know that she was any better for the change; and I do not know that it will be any better for the good old Commonwealth of Massachusetts to be called by a different name. She is a pretty respectable State as she is, and if we stand by the laws as they are made, and as they are enacted by the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, she will still be a pretty good, stanch State.

I still hope that, if the amendment proposed by my colleague is not adopted, we shall strike out a portion, and leave it with the simple words, "Be it enacted." That is comprehensive. There is no one living in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, who ought not to know what the law making power is.

Mr. SCHOUER, of Boston. I wish to say one word in respect to the suggestion of the gentleman from Fall River, and his amendment. He wishes to have the style: "Be it enacted, by the people of Massachusetts in General Court assembled." I have just been looking over the Report of the Committee on Plurality, and I would like to ask the gentleman from Fall River, whether, if there were some towns not represented in the general court, those towns should be subject to the laws, because the laws are to be enacted by the people in general court assembled. The laws will be made only by the people who are assembled in the general court, or represented there. It seems to me that those towns which are not represented, would not be held liable to the law. My friend from Cambridge thinks that this ought to be "the dear people," instead of "the people," simply.

Mr. HOOPER. The gentleman has stated the amendment to be as it does not exist. The proposition is to have it thus: Be it enacted by the people represented in general court, and not "by the people in general court."

Mr. SCHOULER. My inquiry relates to the towns which are not represented.

Mr. HOOPER. The gentleman is supposing a case, which I am not at liberty to suppose will exist. But I suppose that some provision will be made, that the people, taken as a whole, will be represented. I believe that they can, if they choose, be represented. If they choose not to be represented, it is their fault. I do not see any difficulty in this matter.

Mr. SHELDON, of Easton. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask whether it will be in order to move that the debate may be closed at any particular time.

The CHAIRMAN. It will not be in order.

Mr. SHELDON. I hoped it might be in order, for I wanted to fix the time for closing it at about one minute hence.

Mr. KINGMAN, of West Bridgewater. I hope this resolve will be adopted by the Convention as it came from the Committee. I perceive the chairman of the Committee is not here; and there are other gentlemen who took an active part in framing the resolution; and I think that it is but fair that we should adopt it as it is, unless they are here to explain it.

The question was then taken on the adoption of the amendment, proposed by Mr. Hooper, and it was decided in the negative.

Mr. EARLE. I now move to amend the resolve by inserting before the word "Massachusetts;" the words "Commonwealth of" in order to perfect it. Then it will agree with the present Constitution in that respect.

I see some members of the Committee are disposed to make light of this, but it strikes me that there is no occasion for it. I moved it, certainly, with great seriousness, and I did it for the reason that the words "of Massachusetts" were put in after the words "of the General Court," for the purpose of making it conform to the style in the Constitution. The Constitution designates the general court as the general court of Massachusetts, and it also designates the State as the Commonwealth of Massachusetts. That is the style, and it appears to me that if we are to follow the Constitution in this respect at all, we should follow it entirely. But if this does not prevail, I shall again, in Convention, if I do not change my mind, make my original motion to amend by striking out the words "of Massachusetts." It appears to me that if our object is to simplify the thing, it is done best by changing the enacting clause. As it stands now, it is, "Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives in General Court assembled and by the authority of the same." It is simply striking out as I made my original motion, and leaving all that is necessary. As it is amended by the Committee, it adds something which, it appears to me, is not necessary, but if that is added, then it is necessary, in order to make it conform to the Constitution, to add the words which I moved to add.

The gentleman from Natick, (Mr. Wilson,) said that I was disposed to strike out, because my amendment did not prevail. He certainly did me injustice in that respect. It was not; because I would not act upon any such ground. It was not because a motion which I made did not prevail, but because, as it stood, I did not consider it as good as it was in its original form.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Chairman, I understood the gentleman to say that he should vote for the amendment of the gentleman from Boston, because his amendment had failed. I simply stated the fact, as he himself stated it without intending to do injustice to the gentleman's motives.

Mr. EARLE. I said that unless that was stricken out, I preferred it as it originally stood in the old Constitution, and I do prefer it as it originally stood in the Constitution to the form reported by the Committee.

Mr. OLIVER, of Lawrence. This whole argument upon the question before the Committee, reminds me of a story once told by Dr. Franklin, about the name of a sign for the shop of a village hatter. The name of the man was John Thompson; and he had got a sign printed with the words, "John Thompson makes and sells hats cheaper than any man in the village, for cash;" and also had the figure of a hat upon it. He desired Dr. Franklin to criticise the form, who began by suggesting that the words, "for cash" should be stricken off, inasmuch as it was the custom in the village to give credit on sales. Then something else was stricken off, till finally nothing remained but the words "John Thompson," and the figure of the hat. Now it strikes me that the Committee who had this matter in charge have done seriously the same thing which was done by Franklin in regard to the sign; they have simplified the form. I am convinced that that which is now presented for us to act upon is not necessary, and notwithstanding the great respect I have for the gentleman who made the first motion for an amendment of the report of the Committee, (Mr. Brinley,) I hope the original report will stand unaltered.

Mr. LIVERMORE, of Cambridge. I will suggest to my good friend from Worcester, (Mr. Earle,) that I believe he has mistaken the style of the legislature.

Mr. EARLE. I did, and I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. LIVERMORE. I have simply to say that if any change is to be made, I think that the Committee has taken the most judicious mode of doing it. We have already acted upon the style of the legislature, and its style is to be, "the General Court of Massachusetts." That subject was acted upon early in the session of the Convention, and it will stand as the style of the legislature. I am, however, so much in favor of old forms, particularly when they are good ones, that I prefer to have it stand as the gentleman from Boston proposed. If, however, any change is made, I hope it will be that which the Committee have proposed, because it is what the Convention have styled the legislature; namely, the General Court of Massachusetts.

Mr. BRINLEY, of Boston. If the Committee will allow me to make a single remark I will relieve them. I have heard no very strong argument, other than that the chairman of the Committee is absent, as well as some other gentlemen who take an interest in this matter. But I judge from the aspect of things, that the amendment, which I had the honor to submit, is to be voted down because gentlemen, who should be in their places, are not here. But I do not desire that the amendment which I proposed may be defeated in the Committee, and I do not wish it to go into the Convention with the stamp of the disapprobation of the Committee upon it. I made the motion because I saw no satisfactory reason why this Convention should busy itself about mere criticisms of the language of the Constitution; but, if that is a part of our object here, I hope we shall indulge in it to a greater extent. Let me point out one single passage to which I referred before, where it is said in the old Constitution that the representatives shall receive "travel" for their attendance at the general assembly. If these things are all to be dove-tailed together so as to harmonize completely, I hope that some Committee will attend to that matter and make it correspond.

Under these circumstances, although I apprehended in the outset that I should not succeed, and am abundantly satisfied, having testified in favor of the Constitution as it stands, in that particular, I will withdraw the amendment.

The question recurred on the adoption of the Report of the Committee.

Mr. SARGENT, of Cambridge. I rise to ask a question, for information. I find in the last section, these words:—

"And whenever there shall be a vacancy in any of the above offices, the office of governor or Lieutenant-governor excepted, the same may be filled."

Now I do not understand what is meant by that phrase. Does it mean that the office of governor and Lieutenant-governor, if a vacancy exist, cannot be filled, and that in filling the offices of other officers there is no provision for the manner in which they may be filled? I hope some member of the Committee will tell us what it means.

Mr. CRESSY, of Hamilton. I desire to ask for information whether it will be in order to move a postponement of the further consideration of this subject until to-morrow.

The CHAIRMAN. That motion is not in order while in Committee of the Whole; but, the gentleman can attain his object by a motion that the Committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. CRESSY. I will submit that motion. Mr. WILSON, of Natick. I think we may as well act upon this matter now.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will remind the gentleman that this motion is not debatable. The question was taken on the motion that the Committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again, and it was decided in the negative.

The question recurred on agreeing to the Report of the Committee. The Report was adopted.

QUALIFICATION OF VOTERS, &c. — WARD — WHITNEY — WALKER — DUNCAN.

[July 5th.

On motion, by Mr. WILSON, of Natick, the Committee then rose, and by their chairman, (Mr. Sumner for Otis,) reported to

THE CONVENTION,

That the Committee of the Whole had concurred in the Report of the Standing Committee, and recommended the adoption by the Convention of certain resolutions in relation to the amendment of the sixth chapter of the Constitution, with an amendment thereto.

Mr. KINGMAN, of West Bridgewater, moved that the further consideration of the subject be postponed until to-morrow; which was not agreed to.

The amendment reported by the Committee of the Whole was concurred in.

Mr. WARD, of Newton, moved to strike out of the second resolution, in the third line of the second paragraph, the words "or place," and in the seventh line of the same paragraph, the words "place or," so that the paragraph as amended would read as follows:—

No governor, lieutenant-governor, or judge of the supreme judicial court, or court of common pleas, shall hold any other office under the authority of this Commonwealth, except such as by this Constitution they are admitted to hold, saving that the judges of the said courts may hold the offices of justices of the peace through the State; nor shall they hold any other office or receive any pension or salary from any other State, or government, or power whatsoever, except that they may be appointed to take deposition or acknowledgments of deeds or other legal instruments, by the authority of any other State or country.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WHITNEY, of Boylston. Mr. President. I desire to offer a substitute for the fifth resolution. That resolution provides that myself and a few others shall be disfranchised, and I cannot see any reason for this. I do not believe that the majority of this Convention regard the taking of oaths as a guaranty for the faithful discharge of the duties which may devolve upon any one who takes offices under this government. For my part, I cannot see any harm in providing that those who have conscientious scruples against life-taking in any form, may be permitted to hold such offices without the taking of these oaths. For that purpose, I move to amend the fifth resolution by striking out the whole thereof, and inserting the following substitute:—

Resolved, That is expedient so to alter the Constitution as to provide that persons conscientiously scrupulous of taking human life, may act in an official capacity under the Constitution, without taking the ordinary oath or affirmation.

The reasons why we ask this are these. You make provision in your Constitution for the taking of human life, by means of your officers, under certain circumstances. We hold that this is wrong and unchristian. We cannot do it ourselves, and we hold that what we cannot do ourselves, we cannot appoint anybody else to do for us. We therefore ask that we may be permitted to hold offices under the government in good faith, according to the Constitution, without being obliged to authorize anybody to do for us that which we cannot do ourselves. We are situated precisely in the circumstances of a man who should be asked to swear away or to renounce his religion before he could hold an office under the Constitution; and although, by the provisions of the Constitution, you do not in direct terms require a religious test of this kind, yet, in fact, you either disfranchise us or compel us to swear away a part of our religion. I hope that this amendment will prevail.

The question being taken, the amendment was not agreed to.

The resolves were then ordered to a second reading.

Qualification of Voters.

Mr. WALKER, of North Brookfield, moved that the Convention resolve itself into Committee of the Whole upon the resolves reported by the Committee on the Qualifications of Voters, in relation to the gain or loss of residence by a person while employed in the army or navy, while engaged in navigation, or while a student of any seminary of learning.

The motion was agreed to.

The Convention accordingly resolved itself into

COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE,

Mr. Giles, of Boston, in the Chair, and proceeded to consider the said resolves, which were read as follows:—

1. Resolved, That for the purpose of voting, no person shall be deemed to have gained or lost a residence by reason of his presence or absence, while employed in the army or navy of the United States, or while navigating the waters of this State, or of the United States, or of the high seas, or while a student of any seminary of learning.

2. Resolved, That no person removing his domicile from one town or city within this Commonwealth to another, shall, by reason of such removal, be deemed to have lost his residence in the former, for the purpose of voting for national and state officers, until six months after his removal.

The pending question was stated to be on the amendment submitted by Mr. Stevens, of Clinton, to strike out from the end of the first resolve the following words: "or while a student of any seminary of learning."

Mr. DUNCAN, of Williamstown. Mr. Chairman: Having had the honor of introducing the order which the Committee on the Qualifications of Voters, reported in this third resolve, it may be expected that I should state, by way of explanation, the reason of this proposed change in the organic law; and allow me, by way of parenthesis, to say, that the right of the people at all times to instruct their representatives is a doctrine to which I fully assent; and in obedience to the express commands of my constituents, I presented to the Convention the subject now under consideration. Whatever be its merits, or its demerits, they belong to the State of Maine, from whose Constitution I copied it, literatim; and if gentlemen will do me the favor of referring to the Constitutions of New York, Michigan, and California, they will find in them identically the same provisions. I therefore opine, Mr. Chairman, that this resolve would not have found its way into the organic law of so many States, had it not been deemed a matter of great importance. Let us examine its provisions, for a moment, in detail; the resolve reads thus: "For the purpose of voting, no person shall be deemed to have gained or lost a residence by reason of his presence or absence, while employed in the army or navy of the United States, or while navigating the waters of this State, or of the United States, or of the high seas, or while a student of any seminary of learning." Now, I ask gentlemen schooled in the technicalities of law, to say what existing constitutional provision is there which prevents any officer, soldier, seaman, or marine, in the service of the United States, from voting in any town where they may be stationed, providing they come within the prescribed limit of time; but if I am told that by a fiction of law, the Navy Yard in Charlestown, and the forts in Boston harbor, are territories of the United States, and the inhabitants of such territories are subject only to the laws of the United States. I ask whether those territorial laws would follow them, if, by stress of circumstances, they were compelled to take shelter within the Commonwealth, for the space of one year? Clearly not; and their right of voting must be determined by the question of domicile, which is obscurely defined in our Constitution. With reference to this class of voters, provisions have been introduced into the Constitutions of nineteen States, which fact has led me to infer that it is not mere surplusage, as some gentlemen are inclined to regard it. And with reference to another class of voters, namely, those engaged in navigation, it seems to me that some constitutional provision ought to be made, declaratory of their domiciliary rights, as it should be the first duty of all governments to define clearly who should, and who should not exercise the elective franchise, and, as far as possible, to enumerate the contingencies affecting the right of suffrage. The opinion expressed by an eminent statesman, that an American vessel is a portion of American territory; and that wherever she may be, she carries aboard her American laws and American institutions, is now a maxim of international treaty and law. And this opinion is in conformity with the decisions of the courts in this State, that if a person had a domicile at the time of entering upon such service, that domicile remained unaffected by the reason of his absence, whatever the length of time occupied by the voyage.

The principle laid down, and to which I shall have occasion to refer hereafter, is, that mere absence for a temporary purpose works no forfeiture of domicile.

My remarks thus far, Mr. Chairman, are but prefatory, and designed merely to call the attention of the Convention to a few principles only, as affecting the multifarious questions which may arise on the subject of domicile.

I do not pretend that my constituents manifested any particular anxiety about some of the provisions of this resolve. They are far removed from any locality where such questions might arise; they have, therefore, only a general interest, as every person ought to have, that no individual having a right to vote should be deprived of that right, or exercise it illegally. But in the last clause of the resolve they have a deep and abiding interest; and of such importance did they deem it, as to declare that this alone, if adopted, would be to them of more real practical advantage than any, or all changes which might be made in the Constitution. Therefore, while the clause "nor while a student of any seminary of learning" is thought by some to be of little importance; they are awaiting with anxiety the issue, believing that it contains a remedy for many existing evils.

Tuesday,]

QUALIFICATION OF VOTERS.—DUNCAN.

[July 5th.

It has been hinted both in and out of the Convention that the introduction of this resolve had its origin in local, political animosity; I wish to disclaim it, yet I am free to say that the existing law of domicile, with the application of facts, in each particular case has been a subject of great perplexity with our municipal officers; and has frequently led to an unpleasant difference of opinion between the persons so claiming the right to vote, and the guardians of the elective franchise; but, I think I am justified in saying, that in no case has this right been refused, where a reasonable doubt did not exist. And personally, Mr. Chairman, as this is to be a matter of record, I wish to disclaim any feeling of hostility or unkindness towards the institution, in our town, or any of its officers, or any of its students. For years, my association with the undergraduates has been interrupted by no unpleasant circumstances; and among those now present, as among those who have graduated, I am happy to claim many cherished friends. But I cannot allow any friendship, however cherished, to come between me and the duty which I owe my constituents; it is for them and not for myself I act. The gentleman for Manchester, (Mr. Dana,) took occasion to ask, a few days since, in the course of debate, whether it were not a fact that the inhabitants of Williamstown were suffering from some smart which they thought this resolve would cure?

The tone of the remarks were such that, however unwilling I am to make answer to his interrogatory, I feel I cannot possibly avoid saying much, by way of vindication, that I would have gladly left unsaid.

There has been a feeling of hostility between the inhabitants of the town, and the college many years; for this hostility, there is no one particular reason; but a combination of reasons spread over the space of a half a century. Human prejudices and weakness are such, that it would not be surprising if the inhabitants, regarded with less favor the students of Williams' College, for having suffered from real, or supposed injuries at the hands of the corporation. Be that as it may, it is a sufficient answer to the gentleman for Manchester that it is not expected this resolve will "heal a passion or a pang," occasioned by any former grievance—but it is looked for with great interest to remedy the evils of the present, by isolating the institution as far as may be from the turbulence of political life. It had been the custom of the undergraduates to claim the right of voting in all of our elections without reference to any qualification but that of age; and when their claim was not allowed, there usually followed scenes of turmoil and confusion and the harmony of the town was broken. This state of things continued without abatement till 1842, when the inhabitants petitioned the legislature for the passage of an act to define more clearly what constituted a domicile. The legislature submitted to the supreme court the question found in the appendix to the fifth volume of Metcalf's Reports, and in the March term of 1843, the court returned the opinion therein contained.

That opinion, and I say it with deference, is much like the queen's message to parliament, capable of affording infinite speculation as to its true meaning, and consequently of little practical importance.

The real difficulty lays in the application of facts to the principles laid down in that report; and I have often been amused to see our municipal officers, with that report before them endeavor to adjust a question of domicile. There would be no great trouble if persons were willing to state the facts as they were when they told against them, but such is the weakness of human nature, even in students, that the real facts can seldom be got at. For instance, a student enters his name upon the catalogue as from ——— town; and at the close of each term goes to ——— and to all inquiries respecting domicile, or place of abode, replies that ——— is his home; but when election comes, "a change has come over the spirit of his dreams," and lo! ——— is no longer his home, but Williamstown. All at once, he discovers that he never had any other home than Williamstown, and the immense treasure which he had formerly boasted of now dwindles to nothing; and, a poll-tax would be burthensome, were it not that he expected some of his political friends to pay it for him. So the individual who a few days before scorned to acknowledge his domicile in Williamstown who boasted of his riches and his "pride of place," now takes those famous declarations all back—acknowledges his poverty—claims the inalienable right to vote, bullies the assessors and selectmen, and threatens to spend half his fortune if estopped from that inalienable right to vote where he has a mind to, which right his grandfather mayhap, fought, bled, and died for. This is but an epitome of every year's proceedings; save, however, when the political stripe of the students correspond with the board of town officers, and then no questions are asked; but every student's name is placed upon the tax-list without reference to any other qualification than that of age. In this connection, I am bold to say that hundreds of illegal votes have been cast, where one, having a right to vote was prevented; and I ask those gentlemen who say this is a mere local political question, whether the whole State has not an interest in the elections? and while I say it I have the gentleman in my eye who was twice elected by a single vote. Are forty or fifty illegal votes of no importance, then, when one has twice made a governor in this Commonwealth? But the interference of students in the policies of the town works to them a positive injury. To secure the privilege of voting, they resort to subterfuges which, on any other subject, they would unhesitatingly condemn; but the motto "that all is fair in politics" makes them forget those nice principles of ethics which the worthy faculty are at such pains to inculcate. For instance, in 1848 in the election of representative some twenty or more voted, when it was perfectly obvious they had voted without the least shadow of legality.

The right of the member elect to hold his seat in the legislature was contested; and a commission was appointed to take the depositions of the persons voting. On his arrival, summons were placed in the hands of the sheriff, who put forth his best endeavors to serve them, but was prevented by the persons keeping out of sight, and hiding away; at length he succeeded in summoning one, and the examination commenced, but how did it end? Why, after resorting to expedients, alike dishonorable to the witnesses, and their aiders and abettors, they declared on their oaths, "they did not know who they voted for!" Was such an absurdity believed for a moment?

Could it be? And yet, young men, preparing for missionary labors among the heathen! testified under oath to what the most credulous man in christendom couldn't believe. I have said elsewhere, in substance, that I have no desire to make any statement which shall reflect injuriously or unkindly upon the students, faculty or college. But I feel that no important fact should be withheld from any morbid sympathy to the prejudice of my constituents, who are interested in this resolve.

Passing over many minor irritations I come down to the election of 1852. The assessors refused to assess all who were not, in their opinion, inhabitants of the town, leaving out of sight, as they ought, the mere question of presence on which they usually claim the right to vote.

On the day of election, many of them assembled in the town house as usual, with every variety of intention, from behaving quietly to enjoying the luxury of kicking up a row. After the polls had been open more than two hours, a motion was made to turn the ballot-box, and declared, by the Chairman of the Selectmen, as carried; but, after they had commenced counting the votes, a motion was made to reconsider the motion whereby they agreed to turn the box, but the motion to reconsider, was ruled by the Chairman to be out of order, and the count proceeded. The students, feeling piqued at their names being left off the list of voters, and, being incensed at what they deemed the unparliamentary ruling of the Chairman of the Selectmen, they assembled in disguise, in the night time, in front of his dwelling, and proceeded to burn him in effigy. Had he been a timid man, it might have passed off quietly, but having some dislike, nay, prejudice if you please, against being burned in effigy, he sallied forth, single-handed and alone, and, amid a shower of missiles, and repeated blows from bludgeons, he succeeded in wresting the effigy from them and bearing it off. The examination of the articles of clothing of which it was composed, gave a clue to the rioters; and, to prevent the instituting of legal proceedings, the affair was compromised by the payment of three hundred dollars. It was a source of deep regret to the worthy president, inasmuch as, it was known that some of the most moral young men in college were engaged in the riot! Now I ask the Convention, if a salutary provision can be inserted into the Constitution, which will lessen the irritation heretofore existing between the college and town, if it is not wise to do so?

But, I am asked, "if it is not in the power of the faculty, under the existing régime, to prevent all the evils at present complained of?" I answer, doubtlessly it is—the faculty might enforce the college laws if they saw fit, but the enforcement of law is always unpleasant, and when none but citizens are annoyed, every mitigating circumstance is kindly taken into consideration, lest injustice might be done the students—I speak of this as the general impression among the inhabitants, "that the faculty are less mindful of the conduct of the students towards the towns-folks, than they ought to be."

But this resolve, if passed, will more completely isolate them from the town, and prevent these disturbances in a great measure, which have heretofore taken place between the students and inhabitants; and, if this could be done, I doubt not the faculty would hail it with joy. Much more might be said, and will be, I trust, by abler men; and, in making these crude remarks, I feel that I have imperfectly done justice to a subject of great importance, and my only apology is, that I have spoken without preparation, and extended these remarks much farther than I had intended. When I arose, it was my design only to say a few words by way of explanation; but if, in the course of my remarks, I have said anything I ought not to have said, it is too late to recall it now, and I can only repeat what I have said before, that personally, I have no feeling of unkindness against any person or persons to whom I have alluded.

QUALIFICATION OF VOTERS. — WALKER — SARGENT.

I state these matters, that the members of the Convention may know what the feelings of the inhabitants of the town of Williamstown are, and that they regard this simple provision as of more importance to them, than all the other changes which may be made in the Constitution. I do not suppose that gentlemen of this Convention can feel so much interest in this matter as we do. There are but few towns in the Commonwealth where such institutions exist, and in those a different state of things may exist than with us, and greater harmony of feeling may prevail between the inhabitants of such towns, and the students of those institutions. But, unfortunately that is not our case. We have been differently situated, and, as I remarked in the outset, I brought forward this matter by the express instructions of my constituents, whose wishes I am bound to respect, and, as far as may be in my power, to carry out. I hope, therefore, that the resolve will be adopted, and that the amendment will be rejected.

Mr. WALKER, of North Brookfield. It will be well, perhaps, to look to the history of the resolves now before the Convention. The first of these two resolves is the same as was the third resolve in the original Report of the Committee to whom this matter was referred. While those original resolves were pending, a member moved the amendment which is contained in the second resolve now before us. Under these circumstances, as the two matters were not at all necessarily connected, it was thought best to refer the whole subject again to the Committee. It was so referred, and the Committee have reported back the two matters in separate resolves.

As regards the first resolve, as has been stated, the provisions of it are contained in the Constitutions of many of the States. Nineteen of them have the general provisions of the first resolution, and some contain the precise language which we have used. I think the gentleman from Williamstown, (Mr. Duncan,) has entirely satisfied us, as he did the Committee who reported this subject, that these are desirable provisions, that no harm can result from them, and that they ought to be adopted. I think the facts he has narrated, in relation to the action of the students at Williamstown, is sufficient to satisfy us that it is not for the good of the people of that place, and especially that it is not good for the students themselves, that their relations should be such as would tend to bring them into conflict with the officers of the town, or involve them in acts of riot and disorder. It is a great detriment to the interests of the students, to allow them to mix up with the politics of the town, as it withdraws their attention from the immediate objects they have in view, in connecting themselves with institutions of learning. It is, to my mind, very clear, that it ought not to be said that this provision deprives many of them of their right to vote, for that is not true; for, if they are inhabitants of other towns, they retain their right to vote where they rightfully belong. It only prevents those persons who connect themselves with such institutions as students, from taking part in the municipal affairs of the places in which they have no real interest. As a general thing, they have only been brought out at times when party spirit has run high, and when parties have been nearly balanced. At such times politicians are able, by going to the colleges, to get aid enough to carry their schemes, and I submit, whether such a course is for the interests, either of the people of the towns, or of the students themselves? I believe it is not. I believe that this resolve ought to be adopted as it stands, and that the amendment should be rejected.

Mr. SARGENT, of Cambridge. It seems to me, Sir, that the whole of the first resolution is unnecessary, certainly all except that part which it is proposed to strike out. I think I am correct in saying that all the other cases, except that, are already fully provided for, and that I think I am borne out by the decisions of the court which have heretofore been made upon questions arising on those cases.

In regard to the part which is proposed to be stricken out, I think it should go with the other part of the resolve, and that all of it should be stricken out; first, because I believe that all the rest of the resolution is entirely unnecessary, and second, because I believe the part proposed to be stricken out, to be unjust. Now, Sir, we provide in the Constitution that any male citizen of the age of twenty-one years, who shall have resided in the Commonwealth one year, and in the town where he claims a right to vote, six months last past, and shall have paid a tax, shall be entitled to vote. Now, Sir, that refers to no particular class of individuals. It is a broad, general provision. It says, "any male citizen over twenty-one years of age," &c. Now what is proposed by this resolve? You propose to say to one class of the inhabitants of Massachusetts, that though you may have resided in this or that place one, two, three, or four years, yet if you reside there for the purpose of obtaining an education you shall be deprived of the privilege of exercising that civil right. Let us see how such a provision will operate. Suppose a man comes into the town of Williamstown, which feels so much aggrieved in this matter, to enter himself as a student in Williams' College. He is twenty-one years of age. Another man comes into the same town, and lets himself out as a hired man, with no idea of remaining any definite time, and it is wholly accidental whether he remains there a year, or less, or more. He remains there one year and perhaps another. You give him a right to vote, while you deprive the other of that right. No provision is made here to put them upon an equal footing. It is the home of the hired man for the time being, and so it is the home of the student for the time being. When the Constitution provides that a man shall decide where his home is, it does not provide that he shall decide that he intends to continue it as his home for one day longer. It is enough for him, if it is his home on the day when he claims a right to vote, and he is not called upon to say whether he intends to leave to-morrow or not. If I recollect aright, a case of this kind which arose in Amherst College, came in question before congress, upon a contested seat in the House of Representatives. It was referred to a Committee, and the Committee being of the political party of the contestant, decided at once that the man casting the vote, having resided in the State one year, having resided in Amherst six months, and paid a tax assessed within two years, had complied with the requirements of the Constitution, and it was not necessary for him to contemplate remaining another day in that place of residence, in order to entitle him to a right to vote. Now I cannot see how we can, with justice, say to one class of citizens, you shall have the right to exercise the elective franchise, and to another similarly situated, that you shall not. There are thousands who vote in this State every year, who have not the remotest idea of remaining here any particular length of time. Our brickyards in Cambridge are every year full of that class of men, who spend their summers there, and disperse in the fall. Yet, having no other domicile and having resided there the time required by the Constitution, they were always permitted to vote, and they alone are the ones to determine whether that be their domicile or not. I undertake to say that no man, except the man who claims the right to vote, can decide that question. When the question is put to him, "is this your place of residence, your home," and he answers, "yes," I should like to know the power that can dispute it. Who else can decide whether that be his home or not.

Now it is said that there is a great deal of difficulty with the students at Williamstown. I happen to reside in a city where we have a large college, and more students, I presume, than they have in Williamstown, and we have not the least difficulty with them in the world. And why? We do not try, and never have tried to deprive them of their civil rights. We award to them all the privileges given to them by the Constitution, and we have no difficulty with them whatever. I think if my friend from Williamstown, (Mr. Duncan,) and his constituents will pursue the same course, he will find those young gentlemen mild, amiable, and among the best citizens, and find them no longer burning their town officers in effigy.

Mr. DUNCAN. I would ask the gentleman if those mild and amiable young men did not attempt to blow up one of their college buildings with a bomb shell?

Mr. SARGENT. I was speaking of them as citizens, and in regard to the exercise of their public rights, and their action in our public meetings. I have no doubt boys are boys, and if Williamstown is so bad as they say it is, it might be well to blow it up. I speak of them when they come to the polls, and to other public places. When they mingle with the citizens on those occasions, they are as gentlemanly, peaceable, and as good citizens as we have. I think this class ought not to be deprived of their rights. I believe when a student at a seminary decides that to be his home for the time being, having no other domicile, he is as much entitled to vote, as the laboring man who decides the place where he labors is his home while he labors there. I cannot vote for any resolution which proposes to deprive any citizen of the elective franchise. I therefore move to strike out all of the first resolve.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would state that the motion is not strictly in order at this time, but will be after the disposition of the pending motion.

Mr. MORTON, of Taunton. I would ask the Chair what the precise motion now before the Committee is.

The CHAIRMAN. It is the motion to strike out from the first resolve the words "or while a student of any seminary of learning."

Mr. MORTON. I understood that to be the motion before the Committee, but as all parts are somewhat connected, I desire to make a few remarks in relation the whole proposition. When this proposition was first presented to my mind I entertained great doubt whether it ought to be adopted or not. I was rather inclined to suppose that it ought not to be adopted, but some reflection upon the subject, and especially the discussion of the matter in opposition to the resolution, has brought me to the conclusion that it is expedient to retain the whole. I think there is not the slightest question but what precisely the same rule of law now prevails, that will prevail if this resolution is adopted. I will neither add to, nor take from the law as it now stands, and the question which presented itself to my mind was, whether it was expedient to substitute a constitutional law for a statute law.

But, before I say anything upon that point, I will briefly present my views in relation to the resolve. It relates to the qualification of four classes of persons; to soldiers in the army, and sailors in the navy of the United States, to sailors in the merchant service, and to students in seminaries of learning.

I take it that the law is well settled by the decisions of our judicial tribunals that the first class viz.: soldiers in the army of the United States, wherever they may be stationed, do not, by a change of their station, thereby change their home and domicile. They may, or they may not do it, but the fact that they have, by order, removed from one place to another, does not of itself give them a different domicile, nor is it a circumstance in determining where their domicile is. That soldiers thus situated cannot, by considering their home where they may be, make that their home, is a proposition too plain to be discussed before this Committee. Their domicile must depend entirely upon other circumstances, and wherever that may be, they are there entitled to vote.

The same rule applies to sailors in the service of the United States. Wherever they may be ordered, and however long they may be absent from their original domicile, they still retain it until they gain another somewhere else. The fact of his sailing in different parts of the world, or of being absent a longer or a shorter time in foreign or domestic ports is not a fact to effect their domicile, or in any measure to establish it.

Then there are other classes of sailors, such as those in the merchant service, in the common fisheries and in the whale fisheries, whose employment sometimes takes them away from their homes for four or five years. They come within the same rule. Let them be absent ever so long from their home here, still they retain it as long their domicile, until they acquire one somewhere else. The mere fact of their absence in foreign ports, of itself does not deprive them of their home here. It may be that by stopping abroad and remaining, they may acquire a home there, and that would deprive them of their former domicile.

Then, Sir, we come to the last class of persons affected by this resolve—the class composed of students in colleges and other seminaries of learning, and though it may be difficult to decide all questions which may arise in relation to these, yet the same principles of law apply. The mere fact that a person becomes a student in your town, does not, of itself, according to this resolve, establish his domicile there. The only provision here is, not that he shall not acquire a domicile while a student in a seminary, but that, the fact that a student is engaged as such in a university shall not, of itself, make him a voter.

Now, there are, no doubt, a great many students in the different universities and seminaries of learning, who do not consider the places where these seminaries are located, as their home, and who never intend to make them their home. There are, also, undoubtedly, some individuals connected with these seminaries, who do intend to make them their home, and there may be some difficulty in determining in these cases where their home or their domicile is. But it seems to me that this resolve, of itself, is not to determine the student's qualification, nor to ascertain where his domicile is. You must take into view all the circumstances of the case in determining that. But, in this case, the student stands, in that respect, precisely with the hired man. It is very rare—and, perhaps it never happens—that a man's intention is to change his domicile, or have any essential effect in determining any question in relation thereto. There may be, and undoubtedly are, cases in relation to wills, or the disposition of property, where the intention of the party may be inquired into in order to settle where his home is; but not so with a man claiming an interest by virtue of his residence.

All the circumstances connected with the domicile of the student must be inquired into—the circumstances of the place where he was when he entered college; the circumstances attending his residence in that place. You must throw the burden of proof upon him, because, until a man acquires a residence in some other place, he retains the domicile of his birth. That always remains and adheres to him until evidence is furnished that he has acquired a residence somewhere else.

I think it is perfectly sound, perfectly in accordance with the provisions of law, and perfectly in accordance with this resolve, that he shall not, by reason of his residence as a student, gain the right to vote in that place. If there is any difference of opinion in regard to the construction of the present law, I think this resolve states the case so strongly, that there cannot possibly be a difference of opinion with regard to it. It provides that, the mere fact of his residence as a student shall not give him the right to vote.

This principle was so well settled by law, that I entertained, at first, a good deal of doubt whether it was expedient to put such a provision into the Constitution; not that I had any doubt about the principle itself, but I thought we ought to be very cautious how we put provisions into the Constitution which did not relate to the great principles of fundamental law; and inasmuch as this was a well settled principle of law, I thought perhaps it would be better to allow it to remain as such. But when I came to reflect that in the formation of our government, the very first step we took was to decide upon the qualification of voters, I thought it was perfectly proper and expedient to go on and establish the details of that right in a manner that everybody could understand, and in a place where the selectmen and others could find it without difficulty, could become familiar with it, and could apply it in all cases requiring its application that come before them. I am aware that this matter of convenience to the selectmen, to which I have alluded, has been made the subject of ridicule in this Convention, and I would not bring it in as a consideration entitled to very great weight in the determination of this subject. But if there are other considerations sufficient to establish the principle, I think that even the matter of convenience to our town officers is a matter entitled to some slight consideration in our actions as a Convention.

With these remarks I leave the subject. I hope the amendment now before the Committee will not prevail, because, in the practical operation of this resolve, I think it is more important to retain this provision than either of the others, inasmuch as it is a matter about which there seems to have been some difficulty heretofore.

Before I sit down, I will indicate my desire to have these resolutions acted upon separately, because in relation to the second resolution, I entertain great doubt whether it should be adopted. In fact, I think it ought not to be.

On motion of Mr. BIRD, of Walpole, the Committee then rose, and the President having resumed the Chair of

THE CONVENTION,

The chairman, Mr. Giles, of Boston, reported progress, and asked that the Committee have leave to sit again.

Leave was granted.

On motion, the Convention adjourned until three o'clock, P. M.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The Convention reassembled at three o'clock.

Qualifications of Voters.

On motion of Mr. BREED, of Lynn, the Convention resolved itself into

COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE,

Mr. Giles, of Boston, in the Chair, and resumed the consideration of the Report of the Committee on the Qualifications of Voters, the question pending being upon the motion to strike out, at the close of the first resolution the words, "or while a student of any seminary of learning."

Mr. SUMNER, for Otis. I hope the motion to strike out will not prevail. I do not apprehend that anything can be added in this discussion to the very full and clear argument which was submitted this morning by the gentlemen from Taunton, (Mr. Morton). It seems to me that he in this instance touched every point in the case with his usual clearness and ability. But I desire nevertheless to say a few words upon the subject.

It is said, in the first place, that the report—I speaking more particularly of the first resolution, which I propose to treat as a whole, as well as in reference to the particular amendment now pending—I say it is said that this resolution is simply declarative of the law as it now stands. Well, Sir, that is a true statement of the case, but it does not strike me as any objection at all to incorporating the provision into the organic law of the land, because it is so declared by law. Why, Sir, many of the most important articles in our Bill of Rights are simply declarative of our civil rights; but they are not the less valuable in their place, and it is considered not the less necessary or desirable by all men that they should retain their places there. So, in relation to the Declaration of Independence. It is merely a declaration; a mere recital, a mere rehearsal of our civil rights, and rights, too, which were familiar to the men who framed and adopted that declaration—our fathers of the Revolution—long before they gathered them together and embodied them in that instrument, but that is no reason for abolishing the Declaration of Independence.

The whole case, as embraced in the first resolve, seems to stand upon this principle: that the quarters of the soldier, the harbor of the sailor, and the college or other literary institution of the scholar, is not his home. That is the principle embodied in that resolution. These students go there for a particular purpose, for a particular object, and for that particular purpose and object alone. They do not go there for the purpose of acquiring that place as their residence or home. They attend a seminary of learning, just as a representative attends the general court in the city of Boston to transact the business committed to him, and not for the purpose of gaining a domicile; just as the members of this Convention from the country attend in this hall, not for the purpose of acquiring a home here, but for the purpose of attending to the business committed to them.

It is proposed, I believe, to so amend the Constitution as to make a three months' residence in any place sufficient to entitle a man to vote in any place, to claim it as his residence or home, yet no one, I apprehend, would claim that a representative coming to this city and remaining for three months would be entitled to vote in the city of Boston. But according to the arguments of some gentlemen upon this floor, a representative remaining in this city for three months—and it is by no means a rare occurrence—might very well claim the right to vote in the municipal elections of Boston.

Sir, there is no doubt about the fact that a student coming to a place for a merely temporary purpose, as I have indicated, does not acquire a home in that place. The catalogues of your colleges and other institutions of learning show how that fact is. They exhibit the fact that Mr. Senior A, Mr. Sophomore B, and Master Freshman C, have their homes perhaps in the different States in the Union, yet it is undoubtedly a fact that these same Seniors, Sophomores and Freshmen have been known to claim the right of voting in the different towns in which they may happen to have a residence merely as students, and not only have they claimed the right, but without law and against law, they have in many instances obtained the privilege of voting.

Now, the proposition is to declare in the Constitution what the law is upon that subject, so that it may be familiar to all as an evidence that the college or academy is not their home. They come there and remain until vacation, and then return to their homes. Now, is it right, under these circumstances, that gentlemen thus situated should be allowed to interfere in the municipal and other elections of the towns in which they happen thus temporarily to reside? What interest have they there? Simply an interest in acquiring an education; simply an interest connected with their duty in obeying the orders of their tutors or of the professors and officers of the college or academy, of attending to their lessons, of obtaining an education and then of returning to their homes.

Now, I repeat, is it right that the students in your seminaries of learning should have the right to vote in the places where they may be thus temporarily located, any more than it is that the sailor in your harbor, or the soldier in your barracks, or the representative in your legislature, who may happen to reside in a place for three or six months, as the case may be, in attending to their legislative or other duties should have the right to vote? They have no interest in the municipal concerns of the town in which they may happen to be placed. They have no interest in the schools, the roads, the bridges, or anything of the kind, in that town. Is it right, then, that under any circumstances they should be allowed to control the election of the municipal officers of that town, and then of the county and minor State officers, and even of the governor himself, so far as the vote of that town is concerned?

Now, Sir, I hope that the amendment which has been offered will not prevail, but that the resolution, as reported by the Committee, will be adopted for another reason, and that is, the one presented by the gentleman from Cambridge, (Mr. Sargent). I understand from that gentleman, that in the town where he resides, a very liberal policy has been pursued with regard to allowing the right of voting to students in the University at that place. I do not mean to be understood as saying that, I suppose an intentionally improper liberality was allowed. Certainly no such thing could have been allowed in that town if the officers were acting under the advice of the learned gentleman who has just taken his seat. But I infer, from his statement, that it sometimes happens in practice, in that town, that persons are allowed to vote who, according to the laws of the Commonwealth, strictly speaking, have no right to vote there. But, if that happens in some of the towns of this Commonwealth from not clearly understanding what the law is upon that subject, I propose that it shall be put into the Constitution, so that every man who runs may read, so that our town officers may know precisely what their duty is in relation to these cases.

These, Sir, in brief, are the views which I entertain in relation to this subject. This resolve is, I repeat, merely declarative of what the law now is. But I do not conceive that there is a necessity in Massachusetts, as it seems there is in many of the other States of the Union, for incorporating such a provision into our Constitution; indeed, a majority of the States have incorporated such a provision into their Constitutions, and I trust such a provision will be incorporated into the Constitution of Massachusetts.

Mr. CHAPIN, of Worcester. I do not know as I understand the reasons which governed the Committee in making this report, but it does seem to me that this amendment should prevail. If I understand the argument of the gentleman who has just taken his seat, (Mr. Sumner,) the students who are engaged in acquiring an education in any of the towns of this Commonwealth, are not under any circumstances to be supposed to have any interest, whatever, in the affairs of the place where they are pursuing their studies, nor are they to be permitted to exercise any of the rights of a citizen in that place. Well, Sir, is that statement precisely in accordance with the facts as they exist? Sir, you and I have known many young men who have left their homes, and everything therewith connected behind them, and embarked in the pursuit of obtaining an education, who really, to all intents and purposes, seemed to become citizens of the place where they were getting their education, and who remained there through their academical or collegiate studies, and eventually settled there. But, if I understand this argument, it would preclude every one of these persons from acquiring the right to vote until he had ceased to be a student. I do not know that I am not mistaken, but this seems to me to be the only reasonable construction that can be placed upon it.

Now, Sir, is it to be argued that a young man, who is a mechanic, coming into a place, and residing there three or six months, as the case may be, will become so well acquainted with, and so much interested in the affairs of that place as to qualify him to become a legal voter, while a student in a seminary of learning, twenty-one, twenty-five, or thirty years of age, coming there at the same time, and residing there the same period, cannot acquire the capacity necessary to qualify him for exercising the privileges of a legal voter? It does not seem to me that such a position can be sustained for a moment. The Constitution, as I understand it, puts all voters upon the same footing, and, as I understand it, the only question when a man presents himself at the polls is, whether he has come to the place to reside, whether he has resided there the length of time prescribed by the Constitution; and if the same provision which now exists continues in force, whether he has paid the taxes assessed upon him for two years? That is perfectly clear. It is easy to understand. There is no misunderstanding the provisions of the present law upon the subject, and I can therefore see no good reason for making any new constitutional provisions in relation to the matter. For these reasons I hope the amendment will prevail.

Mr. BISHOP, of Lenox. The resolution, as reported by the Committee, is, in my judgment, precisely what the Convention should adopt, without any amendment whatever. In the first place, it secures the uninterrupted right of suffrage, and in the second place, it determines, definitely, who is to vote and who is not. For this double purpose the clause which this amendment proposes to strike out was inserted in this resolve. Will it accomplish that purpose?

If it will, although it may be the declaratory law of the land, although it may be a mere reiteration of what is now understood to be the law of the land, I think for the sake of certainty, and to secure the uninterrupted right of the voter, and to protect the tribunal who is to determine who shall and who shall not vote, it should be inserted in plain, distinct, and legible language in the Constitution. If I believed, as my friend from

Cambridge, (Mr. Sargent,) professes to believe, that this trenched upon the right of voting, that it abridged the elective franchise in any degree whatever, I would go shoulder to shoulder with him in my opposition to it. But so far from that, it secures the right of the voter, it maintains his right uninterrupted for a single hour. What is proposed? Is it proposed to change, or rather destroy the domicile? That would be impossible. Every man while he breathes, according to our law, has a domicile. It merely proposes this: that under certain circumstances the domicile shall be fixed, that there shall be no question in relation to it. Individuals who are off upon the waters, and who are not to return immediately, are not to be affected in their domicile, but all their rights attach to that domicile. Individuals who may be abroad, and necessarily abroad for a long period, in a foreign country, where they do not intend to reside, will not have their rights affected in the slightest degree, if the law, as it now exists, continues in force. To rid the matter of difficulty entirely, here are certain classes, in relation to whom we propose to insert a constitutional provision. Is my friend from Cambridge, (Mr. Sargent,) right when he says it takes away the right of suffrage. Is he correct when he states here, upon this floor, that an individual may be deprived of an essential political right? No, Sir, this resolution proposes, as I have said before, to fix the domicile and the place in which he may exercise that right. It does not propose to strip him of the right. It says you are a pupil now attending a collegiate or other institution of learning. Your residence may depend in a great degree upon your purposes and intentions, and they are in the chambers of your heart. Facts and circumstances may indicate one thing, but your purposes may be directed to another. It does not take away his right? He may go to his own domicile and there exercise his right of suffrage, the right of a freeman, and vote for whom he pleases. This is not an abridgement of the right of franchise. It merely limits the place in which that right is exercised, and it does so properly. Therefore, I contend, that instead of abridging the right of suffrage, this proposition enlarges it. Take the gentleman's doctrine, for instance. A student in college is ordinarily there four years. He may enter after he has attained his majority: he must, unless he is a resident of Cambridge or Williamstown—for I mention no particular institution of learning, I have no personal feeling in regard to the subject, whatever—after he has had his domicile in Cambridge or Williamstown for the last four years, if an inhabitant of the Commonwealth, remain six months longer before he can vote. He is abridged, therefore, of this privilege for which the gentleman contends, in consequence of going to college one-fourth part of the time. Here is one entire year in which he does exercise this right of voting. I apprehend that this is fixed upon to settle the question of a domicile, and it is nothing more, and to relieve the matter from uncertainty, does not in the slightest degree abridge the right of any individual. It has been said, that students resort to colleges for temporary purposes, which is true. That has been well and clearly illustrated by my friend for Otis, (Mr. Sumner). They go there not to reside, but with a fixed purpose of returning to their homes, or going elsewhere, after the period of their pupilage shall have ended. A hired man goes to work out of the town in which he has had his domicile, but he may intend to remain there. If the town in which he has had his domicile is retained as his domicile, why there is his proper place to vote most unquestionably, for there is his residence, there is his home, and there he must exercise the right of suffrage. But if he abandons that domicile, and goes to another place for the purpose of working upon wages for five, six, or more months of a year, there should be his home, if there is no declared purpose of return. He may not intend to remain there during his whole life, or for any considerable period, but if inducements be offered in the line of his occupation sufficient to retain him there, then he will remain. Such is not the case with the student. He goes with the predetermined purpose of abandoning the institution, and the town in which it is located, just so soon as the purposes of his education shall have been accomplished. But I have another reason, and it is one which has considerable force upon my own mind. Who are to settle the great and important question of the right to vote? The selectmen of the several towns. It is said that the law upon this subject is perfectly plain. The law is just as plain as it can be made. That is not the difficulty in any case, or in but very few cases. The facts to which that law is to be applied create the difficulty. Here are facts presented, and after all, the question of a domicile is a question of intent and purpose. If the facts should indicate that the person who offers himself as a voter had not his domicile within the town in which he proposes to vote, still if his purpose is declared of making that town his domicile, what are the selectmen to do? To take his declared purpose, as the gentleman from Cambridge says? Most undoubtedly that is a safe rule. But there is a difficulty in relation to this subject; that the selectmen are peculiarly situated. If they were judges of the court of common law they would not be answerable for any misjudgment in relation to the matter, but they are not so. They are compelled to serve as selectmen under a penalty, and are compelled to take an oath. When an individual offers himself as a voter to be placed on the check list, what are they to do? They cannot refuse to pass upon the questions that are presented. They must act as judges in relation to this matter, and what is the result of an error of judgment. The supreme court have decided that to deprive an individual of his right to vote, subjects the selectmen to an action at law, and damages may be recovered, limited only by the discretion of the jury. Ought not the selectmen of the several towns who determine this matter, to have this matter made as plain to them as it can be. They may act honestly, they may take all the necessary pains to inform themselves, they may be studious to walk in the right path, and that only, and still err in such a way as shall expose them to a suit at law, and they are answerable in damages. Let this same question be presented to a judge of the supreme court, or to a judge of the court of common pleas. He gives his decision upon the subject, and if it is an error, who can touch him, he is protected by the law from any error of judgment, and the consequences of that judgment. Not so with the selectmen of the towns. Therefore, I say, that whatever can be clearly defined and settled in the Constitution in regard to this matter, should be so settled. I am aware that there have been decisions upon this subject over and over again, but the only question which creates any perplexity, is that of the domicile. That question alone has led to all the exposures to which the selectmen have been subjected; it is the mere question of domicile. Now, I contend that other States having seen fit to make this matter clear by protecting those officers whom they compel to serve, whom they compel to judge, and who cannot be excused from serving without an exposure to fine, who have taken their oaths, and by their oaths are compelled to pass judgment upon the matters presented to them, that they ought to be protected here in every possible way from any suits at law, or any claims for damages which may arise. It is a matter of some considerable importance. If cases of the kind rarely occurred, if they had an existence only in a few places, it would be a matter worth not so much consideration as now. But, there is no State in the Union to which more persons resort from abroad for educational purposes, than Massachusetts. There are fewer States in the Union where young men leave their homes and resort to places of public instruction than in Massachusetts. When young men, both from abroad and inhabitants of this State, are members of colleges and other literary institutions, this question of their right to vote, arises not unfrequently, and it is an exceedingly perplexing one to the tribunal that is appointed to decide upon the right of the voter. Therefore, to clear two things, one, the right to vote without interruption, and the other to clear the tribunal that is compelled to pass upon and pronounce upon that right, from danger and exposure to prosecution, I am decidedly in favor of putting this resolution in a constitutional form, and inserting it in the Constitution as one of the fundamental and organic laws.

MR. SARGENT, of Cambridge. The gentleman from Lenox, (Mr. Bishop,) refers to the remarks I made, and says, that I am not quite right in asserting that this might abridge the right of voters. In answer to my objection, he has referred to one class of voters. The gentleman will find in all our colleges and seminaries of learning, three classes of individuals. One, a class that may have a home in the Commonwealth. Another, a class of citizens belonging to the Commonwealth, that have no other home than the one where they reside for the time being. Another class who are the citizens of other States, and have abandoned that home when they come to reside at our colleges and seminaries of learning. It is true, that under this provision, the right of the first class should not be abridged, because they might return to the town where they had their home and vote. I ask the gentleman from Lenox, (Mr. Bishop,) if under this provision, if it be incorporated into the Constitution, any student at a seminary of learning can obtain the right to vote in the town where he resides merely as a student. It says "that for the purpose of voting no person shall be deemed to have gained or lost residence while a student at any seminary of learning." I ask if any man residing as a student in any seminary of learning in this Commonwealth can gain the right of residence and of voting while remaining there. If he cannot, then, this provision will disfranchise every man who has no other residence in the Commonwealth. That is the difficulty I have in relation to this matter. I had no difficulty on account of the class of the voters to which the gentleman from Lenox refers. If no citizen can gain a residence in consequence of residing at any seminary of learning, when he goes there to reside, and yields up his residence in the town which he left, then I submit he is disfranchised just so long as he remains at that seminary of learning.

If he comes here from another State, being twenty-one years of age, and having no home left behind him, as a vast majority of young men have none; if he cannot acquire a residence, then I submit that he is disfranchised?

Mr. BISHOP. While a resident student, he cannot vote. If he come from Hingham to Cambridge for the purpose of study, they may say to him, you may go to Hingham and vote there.

Mr. SARGENT. What will the gentleman do with those who come from New Hampshire; will they remain here four years without the right to vote?

Mr. BISHOP. They can go to New Hampshire and vote there.

Mr. SARGENT. But I do not see, when you have placed a provision in the Constitution that a man shall have resided in the State one year, and in the town where he proposes to vote, six or three months, and when he declares that he has no home in any other place, why he should not have a right to vote, or why you should say that he shall have a home where he has none.

Mr. BISHOP. When he comes here for the purpose of study he may retain the home which he has in another place.

Mr. SARGENT. Then, you say that the citizens of the Commonwealth, save the class of students, may remove their domicile whenever and wherever they please, but as students, they shall not remove. And you put that into the Constitution, you point him to his old home, and say, you will not permit him to depart and carry his civil rights with him.

I supposed that would be the construction which the gentleman would put upon it; and I supposed that every board of selectmen in the Commonwealth, if you pass that resolve, would decide at once, that no person residing at a seminary of learning could be a legal voter in the town where the seminary is situated. Now, I say, that it disfranchises every man who is not a Massachusetts man by birth; and, I think that if he had not resided in the place where the seminary was, three years, the selectmen would not register his name and permit him to vote. I cannot vote for such a resolution.

Mr. PARKER, of Cambridge. If the honorable gentleman from Lenox will give me leave, I desire to ask him what construction he puts upon the resolution, as to its effect in relation to students particularly; whether if this provision is incorporated into the Constitution, a student in a seminary of learning can have the right of voting in the place where the seminary is situated.

Mr. BISHOP. If his domicile is in a place which would prevent it he cannot. If he had a domicile there before, he might vote.

Mr. PARKER. Suppose he goes to the place where the seminary is situated, under such circumstances that if he had any other purpose than that of study, the removal would suffice to change his domicile—will his domicile be changed? or, will this provision prevent him from voting?

Mr. BISHOP. If he is not a mere student, if he goes there as a printer, it will not prevent him from voting; but, if he goes there for the mere purpose of study, it will.

Mr. PARKER. I speak of the case where he goes for the purpose of study and not for the purpose of printing, and where he goes under circumstances which would suffice, if he went for any other purpose, to effect a change of his domicile, and I want to know whether under the construction which the gentleman from Lenox puts upon the provision, he would have a right to vote.

Mr. BISHOP. If he went for the purpose of study solely and exclusively, he would not have the right to vote. I give you the law just as it is.

Mr. PARKER. The question is, what will be the law, if this provision takes the shape of a constitutional enactment. I wish to understand whether the gentleman from Lenox puts the same construction upon it that the honorable gentleman from Taunton did, and if he does not, then I wish to understand wherein they differ, for if we insert a new provision into the Constitution it is well to know what is to be effected by it and what it means. If there is that uncertainty about it which leads the gentleman from Lenox to put one construction upon it which will exclude a student from voting, who comes from any other place to that in which an institution of learning is situated during the time of his connection with that institution; and, if the gentleman from Taunton puts upon the same language another and a very different construction which will make it of no more importance than a piece of blank paper, I think it furnishes a good reason why we should pause before we make a constitutional provision of that character. I understand the gentleman from Lenox,—(and I so understood him from his argument, I merely put the question that I might be sure and not misinterpret what he said)—to maintain this proposition: that if this provision is inserted in the Constitution, a person who comes from another place where he has a domicile, to a place in which a seminary of learning is situated, and in which, before the time when he thus changes his inhabitaney, he had not a domicile, and comes under all the circumstances of one intending to change his domicile, if he came for any other purpose than that of being a student, connected with a literary institution, will be deprived of the right of voting there, because his domicile is not to be changed by reason of his presence there as a student in a seminary of learning. If that is the construction, it makes a rule different from that which applies to any other citizens in the Commonwealth, unless it be those mentioned in the other part of this resolution. Because, when other persons—persons who come for the purpose of labor, persons who, to use the language of the gentleman from Lenox, come for the purpose of printing,—thus change their residence, their domicile will be changed for all purposes, so that if a person should go to Williamstown as a printer, with the intention of making that his home for the time being indefinitely, he would have the right to vote there when he had resided there the prescribed time; but, an individual who went to that place from the very same town from which the other came, if he went there for the purpose of pursuing his studies in the seminary of learning, would not have the right to vote there. His domicile would not be changed for that purpose, because of the object for which he went, because of the fact that he went there as a student and not as a printer.

Is there any reason why this difference should exist between the two classes of individuals? Sir, I did not so understand the honorable gentleman from Taunton this forenoon. I understood him to say, that it meant that the mere presence of an individual as a student in a seminary of learning, should not be sufficient to give him the right of voting in the place where he was a student. I will ask the gentleman from Taunton if I am right in that?

Mr. MORTON. That is substantially the position which I took.

Mr. PARKER. That is not the construction which the gentleman from Lenox gives it, by any means.

Now, Sir, this provision, which is to make this matter so certain that he who runs may read; this provision, which is to protect the selectmen in such a manner that there can be no mistake in relation to it, is susceptible of just these two different constructions. It may mean—as you perceive by the construction of the gentleman from Lenox—that the mere presence of a person as a student will take away the right to vote, as a matter of course, if he came to attend a seminary of learning, during the time he remains connected with it; and it may mean—as you see by the construction of the gentleman from Taunton—that the mere fact that he is a student will not give the right to vote, when with the other circumstances connected with that fact, he would not have the right to vote under the ordinary operation of the law.

How certain shall we make the Constitution if we incorporate this provision, with these two different glosses upon it—one of which makes it mean everything, even to the disfranchisement of the voter for the time that he remains at a seminary of learning; and the other makes it mean just exactly nothing at all. No man will contend that the mere presence of an individual at a seminary of learning gives him a right to vote, (he being twenty-one years of age and otherwise qualified,) provided that is not the place of his domicile. Something else is always required.

It is asked whether that is his home; whether he came there with other purposes beside that of getting an education; whether it is his purpose to remain there indefinitely; whether he has some other place to which he purposes to return at the end of the year, or at any fixed future time. In the one case, the person who comes with a purpose of changing his residence—his home, and with no intention of departing from it at the end of any specified time, or at any time afterwards, has a right to vote; but one who comes for a temporary purpose, whether that purpose be to get an education, or any other, and with the design of returning again, has no right, and his being a student does not make his case any better than if his object were something else.

Mr. MORTON, of Taunton. If the gentleman will allow me, I would like to ask him a question, inasmuch as he put one to me. I would like to have him tell me whether he himself entertains any doubt about the grammatical or legal construction of the proposition?

Mr. PARKER. I am not aware that there is any doubt as to the grammatical construction of the proposition. I had the same doubt what interpretation was to be put upon the language, before either of the gentlemen addressed the Committee, which I have now, for the reason that it may mean one thing or the other. The gentleman from Taunton, in putting his gloss upon it, does no violence to its language. And the gentleman from Lenox, in putting the construction upon it which he does, no more violates the laws of language than the gentleman from Taunton. There is, in fact, no certainty about it. One set of selectmen may construe it as the gentleman from Taunton does, and another set may adopt the construction of the gentleman from Lenox, and both may act under the Constitution just as they now administer the rule of the law. There will be just the same difficulty.

QUALIFICATION OF VOTERS.—PARKER.

Residence, and intention to make the place the home of the party, it is said, constitute domicile. The difficulty does not originate so much in a difference of opinion respecting the rule of law, as it does in relation to the application of the fact. Whether the domicile of a particular individual has been changed, depends, in a great measure, upon intention; and, in many instances, the intention can only be certainly known to the person himself. In some instances, there are circumstances which show, very conclusively, what that intention was. But, in others, the circumstances are of that equivocal character, that they are just about as consistent with an intention to change the domicile, as they are with the intention not to change it; and then the question which it is so difficult to solve, is, what was the intention? Where is the home of the party? Will this constitutional provision settle that question? If you put the gloss of the honorable gentleman from Lenox, upon it, you settle the question without any regard to intention; you have got a fixed rule in that case, but you have a rule which affects but one, two or three classes, and does not apply to the rest of the people of the Commonwealth. Why should this be? I ask no more for the student than for any other class in the community; I only ask that he may be put upon the same ground, under the same state of facts, with other classes. The merit of the construction of the gentleman from Taunton is, that it makes no distinction; it leaves all classes upon the same ground; but the objection to it is, that it accomplishes nothing. The construction of the gentleman from Lenox has the merit of accomplishing something, but the objection to it is, that it accomplishes something which ought not to be accomplished; for there is no reason for this distinction. It makes labor of the mind of less estimation than labor of the hands. I claim no superiority for it; but, unless some reason is given for such a course, it seems to me that it should not be put below par.

Sir, my colleague has already suggested—and the gentleman from Lenox has after all not answered his suggestion—that this is a mode of disfranchising men. It may not have that effect in all cases, but it certainly will disfranchise some individuals. It may not so affect individuals who are inhabitants of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts at the time when the change of domicile takes place; for, as is suggested by the gentleman from Lenox, the individual who moves from Newton to Cambridge and connects himself with a seminary of learning there, under such circumstances that his domicile will be changed for other purposes, although he cannot vote in Cambridge under this provision, will still have the right of returning to Newton and of voting there; for his domicile will not be changed for the purpose of voting. He may have left with no intention of returning; he may have designed to make Cambridge his home for all future time at the time of changing his domicile; but yet he would have the right, under the Constitution, I admit, if you adopt this provision, to go back to Newton and claim his right to vote there; while one of his neighbors who had gone to Cambridge under precisely similar circumstance, except that he was to be employed in printing or in brick-making instead of studying, could not go back to vote in Newton, but would vote in Cambridge.

But this is not all. Suppose a man comes from New Hampshire for the purpose of entering some literary institution in Cambridge, although when he left that State he did it with the intention never to set foot within its borders again, but to make Cambridge his home for all future time, still, under the operation of this provision he cannot vote in Cambridge. Now I ask you, Mr. Chairman, where can he vote? Will the gentleman tell me that he can go back and vote in New Hampshire, where his old domicile was? Suppose he should go back there and present himself at the polls, what would they be likely to say to him? It would be something like this. "Did you not go to Cambridge with the intention of remaining there?" "Yes." "Have you come back to New Hampshire for the purpose of residing here?" "No." "Have you any home in New Hampshire?" "Not any." They would reply, "we do not recognize your right to vote here. The people of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts cannot make a Constitution for us; the provision you refer to is not operative across the boundary line." What answer could he have in that case? Sir, no answer at all. It would be clear that he could not vote there. The effect of a change of domicile is well understood, except it is made ambiguous by a special constitutional provision. He would thus be disfranchised because he had come into the Commonwealth of Massachusetts for the purpose of studying.

Mr. WALKER, of North Brookfield. If the gentleman will allow me to interrupt him, I would like to ask, since he refers to the case of New Hampshire, if there is not a statute provision that regulates this matter there.

Mr. PARKER. There is a statute there upon the subject, but no statute there will authorize a student who has come to Massachusetts and has gained a residence under the laws of Massachusetts to go back and vote in New Hampshire. I do not recollect the precise provisions of that statute, but I suppose it goes so far as to allow a man who has gone into a seminary of learning for the purpose of remaining there to get an education merely, the right to return to the place of his domicile and vote. I am not aware that it goes any farther than that.

Mr. BISHOP. With the permission of the gentleman from Cambridge, I will ask him whether a man can have two domiciles at the same time.

Mr. PARKER. The received opinion is, that he cannot; but, under particular circumstances he may have what looks very much like it.

Mr. BISHOP. If the gentleman will allow me one question more, I will ask him if a man does retain one domicile until he gains another.

Mr. PARKER. As a general proposition, undoubtedly he does so; but, if the gentleman means to make an application of that answer to the subject before us, I will state that if a man comes from New Hampshire and enters a seminary of learning in Williamstown, Amherst, or Andover, under the circumstances I have mentioned, he will change his domicile. This provision, if it is put into the Constitution, will not prevent a change of domicile. The authorities of the town to which he comes may tax him notwithstanding. It is only in relation to voting that the domicile is not changed. You say that he shall not vote there, but still you may tax him there, because there is no provision to prevent it. That is another objection which I have to this provision, that it makes it operate unequally. You put him in the position of a man who has changed his domicile inasmuch that he is by law taxable, but at the same time you refuse him the privilege of voting as other men may vote who like him are taxed and have paid their taxes. He will stand in a position precisely similar to that of a man who has come into a town to reside, and who has not been there six months; but you may keep him in this position for four years; he will be liable to taxation all the while, but will not have the right to exercise the ordinary privilege which other persons can exercise under similar circumstances. What does your resolution say?

Resolved, That for the purpose of voting, no person shall be deemed to have gained or lost a residence by reason of his presence or absence while employed in the army or navy of the United States, or while navigating the waters of this State, or of the United States, or of the high seas, or while a student of any seminary of learning.

This is only "for the purpose of voting;" for all other his domicile may be changed, may be changed, notwithstanding that provision. By the pauper laws he may gain a settlement so that the town would be liable to support him if he should be reduced to destitution; yet he would have no right to vote while he was able to maintain himself. Now, Sir, it seems to me that we may well leave this matter, encompassed with difficulties as it is—difficulties which this provision is in no way effectual to remove—we may as well leave it where it is, for the legislature will have competent power and authority to make any provision which may be found necessary in relation to the subject. There is nothing of the nature of a constitutional enactment about it that makes it necessary that it should be in the Constitution. The gentleman for Otis, (Mr. Sumner,) says that it is something like a declaration of rights, and that therefore it is a proper constitutional provision. In that view my objection to it is, that it is merely a partial declaration; it refers to but two or three classes of the community, and is not a declaration of the rights of individuals in general; and I hope, therefore, that the gentleman for Otis will move to amend the resolve in such a manner that it shall embrace all classes, and let it determine whatever it may determine, in relation to one class of individuals as well as another.

There are some matters that have been drawn into this debate, which I trust will be left out of consideration by members of this Convention in passing upon the subject. What has been urged as a reason why this Convention should incorporate into the Constitution a provision upon this subject? Why, Sir, there have been some disturbances in the town of Williamstown—by reason of some students in a seminary there, claiming the right to vote. Admitting all this, it is but a single case in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, and shall we make a constitutional provision to regulate the matter? If the difficulty is, as it is in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, in the application of the facts, and not about the rule of law, and if this will not assist at all in the application of facts, then the fact that there has been some difficulty in the town of Williamstown upon this subject—that the selectmen have found a difficulty in applying the law to the fact in such a manner as to be satisfactory to the young men there—does not appear to me to be a sufficient reason for the adoption of a constitutional provision in regard to the matter.

QUALIFICATION OF VOTERS.—PARKER—MORTON.

[July 5th.

The conduct on the part of the students was, undoubtedly, improper; and I do not wish to apologize for anything of that kind. Far from it; but, Sir, when my colleague suggested that so far as the students in the city of Cambridge are concerned, no difficulty has arisen of this kind; that there had been no disturbance, but that on the contrary, there had been peace and quietness; he was met by the significant question, whether at some time, and upon some occasion, the students there did not attempt to blow up something with a bomb-shell, as if that had something to do with this discussion.

Mr. DUNCAN. I merely asked that question in reply to a remark of the gentleman from Cambridge, (Mr. Sargent,) that they were peaceable, quiet citizens. I meant to ask by that, if such was the character of the citizens of Cambridge, and whether they were in the habit of blowing up buildings and things of that kind, and yet be considered by the gentleman as quiet and peaceable citizens?

Mr. PARKER. I understood the gentleman to inquire whether a circumstance of that kind had not occurred, leaving the inference to be drawn that their character was not that of quiet and peaceable citizens. But what has that to do with the question now before us? Was it in connection with their action at the polls that they attempted to blow up a building with a bomb-shell, or in connection with the exercise of the right of suffrage? I have yet to hear that it was. Well, Sir, if it was something altogether disconnected with anything of this kind, if it was the lawless and unjustifiable act of persons who did not claim any right to vote, and who, perhaps, never did vote,—for there are minors in colleges as well as those who are twenty-one years of age,—I ask if a solitary instance of unauthorized violence by young men connected with a seminary of learning, is to show that the students in Cambridge, in the exercise of their right to vote, are not peaceable citizens? I trust not. To have any value as an argument, such acts should, at least, be connected with some exercise of the right to vote. It has not even that merit. We know that there was a time when a convent was burned in Charlestown, and it was supposed by some, that the people of Charlestown had some hand in it. Shall we put a provision into the Constitution, in reference to the people of Charlestown, on that account? A short time since, I saw in the public newspapers, that there was an effigy burnt, I think in the town of North Adams. That had reference to voting—to the vote of the presiding officer of the Senate. Shall we have a constitutional provision in regard to the people of North Adams, or the Hoosac tunnel, on that account? We might just as well as to have a constitutional provision respecting the voting of students because of any disorders and irregularities of young men, who have often a great deal more of apology for the excitement into which they get than men of longer life and more experience.

Sir, I have as little interest in this subject as any body can have, and aside from the considerations suggested, I have as little feeling as any one. Nobody can point to an instance where I have requested a student to vote either one way or the other. I think no person can point to an instance of my being at the polls with a student when he voted, or where a student was present when I voted. Whether students vote one ticket or another, or whether they exercise the right of suffrage in Massachusetts, or in some other State in the Union, is of the least importance to me.

Mr. MORTON, of Taunton. I have already expressed my views, in brief, upon this subject. I do not, therefore, now propose to go into any argument, neither have I the presumption to undertake to answer the distinguished and learned gentleman from Cambridge, (Mr. Parker). I wish merely to refer to one or two points which he made, and which seemed to be the substantial ground of his argument. *

In the first place, I understand that the foundation of his objection to this provision, is its uncertainty, and its liability to misconstruction. I appealed to the gentleman upon the subject, and understood him to say, that it was his opinion that the language here used, whether considered grammatically or legally, would admit of but one construction.

Mr. PARKER. The gentleman misunderstood what I did say.

Mr. MORTON. I ask the gentleman what his remarks were?

Mr. PARKER. I intended to say, that it was open to both the constructions here given to it, and that it was open to the construction of any court of law, to determine what its effects would be.

Mr. MORTON. I do not know now whether the gentleman intends to say that he personally entertains any doubts of what the language means. If so, and if it is capable of a grammatical and legal construction, that is all we can require, for it is impossible, in any law, or in any Constitution, to hit upon any language whatever, about which some individual in the community may not entertain some doubts.

I may have been unfortunate in another position, which I understood the gentleman to take, and in which I was most happy to concur with him, and that was, that the purport of this language was precisely the same as the existing law now is. I understood the gentleman to take that ground.

Mr. PARKER. The gentleman appeals to me to know what I did say, and I will answer him, although I am very sorry I cannot concur with the gentleman, as it would afford me quite as much pleasure to agree with him, as it can him to agree with me. I did not intend to express that idea, but I intended to say, that such was the declaration all around, of gentlemen who have spoken upon the subject. If the gentleman desires that I should express my personal opinions upon the true construction of this provision,—which I have not, as yet, intended to do,—at his call perhaps I should do it.

Mr. MORTON. If I misunderstood the gentleman, I should be happy to know in what respect.

Mr. PARKER. The only reluctance I have in the matter is, that I hesitate to dissent at all from the opinion expressed by the gentleman from Lenox, (Mr. Bishop). My own impression was, when I heard the gentleman from Taunton, (Mr. Morton,) that he put a very fair gloss upon it, one which it certainly admitted of, and which I would incline to put upon it myself, were it not for the opinion of the gentleman from Lenox, for which I entertain the highest respect, and from the fact that, putting that construction upon it, it amounts to nothing.

Mr. MORTON. I really understood the gentleman to put that construction upon it, and to found his main argument, that it would not be proper to incorporate it into the Constitution, because it did not change the existing law, and I was going to ask, if this does not change the existing law, how his argument would stand, in which he maintained, that it disfranchises a certain class of people, because they were not entitled to vote by the existing law, and this is the same as the existing law, how are they disfranchised by this provision? This neither adds to, nor takes from, the elective franchise. It only makes that certain and impeccable, which otherwise might be changed by the legislature.

I think, Sir, that the language is explicit. To be sure, it is a somewhat complicated proposition, because it includes a number of classes of people, and if you read it, and leave out all the other classes mentioned in it, except the one in question, I think you will perceive at once, that it contains a clear and explicit declaration, and that it really will not admit of more than one construction. Confining it merely to students, it would read in this way: "that, for the purpose of voting, no person shall be deemed to have gained or lost a residence, by reason of his presence or absence, while a student of any seminary of learning,"—the plain meaning of which is, that the mere fact that a person is a student, does not give him such a legal residence as to entitle him to vote. And I certainly understood the gentleman to maintain, in his argument, that, as the law now stands, a mere residence at a college or seminary of learning, of itself, unattended by other circumstances, did not entitle any man to vote. The question of domicile is often a question very complicated, and surrounded with much difficulty. It may be ascertained from a variety of facts, and my understanding of this provision is, that a residence at college does not have any tendency to establish a legal domicile and a right to vote, any further than it shows the physical fact, that the individual is personally present in the town where he may claim to vote.

The question last argued, I confess, is one not entirely clear to my mind, and that is, supposing this right is already determined, is it expedient to make it a part of the Constitution? I think the statement of another gentleman from Cambridge, (Mr. Sargent,) furnished an additional argument for doing something upon this subject. If I understand him correctly, he said, that the students in the colleges and seminaries of learning in that town, were considered as having a residence, and entitled to vote there, if they declared that it was their intention to make that their home. If that is the way in which the law is construed there, it is quite time that we had a provision that could be understood, because I deny the justness of that principle.

QUALIFICATION OF VOTERS. — SARGENT — MORTON — HUNTINGTON.

[July 5th.

Mr. SARGENT, of Cambridge. I did not mean to be so understood. I intended to say, that they stood upon precisely the same footing with any other citizens, and were permitted to vote under the same circumstances that other citizens were permitted to vote. I did not mean to say that any special privileges were granted to them.

Mr. MORTON. I understood the gentleman to say, if they declared their intention to make it their home there, that was sufficient to entitle them to vote. If he means that they stand upon precisely the same footing as other citizens, then how stands his argument, that many students are disfranchised by the proposed amendment? I contend, that the provision does not, in any degree, infringe upon their existing rights, and, therefore, there can be no possible objection to it. It becomes a mere question, whether it is important enough to be made a part of the Constitution of the Commonwealth, and that, I apprehend, is really the only question about which any doubt remains, because I maintain—and I am unwilling to repeat a single proposition which I have before advanced—that the law, as it has been settled by the courts of this Commonwealth, is exactly in accordance with these provisions, and the reason why I would make it a part of the Constitution is, not because it in any degree affects the law of the State, not because it will make the rule more certain than it now is, but because I consider the regulation of the right of voting as one of the fundamental things in the formation of a government,—indeed, it may be called the corner stone, because it is there that you must settle the question, who shall participate in the powers of the Commonwealth, before you can go on and erect the superstructure. Upon this ground I maintain that it is proper to incorporate it into the Constitution, and make it a part of the fundamental law.

Mr. HUNTINGTON, of Salem. We have before us a proposition which is proposed to be incorporated into the Constitution, upon which, already, in this body, we have great diversity of opinion among gentlemen eminently learned in the law. We have one interpretation given to us by one ex-judge of a judicial court; another interpretation given by an existing judge of the court of common pleas in this Commonwealth, differing entirely as to the construction of this resolve. Now, Sir, I listened to the remarks of the gentleman from Taunton, (Mr. Morton,) this morning, in his interpretation of the effect and meaning of this resolve, and I am happy to say that I agree with him entirely. I think there can be no doubt that he stated the law with entire accuracy—I mean the existing statute law, as settled by the supreme court of this Commonwealth, for fifty years last past; and there is no conflict or contradiction in the judicial decisions and opinions upon this particular subject. And yet I understood the gentleman to say, that when this question was a new one, when it was first presented to his mind, he thought it unwise to pass this resolve, and that his first opinion and impression was against the resolve.

Mr. MORTON. I remarked that I entertained doubts about it.

Mr. HUNTINGTON. He says he entertained doubts, and if he doubted, I think we may all well entertain doubts. I think his second thoughts were quite as good as his first thoughts. Then the gentleman from North Brookfield, (Mr. Walker,) the author of this Report, has another view of the matter, differing quite materially from those I have mentioned. I was not in my seat when the discussion was had in relation to this subject upon another occasion, but from what I can gather from the chairman of the Committee which reported this resolution, it seems that the resolve as originally reported, for some reason, did not commend itself very strongly to the Convention, and was recommitted to the Committee, who have reported it back in the form now before us.

The gentleman from North Brookfield seemed to suppose that by this resolution, the student of the university at Cambridge, and of the college at Williamstown, could not vote. He said that the gentleman from Williamstown had been before the Committee with his grievances, and that his grievances, in the opinion of the Committee, demanded redress, and that there were obvious reasons why students in college should not be permitted to vote, that the faculty and directors of the colleges would prefer that the students should not vote, and that it was very unjust and unpleasant in towns in which these institutions were located; that students coming there from abroad for a merely temporary object, mere passengers, mere birds of flight, should come in there, and after a few months' residence, exercise all the privileges of a permanent resident voter. Well, Sir, so far as that goes, I am entirely of the same opinion. I sympathize entirely with the gentleman from North Brookfield, and the gentleman from Williamstown, in all this. But the only difficulty, as it seems to me, is, that they will get nothing by this resolution. As I understand it, it is only proposed by this resolution to put in the Constitution what has been decided by law for five years. The chairman of this Committee undoubtedly thinks that if he can get this resolve incorporated into the Constitution, he will then have something which will prevent the student from voting. Now, Sir, he will not necessarily get any such thing. I say necessarily, because the question of domicile does not depend entirely upon actual residence. It is a question which has to be determined by all the circumstances in the case. This question of domicile is a very complex one. It is oftentimes an exceedingly difficult question to settle, and it must be governed by a great variety of circumstances, facts, and considerations.

Well, Sir, I pray to know how the gentleman is to accomplish any definite and salutary purpose by merely incorporating in the Constitution what was before a matter of law? It has been repeatedly declared by the decisions of your courts, that mere residence does not create a domicile, nor give a man a right to vote.

It seems to me, that the gentleman from Taunton, (Mr. Morton,) understands this resolution precisely as it should be understood, and I should have no manner of doubt with regard to it but for the fact that the learned gentleman from Cambridge, (Mr. Parker,) gives a different construction, although he says the opinion he expresses is founded upon the opinion of the gentleman from Lenox, (Mr. Bishop). The learned judge from Cambridge, you will perceive, does not give any opinion of his own at all, but says that upon the authority of the gentleman from Lenox, he is inclined to think so and so. Well, Sir, it is for these learned gentlemen to settle the matter among themselves, but I do not look upon the resolve as having any other effect than merely to declare that mere bodily presence, or mere bodily absence, shall not give or take away the right to vote. That is precisely what it does; nothing more, and nothing less.

Now, Sir, I put it to the gentleman from North Brookfield, (Mr. Walker,) and to the Committee, whether it is worthy of this honorable body sitting here, the fifth day of July, deliberating upon the organic law of the Commonwealth—I say it is worth the while of this Convention to send out to the people this proposition, that mere bodily presence, or mere bodily absence, does not give nor take from a man the right to vote? Why, if it is necessary to make this provision apply to Cambridge and to Williamstown, and the other towns where these seminaries of learning are located, you might just as well go farther. The resolution now provides that "for the purpose of voting, no person shall be deemed to have gained or lost a residence, by reason of his presence or absence, while employed in the army or navy of the United States, or while navigating the waters of this State, or of the United States, or of the high seas." That is to say, the sailor who is abroad under the flag of his country, does not lose the right of voting at home. Well, Sir, did any man ever doubt that? I hardly see the necessity or propriety of putting such a proposition into the organic law of the Commonwealth; but the gentleman from Lenox, (Mr. Bishop,) says it will make the law so plain that he who runs may read. But if it is necessary to go so far, I do not see why it is not just as necessary to go further, and I propose, therefore, to add after the words "or while a student in any seminary of learning" these words: "or while an inmate of any jail, house of correction, penitentiary, or State prison." It is just as necessary that the provision should be made in one case as in the other. To be sure, if the question of domicile shall come up relative to an inmate of the institution at Charlestown, and the question should come up whether it was his intention to make it his place of residence, it would be a little doubtful, and it would be somewhat doubtful whether the inmate of that at East Cambridge came there voluntarily; but otherwise, it would be just as sensible to embrace these classes of persons as those mentioned in the resolve.

Now, Sir, when a young man goes to a town merely for the purpose of attending an academy or college, I think he should not vote in that town. They certainly have no sympathies or interests in common with the citizens of the place or with the community in which they live. They are merely encamped, so to speak, there, for one, two, three or four years as the case may be. It is hardly just to the citizens of these towns to have their elections controlled by the voters of these students. In Cambridge they got along very well, in this respect, that being a large city and most of the students there being very young; but, the same is not true of the country towns where these institutions of learning are situated. The same is not true of Williamstown, where the students are generally older and a greater portion of them old enough to vote. Any gentleman must see that thirty or forty young men encamped at Williamstown or Amherst, may exert a very bad influence upon the community so far as the voting is concerned, if they are allowed that privilege; and, therefore, it is that I say, I sympathize entirely with the friends of this resolve in the object they seek to accomplish, but I say that the resolve does not accomplish that object. You may adopt it and incorporate in the Constitution, and the students will vote just as much as they did before. Gentlemen say they want the resolution adopted, in order to make the law plain, and yet they are not making it in any respect plainer than it was before. The gentleman from Taunton, (Mr. Morton,) says, the law as it now stands under the decisions of your courts is precisely what is contained in this resolution. What, then, do we gain by its adoption? Nothing.

QUALIFICATION OF VOTERS.—HUNTINGTON—WOOD—WILKINSON.

Gentlemen say they want the provision in the Constitution, where it may be easily found. If that is the reason for putting it there, then why should we not go on and fill up some half dozen volumes, as we might in the course of a year, made up from the Revised Statutes and the judicial decisions, as to all these questions of right about which there is often much difficulty? There are thousand of cases in our possession where learned judges have undertaken to define a variety of circumstances and limitations of this right, and why not put them all in the Constitution? Why stop at this mere matter of residence? Every-body knows that there are very many other circumstances which must be taken into consideration. I could state a case, of which I have some knowledge, where these circumstances would amount to a great deal in determining the right of the student to vote. I knew an instance of a young man who entered college in one of those towns, and while a student was secretly married, unknown to the faculty of the college. He became the father of a child, and while yet a student entered into a partnership with a brother of his wife to go into business in that place as soon as he should graduate. Now, I ask, if, under these circumstances, that student would not have a sufficient interest in the affairs of that place to give him a domicile there, and entitle him to vote?

But, Sir, as I understand this proposition, a student in college, or a sailor upon the high seas is not to be governed in the matter of residence by any different rule from any other citizen of the Commonwealth. I am sure no one in this Convention would be prepared to say that one rule should apply to a student in a seminary of learning and a man upon the high seas, and another and a different rule should apply to a mechanic, or any other citizen employed in any other avocation. No man pretends to such a construction of the resolution. Then the long and short of the matter is, that the resolution means just precisely nothing.

The learned gentleman from Taunton, (Mr. Morton,) says, it is simply designed to declare what the law is. Now, I want to know why we should send out to the people, to be engrafted into the Constitution, a proposition which is already so plain that nobody can have a shadow of a doubt about it, that mere residence, unaccompanied by any other circumstances, does not per se give a man a domicile or the right to vote?

Mr. WOOD, of Fitchburg. I believe the great difficulty in the case is, the application of the facts to the law. It is, in many instances, a matter of extreme difficulty to determine where a man's home is. When the old Constitution provided that a man should reside in a place for six months to entitle him to vote there, it undertook to settle the matter of residence forever by giving a definition of the term "inhabitant." But, it so turns out that the definition is no definition at all. It is in effect saying that a man's residence is, where his residence is, or that his home is where his house is, and nothing further is determined by it.

But there is another difficulty. The members of this Convention generally construe this law in the same manner. But it is notorious that the people generally throughout the State construe it differently. The selectmen, in many instances, construe it differently. I presume there is no question that the difficulty of which we have heard so much in Williamstown was to some extent the result of a wrong construction of the law. I know nothing of this case any more than what I have learned in this Convention, but I presume there is no question that this matter of inhabitancy or residence was construed differently there from the construction given it by the learned gentlemen who have given their opinions upon it in this Convention; and, it will continue to be so construed unless we place some provision in the Constitution so plain and clear that but one construction can be given to it. It seems to me a matter of some importance that such a provision should be made, because in a small town where the parties are very nearly equally balanced, so that fifteen or twenty votes upon the one side or the other, will change the result, if it is possible to put such a construction upon the law as to allow that number of students to vote. The temptation is certainly a very strong one to place that construction upon it, and to marshal out the students.

I recollect an instance, where the decision was made three times over by the supreme court, that a man's changing his residence for a mere temporary purpose did not change his domicile, and that he could not be taxed at his place of temporary residence, but notwithstanding the ruling, the jury brought in a verdict directly in opposition to that decision, and for some reason the court did not see fit to set it aside upon that ground. The jury insisted that a man's going away and continuing away was a sufficient evidence of a change of residence so far as the payment of a tax was concerned. The courts decided, that if a man went to sea, or went abroad for a merely temporary purpose, intending to return again, and was gone for twenty years, or any length of time, that did not change his residence—that if a man in one of the towns of the Commonwealth came down here to the city of Boston and remained here for six, eight, ten or twelve months, but for a temporary purpose, it did not change his residence, but that he would be taxable in the town from whence he came. But the assessors would not believe any such doctrine. They say, "How are we to assess a man—how are we to make out our valuation if we are to ascertain whether every man who has left the place for the last twenty years has left for a temporary purpose or for a permanent one? Common sense forbids any such construction." That is the practical effect of it, and although the decisions of the supreme court are the supreme law of the State, yet the people will act directly in violation of those decisions. I submit, therefore, whether it is not advisable to put this provision in the Constitution, where it may be understood by every one? It will certainly do no harm, and I think it is a matter of sufficient importance to make it worth while to make the declaration in the Constitution that the mere fact of a student or any other person residing in a place for a temporary purpose does not give him a domicile in that place nor entitle him to vote there.

The law has amounted to nothing heretofore, because the officers of the town did not understand it, but now it is proposed to place the same provisions where the selectmen and others may read it, and then when a young man comes up to the polls and claims the right of voting, and the question is asked him: "Are you here as a student?" "Yes." "Are you here for any other purpose?" "No." "Where do you expect to go to when you graduate?" "Home to my father's." "Then, young man, you cannot vote. Your being here merely as a student gives you no right to vote." "But," says the young man, "am I not one and twenty years old? Have I not been here for three years, and have I not complied with all the requirements of law to entitle me to vote?" "Here is the organic law of the State," replies the selectmen, "your being here merely as a student in a seminary of learning, gives you no right to vote, and your name cannot go upon the check list."

Sir, this result never will be brought about so long as these provisions merely remain in the decisions of your Supreme Court. These decisions are founded upon a multitude of circumstances. If a man has become a resident of a town, so that that town would be compelled to support him if he should become a pauper, he will be taxable in that town.

Wherever a man is taxed he has a right to vote, provided he has the other requisite qualifications. All these things ought to go together, and will go together. There is no question about it. The mere being a student does not necessarily make you a voter, nor will it make you an inhabitant of the place. Now, if it does not do so, then say to the assessors at once that my being a student does not make me an inhabitant, so that I can be taxed. It all depends upon the domicile and other things following. Now, if this thing is put into the Constitution it will settle the question forever, and that is one reason, if there were no other, why it should be put there. Let it be stated fully and fairly, so that hereafter there may be no doubt about it. I think if we adopt that resolution as it now stands, without the amendment, it will be sufficient, and I must confess myself in favor of it as it stands.

Mr. WILKINSON, of Dedham. It seems to me that this resolution is susceptible of amendment; and, that that construction is in entire harmony with what has been the law and the practice of the Commonwealth for a number of years, although individual cases may have arisen in which the selectmen may have come to a wrong decision as to the facts, because the question of domicile is one which is exceedingly difficult to decide. I think that this resolution leaves that question precisely where it was before. It simply declares that mere presence or absence does not fix residence. It has not struck me as being a matter of very vital importance that this provision should go into the Constitution. There is one reason, however, that makes it proper that the qualifications of voters should be defined in the organic law, so that it may be taken away from the power of the legislature to intermeddle. This seems to be necessary, otherwise great absurdities might be perpetrated. Suppose that the legislature should enact that all students of colleges should vote where their college is located and nowhere else. That would seem to be an intolerable law. It is, therefore, proper, that the definition of what constitutes domicile in this respect should go into the Constitution. It can do no harm. It makes the matter plain and the people can refer to it at once in the Constitution where it is proper to find it. I, therefore, move to amend the proposition by adding after the words "seminary of learning," the following: "Or while engaged in any other temporary business or employment." I think that will make the matter perfectly plain.

QUALIFICATION OF VOTERS. — WALKER — HUNTINGTON — DANA.

Mr. WALKER, of North Brookfield. I am sorry that this debate has been protracted so long; but it must be evident to every gentleman that the question is regarded as being important, otherwise, it would not have elicited such a display of talent. It is evident, too, from the fact that, several of the States, as before mentioned, have an article identical with that now under consideration.

Mr. STEVENS, of Clinton. I wish to ask the gentleman which of the States besides those named, has adopted the substance of this resolution?

Mr. WALKER. I have not examined the Constitutions of all the States myself, but the gentleman from Williamstown can answer the question if he is present.

Mr. STEVENS. I have examined the Constitutions of Maine, New York, Wisconsin and California, and I only find the mention of the word student in these Constitutions. I believe it is not to be found in any other.

Mr. WALKER. I am not certain in how many of the Constitutions it will be found, but I find it in several.

The gentleman from Cambridge intimated that he thought this provision made an invidious distinction. I do not understand that such is the fact—that any invidious distinction is made; but that the student gains his residence in the same way as any other inhabitant of the Commonwealth. But, Sir, there is a marked difference between students and other classes of the inhabitants. What is that difference? When young men come to Massachusetts from other States they usually come to seek their fortune. For what purpose does the student come? He comes to obtain an education so that he may acquire a fortune in any part of the world. That is the reason I suppose why students are placed in the same category with soldiers and sailors, members of the army and navy of the United States.

The facts stated by the gentleman from Williamstown made a deep impression upon my mind. The fact that sixty-eight students in that college reside in New York and yet vote in Williamstown is worthy of consideration, and shows the propriety of putting this provision in the Constitution. Now, I submit, that if our friends from Cambridge were as much troubled as the people in Williamstown, would not they feel as the people of Williamstown do? No doubt they would; and if the members of the university were opposed to the dominant party in the town they would feel quite as unwilling that they should come in and overturn the government of Cambridge.

Mr. SARGENT. I have no doubt we should feel very bad in such a case; and I am glad that the truth has come out.

Mr. WALKER. I do not know what truth has come out unless the gentleman from Cambridge feels guilty of that which I have not accused him of. All I have to say is that, it is desirable that the question should be settled in all these different localities.

Mr. PARKER. I did not design to make any particular allusion to the gentleman from Cambridge or to his politics; neither to the elections which take place there. I do not mix in the elections sufficiently to make me at all anxious about the matter. I have inquired of myself whether it is expedient to put into this Constitution a provision of this character. In regard to politics I disclaim any such consideration.

Mr. HUNTINGTON, of Northampton. It seems to me that the action of the Convention on another subject renders it important that this provision should pass. I allude to the voters' list to be kept by the registers.

Nothing can be more proper than that they should ascertain what constitutes a voter. If you are to have an authorized list of voters, then you should define what constitutes a voter, so that that list may be accurately made out. I make this suggestion for the consideration of the gentleman from Salem. I believe that there is no difference among the members of this Convention as to what we design by this provision; and I submit, that so far as the question of phraseology is concerned, we need not waste any time about it. Here is another difficulty,—that is, what is meant by a seminary of learning.

They go to college and remain there three or four years, generally four. It is very easy for the selectmen to say to a student is this your home? Yes. Why? Because I am here for three or four years. And the officer acts conscientiously enough in the view he takes of the matter and thinks that he is bound by the answer to allow the student to vote. This resolution does meet the difficulty, which arises in such a case, by requiring that a man shall neither gain or lose any residence while attending college, or any other institution of learning. I do not understand that there is a single gentleman of any side, who maintains that there is not an evil here which it is desirable to cure if possible, which we could remedy if we would only act together and agree upon the best phraseology.

Mr. HUNTINGTON, of Salem. I understand the gentleman from Northampton to say, that it is important we should insert this resolution in the Constitution as a guide to those official persons who make out voting lists, and that if we are to provide such lists we ought to furnish them the means of making out those lists. The gentleman will see at once that this resolution goes but little ways indeed. It merely makes provision as to the fourth class, and provides that mere residence per se, nothing more or less, shall not make a voter. If we are to have the qualifications of voters set out in the Constitution, it would require a treatise of forty pages to define all the qualifications, limitations, and conditions under which, and upon which persons become voters. I submit to the gentleman and the judgment of this Convention, whether it will be worth while to make a treatise of forty pages at least, defining the qualification of voters.

Mr. HUNTINGTON, of Northampton. In answer to the gentleman's inquiry I will merely say that, I would not incorporate into the Constitution a treatise upon this subject, but where by three or four lines I could meet the difficulties which have been found practically to exist, I certainly would do it. More difficulties have arisen in regard to this class of voters than any other class in certain towns where there are colleges and seminaries of learning, as for instance, at Cambridge, Williamstown and Andover. Town officers, in looking at the matter see that the Constitution gives a man the right to vote if he has paid his taxes. They do not know that residence in the language of the Constitution, means something more than inhabitancy. They see, perhaps, that here is a student in town who has been there for two years, and, therefore, his name goes upon the list. If incorporating a provision into the Constitution meets the difficulty arising in such cases, I certainly would make such provision. If there are other cases, which this provision does not meet, let gentlemen come forward and present them, and perhaps in a few lines they can all be met. By this single and distinct act, it seems to me we can introduce a provision which will operate well in those towns where this difficulty has occurred, and for the reasons already given, I think it ought to succeed.

Mr. DANA, for Manchester. I have still the same objection to voting for these resolutions, which I had when they first came up. I have not only listened to this debate with a great deal of care, but have also endeavored, by conversation with the friends of these resolves, to find out precisely what they mean, and the objects they have in view. I must say, the more I have heard and the farther I have inquired, the less I am inclined to sustain them. The gentleman from North Brookfield, (Mr. Walker), introduced an element into this debate, which I believe has not been introduced before, and which had reference to my friends from Cambridge, opposite. As I also reside in Cambridge, and am a voter there, I ought to bear a little of the obloquy which would fall upon them. The truth is, it does seem to me, that the difficulty is not so much because the students vote, as it is because they vote wrong. [Laughter.] It is evident, from these resolves, that the students have done something wrong. They are different from all other classes of persons that are absent from home, and for no other reason, are to be put into the Constitution and pilloried in this manner. The provision proposed to be inserted in the Constitution, reads as follows:—

That, for the purpose of voting, no person shall be deemed to have gained or lost a residence by reason of his presence or absence, while employed in the army of the United States, or while navigating the waters of this State, or of the United States, or of the high seas, or while a student of any seminary of learning.

Is it true, that a person ever gains the right of voting by mere presence, local presence, in any place? Has any man ever gained it?

Mr. HUNTINGTON, of Northampton. I make the question, whether residence is not an important element?

Mr. DANA. It is an essential element, but not conclusive. I wish to ask, whether the mere

Tuesday,]

QUALIFICATION OF VOTERS.—DANA—DUNCAN.

[July 5th.

fact of presence in a place, did ever make any man a voter? Certainly not, in law. Why say of a student, that mere personal presence shall not make him a voter? What have students done? I have suffered under the voting of students. I have seen in Cambridge, where I live, students come up, and, almost to a man, vote right against the ticket I vote, and in favor of the ticket that my friends from Cambridge, on the opposite side of the House, support. It would have been a source of pleasure to me, if those students had voted the same ticket with myself, for I should have gained, and my party would have gained, but to insert in the Constitution a provision which would shut them out from the polls, is the very last thing I should undertake to do in the discharge of my duty, to accommodate myself or any one else. I cannot believe that the Committee would, for a moment, yield to an argument of that kind, upon whichever side it was pressed. It is very plain, that some grievance has arisen from the conduct of the students. It is said that students have not behaved well. I do not see how these resolves are going to mend that. We only propose to say who shall vote, and not to say how they shall vote or behave themselves. I have inquired of the friends of these resolves, what purpose they wish to answer. I never can and never will vote for a resolve of this Convention, unless I can fairly understand what it means. If there is any ambiguity resting over it, if that ambiguity is of a kind which its friends decline to remove, then I never will vote for it. There is ambiguity resting over these resolves. They may be clear to my own mind, but legal gentlemen have doubts about them. It is very plain that the gentleman from North Brookfield, (Mr. Walker,) and the gentleman from Williamstown, (Mr. Duncan,) consider them as of great importance, as a remedial measure which is to answer a great purpose, and that is the ground upon which they press them. The gentleman from Taunton, (Mr. Morton,) says, that he supports them because they are very innocent and harmless, and that they are not going to produce any change whatever, but that they simply declare the law as it stands—a simple principle of law, that personal presence shall not make a voter. On the one hand they are innocent and harmless, and on the other they constitute an important remedy for a great evil. If these resolves are what the gentleman from North Brookfield, (Mr. Walker,) believes, the gentleman from Williamstown, (Mr. Duncan,) hopes, and the gentleman from Lenox, (Mr. Bishop,) thinks they are, then I submit to the Committee that they are wrong, because they will exclude students from voting under any circumstances. If they mean simply what the gentleman from Taunton, (Mr. Morton,) supposes they mean, then they are nugatory, and I should not wish to insert anything into the Constitution which was entirely nugatory. I cannot think that any gentleman will bring his mind to believe, that these resolves, so urgently pressed before this Committee, discussed, recommitted and renewed, are intended merely to declare the axiom which every man knows, that personal presence does not make a residence. So much note of preparation never came from so slight a cause as that. Something more is meant. I have endeavored to ascertain, from the friends of these resolves, whether they considered them merely a declaration of the general principle, that presence shall not make a voter, and I cannot learn from them that such is their understanding. I have tried to ascertain from the friends of the measure, whether they considered that the effect would be to exclude students, and I cannot ascertain that they so consider it. I cannot ascertain their construction of them, and I am driven to the necessity of saying, that I cannot vote for anything over which an ambiguity rests, and which the friends of the measure do not clear up.

Mr. DUNCAN, of Williamstown. For the information of the gentleman for Manchester, (Mr. Dana,) I would say that I intended, when I introduced this order, to convey the interpretation that is given by the gentleman from Lenox, (Mr. Bishop). I did not intend to disguise anything, or have any concealment about this matter. The gentleman, I think, has very plausibly misunderstood me. To me, this matter is perfectly plain. In Maine, they understand it as I do, and so in New York, Michigan, and in California, and the meaning is simply this, that a student cannot acquire the right to vote in any town where such institution of learning may be located. That is the construction put upon it in Maine and New York. I hope now that the question is fairly understood.

Mr. DANA. I am very much obliged to the gentleman, indeed, for his explanation. We are told, by the gentleman over the way, that he puts the construction upon it which is put upon it by the gentleman from Lenox, (Mr. Bishop,) that a student shall not acquire the right of voting in any place where he is residing, for the purposes of education, no matter what the circumstances may be, though they may be sufficient to give him a domicile, and to make him taxable there. But the gentleman says, that is the provision in Maine and New York. Nearly the whole argument made in favor of these resolves, has been made upon a very opposite consideration, that it does not intend to effect any such thing, but is a simple declaration to the selectmen, of a well-known principle of law which exists everywhere. That is the ground upon which the learned gentleman from Northampton, (Mr. Huntington,) the gentleman from Taunton, (Mr. Morton,) the gentleman from Fitchburg, (Mr. Wood,) and other gentlemen have supported these resolves. I ask these gentlemen, if the construction is that given to this matter by the gentleman from Williamstown, (Mr. Duncan,) whether they can vote for them.

It is now stated by them clearly what they intend, and what their object is. The object is that students shall not vote in the place where they reside. Let us take it so. They have given a construction to their own phraseology.

Mr. DUNCAN. That is my construction, I will say, if the gentleman will allow me. I am not accountable for others.

Mr. DANA. The gentleman from Williamstown, and I suppose also, the gentleman who reported this resolve to the Convention, intended to carry out this object that I have named. The question then is, whether we will adopt a provision that students shall not vote in the place where they reside. I wish it were put in plain terms like the following:—

Resolved, That no person shall vote in the place where he is residing while he is a member of a seminary of learning.

I think that would be a doubtful proposition. In the first place, there would be an invidious distinction against students. You would allow a man, who was a resident of the place for the purpose of learning a trade, to vote at the age of twenty-one. If he was there as an apprentice to a bricklayer he could vote, but he could not if he was pursuing a literary or scientific course of study.

Mr. DUNCAN. I would ask the gentleman if the statute does not make a distinction between that class of men and other classes of men.

Mr. DANA. I do not quite understand the question which is put by the gentleman.

Mr. DUNCAN. Does not the gentleman understand, that by the statute there is a distinction between students and another class of citizens, in reference to the contraction of debts.

Mr. DANA. The statute does make a distinction in that case. But that is a very different matter from the present. The "inalienable right of voting," as it has been called here, is quite a different thing from the inalienable right of contracting debts. [Laughter.] That statute is passed in kindness to them. This kindness, which takes away the right of voting for a period of four years, is a kindness which I think we should not agree to exactly.

Mr. DUNCAN. I would like to ask the question if any debts can be collected of students?

Mr. DANA. It is pretty difficult. [Laughter.] I do not know whether it will be aided at all by preventing their voting. But here we are undertaking a very difficult operation: We have in Cambridge a great many graduates; almost as many graduates as under-graduates, perhaps. There is the Law School, the Scientific School, and the Divinity School. The number of the students in the Scientific School is constantly increasing. They are men of years, often; men who have been engaged in business,—engineers and chemists. Some of them come there with their families, and pursue courses of lectures; and sometimes they bring their families with them, and they sometimes own property there. They are very respectable citizens; but, by this provision, we mean to say to them, that they shall not vote there. As to the general principle, in saying that students shall not vote where they reside, there might be a difference of opinion. But it strikes me that it would be a very invidious distinction. We do not wish to make these invidious distinctions. We wish to make one general and uniform rule, and to carry it out.

Then again, see at what cross purposes we are playing here. The gentleman from Williamstown, (Mr. Duncan,) is advocating the measure because it would cut off the students from voting; and the gentleman from Dedham, (Mr. Wilkinson,) who is a friend of the measure, has moved to apply it to all persons who reside in a place for any temporary purpose. So that the gentleman from Dedham is putting into the same category all persons who reside in a place for a temporary purpose, and the gentleman from Williamstown is trying to kill off the students. It strikes me, if this matter is correctly reported,—and we know that it will be,—any gentleman who will come to look at it in a disinterested manner, will say: here have been a number of lawyers engaged in making and amending a law on opposite constructions and at cross purposes. And it will be said, too, that if the lawyers could not understand it, it is not to be presumed the selectmen will be more enlightened than they have been heretofore. What can be more applicable than the answer given by the supreme court to the question propounded to it by the House of Representatives. The question was with regard to this very point, whether persons who were residing in any place as students would have a right to vote, and the answer was, in part, as follows:—

QUALIFICATION OF VOTERS.—DANA.

“The question, therefore, whether one residing at a place where there is a public literary institution, for the purposes of education, and who is in other respects qualified by the Constitution to vote, has a right to vote there, will depend on the question whether he has a domicile there. His residence will not give him a right to vote there, if he has a domicile elsewhere; nor will his connection with a public institution, solely for the purposes of education, preclude him from so voting, being otherwise qualified, if his domicile is there.”

In another place it says:—

“In that case, we are of opinion, that his going to a public institution, and residing there, solely for the purpose of education, would not, of itself, give him a right to vote there, because it would not necessarily change his domicile; but in such case, his right to vote at that place would depend upon all the circumstances connected with such residence.”

Now, there is the decision of the supreme court given in answer to this very Williamstown case. There is not a selectman in Williamstown who has not read that decision; and that decision makes it as clear as day, that residence for purposes of education of itself, does not give the right of voting. They have had this decision before them ever since 1843, and I suppose there is not a selectman in Massachusetts that does not know, and has not known for the last ten years, that the mere residence for purposes of education does not, of itself, make a man a voter in the place. Now, would any man propose to put into the Constitution that which is so well settled?

I will make one other remark which I ought to have made before. When that answer came from the supreme court back to the legislature, there was no legislation on the subject. These Williamstown gentlemen have been before the legislature, as I understand, and they have obtained from the legislature no statute. Is that not prima facie evidence against them? They have been here before the legislature having majorities of different parties, and presented the decision of the supreme court, and they have obtained no statute. Would it not have been better to make a statute than to put such a provision into the Constitution? For, if the court put an unexpected construction upon a statute, it can be modified. But no legislature has given a statute, and that is a strong reason why we should not adopt such a provision. I suppose that those who wished such a statute passed, wished to shut out the students from voting altogether. The legislature did not intend that it should be done, and we do not intend that it shall be done. No gentleman has advocated the position which the gentleman from Williamstown takes, and which it is supposed by some of the friends of the measure it will result in.

I, therefore, hope, Mr. Chairman, that so far as the students are concerned, we shall strike out the clause entirely. It is not a harmless thing. It will be considered by the selectmen, as the gentleman from Williamstown now understands it. Sir, the selectmen will say, it cannot be that these four hundred grave men discussed for a whole day, and finally adopted into the Constitution a provision of a half a dozen lines, merely to say what we all knew before, what every child knows, that a mere staying in a place, does not give the right of voting. That cannot be. And they will construe it otherwise. We shall mislead them; we shall put an element of doubt in it. I hope, therefore, that it will not pass.

There are other objections; but I will not take much of the time of the Convention in considering them. It is said, that no person shall lose his residence “while navigating the waters of the State or of the United States, or of the high seas.” Is he to lose it while absent on land? What peculiarity is there, Mr. Chairman, in the navigation of the high seas, to preserve the right of voting? Salt water is said to preserve many things; but, I never heard before that it was peculiar for preserving the right of voting. [Laughter.] It is said, that if a man is absent on the high seas, his right of voting is preserved; but, if he is absent on land, heaven help him! It cannot be that we are gravely asked to provide that a man who is absent for several years upon the high seas may have his right to vote retained, while the man who is absent from home upon land shall lose it. How will this matter be looked at, hereafter, when this little excitement about students has passed? People will say, here were lawyers and judges in the Convention, and the Convention said that if a man was absent from home on the high seas, he should not lose his right to vote; plainly implying, that if he was absent on land he must lose it. If he has gone to California and been digging there a long time, he cannot vote when he returns; or, if he travels over land to China.

Mr. BOUTWELL. How can that be done?

Mr. DANA. He can travel overland to China without being on the water, at least, longer than ten days at a time, to say nothing of Behrings Straits. He comes back and goes to Williamstown, and wants to vote, and the good selectman says he has been absent, and inquires if he has been navigating the waters of this State. No, he could not do that for four years. Have you been navigating the high seas? No, Sir, only ten days. All the rest of the time I was on land. Then, you see, Sir, you cannot vote; for the Constitution has taken up that subject, and those who made it have said, that if you had been on the high seas, then you might have voted, but as you have unfortunately been on land all this time you cannot vote. Now, it strikes me, that would be the very language, or else we are here enacting an absurdity; one or the other. If it be true, that a man does not lose his right of voting by being away on sea or on land, why confine the privilege to the sea? Expressio unius est exclusio alterius. If it be not true, then we are making an odious distinction in favor of every one who is away upon the ocean. My sympathies are very much with the men upon the ocean; and if I thought it just to say, that the seamen might have the right to vote, notwithstanding their absence, but that the land lubbers should lose the right in consequence of absence, why, I would go for it; but, I fear it is not quite fair and just.

This resolution also says, that no person shall lose the right of voting, “by reason of his presence or absence while employed in the army or navy of the United States.”

Is not that going a good ways? Here is a man at the age of twenty-one years, an inhabitant of the State. He enlists into the army of the United States, or into the navy, and he is ordered off, and his absence is only while he is in the army or navy of the United States. How long may he be in the army, and then come back and vote? He may be there twenty years. Suppose he is an officer, and is in the army for life; and yet, according to this resolve, he would be a voter in Boston if he was absent from this city to the day of his death. He need not pay any tax there in order to vote, for we have abolished that. But he continues to be a voter. General Scott, on the same principle, would have been a voter in London, or whatever place it was in the old dominion from which he came in 1810, although he has ever since that time been an officer in the army of the United States. So every officer in the army and in the navy of the United States may continue to vote in the place where he last had his residence. And, although his name may not be on the voting list, he may turn up at the end of twenty or thirty years and claim the right to vote; and, if the selectmen do not put his name on the list of voters, or will not do it, he could sue them!

Mr. HALLETT, for Wilbraham. Does the gentleman mean to say that General Scott should not be a voter at the place where he had his original domicile, unless he had acquired another.

Mr. DANA. That I do not answer, one way or the other.

Mr. HALLETT. If he had a domicile, then this does not apply to General Scott; nor to any one who has a domicile elsewhere.

Mr. DANA. I do not know why it does not apply. It says, “That for the purpose of voting, no person shall be deemed to have gained or lost a residence by reason of his presence or absence while employed in the army or navy of the United States.”

Now, if his domicile is in another place by reason of his military capacity, then he cannot have acquired the capacity to vote there. Because we have said in Massachusetts that that capacity shall not be so acquired. We have shut it out entirely.

Mr. HALLETT. But the gentleman says, that this provision declares that he shall not lose his residence.

Mr. DANA. That is, his residence for voting. There is another difficulty a-head. We are going to have two or three kinds of domiciles going on at the same time. That is, a gentleman may have one domicile for a residence, another for voting, and another for military service. General Scott—for whose right of voting the gentleman is so anxious—would retain his domicile for voting in Massachusetts, and acquire one for paying taxes elsewhere; and if a man from Massachusetts were in the army or navy, he could pass through Boston after thirty years—having had many domiciles in the interval—and if he found the people engaged in voting, he would have the right to drop in his ballot.

It is perfectly true, as the gentleman, (Mr. Hallett,) says, that he may acquire a domicile elsewhere; but, we mean to confine his domicile for voting to the last place where he happened to be, and say to him, so long as you remain in the army or navy you shall vote at your last residence here. That is introducing a new class of domiciles. Men in the army and navy, and men navigating the high seas, shall not gain or lose a domicile for the purpose of voting by change; but domiciles for all other purposes, they may lose or gain. Suppose a student leaves his home in Brookfield, and goes to Williamstown to study. His residence is Brookfield, for taxation. But he is in Williamstown; and suppose his parents then remove to Williamstown—what is the result? Why, his domicile for taxation is then in Williamstown, but not his domicile for voting. That would be the result. If his parents, to whom he intended to return, move to Williamstown, he would be taxed in Williamstown, and would be obliged to perform military duty there, and jury service; and he would have all his rights and obligations there except the right of voting, and that he could not exercise anywhere.

QUALIFICATION OF VOTERS.—WILKINSON—DANA—WALKER—WILSON.

[July 5th.

Then suppose his parents remove to Northampton. His domicile for the purpose of voting would revive.

I cannot believe that this Committee ever intended to pass such a resolve as that. I cannot believe that this resolve was thoroughly searched through and examined in all its bearings by the learned and able Committee who reported it. I am inclined to think that they took it a great deal on account of the urgency of the gentleman from Williamstown, who has set his heart so much upon it; and, Sir, it makes my heart bleed for him to be obliged to oppose it, as I feel it my duty to do. Every word costs drops of blood. [Laughter.] Seeing how deeply the gentleman from Williamstown took this matter to heart, I presume the Committee felt anxious to gratify and accommodate that gentleman, and therefore they reported the resolve.

Mr. WILKINSON, of Dedham. If the gentleman from Manchester will allow me, I would like to ask him whether he puts the same construction upon this resolve that he imputes to the gentleman from Williamstown. I do not exactly understand from the tenor of the gentleman's remarks how he would construe it himself.

Mr. DANA. That question is pregnant with another question, and that is, whether I do correctly interpret the gentleman from Williamstown. The gentleman asks me if I put the same construction on the resolve which I impute to the gentleman from Williamstown; but, Sir, that gentleman does not complain of the construction which I put upon the language. Indeed, he admits that he means that. Now here is my difficulty. I do not want the Convention to take this resolve upon my interpretation. I do not want them to take it upon the interpretation of the gentleman from Taunton. I do not want them to take it upon the interpretation of the honorable member from Cambridge; neither do I want them to take it upon the interpretation of the gentleman from Williamstown. I am not satisfied with the resolve upon any of the interpretations which have been given to it; and I think it is quite reason enough why it should be rejected, that we find the lawyers here are obliged to ask one another's opinion across the House, to find out what this language does mean, and they do not give uniform answers. If the gentlemen who concocted this measure, and who, therefore, ought to know the most about it, do not agree in their construction, how can we be expected to understand it? If those who have prepared the remedy for the evil do not know what the medicine is which they have concocted, how can we be expected to know what it is, who only have an opportunity to read the label? We are obliged to take the language as we find it. The gentleman from Williamstown wants it to be passed so as to prevent all the students from voting, while the gentleman from Taunton wants it passed because it will produce no such effect as that. The gentleman from North Brookfield agrees with them, that it is a very serious and important measure; but, they question one another across the House to know what it means, and I think that is reason enough why we should not pass it. I wish to have a construction given it by the body who passes it, for a mere private opinion in the matter is of little consequence; I wish to have the Committee say, in plain terms, whether they mean to exclude all students, or not. Besides this, there are other objections that lie behind this, with regard to the provisions in relation to the army and navy; but I will not enlarge upon that part of the question. It is said, by the way, that this same clause has been put into the Constitutions of four States. Now, I think the history of that matter will be found to be this. In the Convention which formed the Constitution of the State of Maine, they adopted this same proposition, and without much consideration, it was copied verbatim into the Constitutions of the other three States which have been mentioned. But as I understand it, the gentleman from North Brookfield says that nineteen of the States have substantially the same provisions in their Constitutions; while the gentleman upon my left, (Mr. Stevens, of Clinton,) says, that of these nineteen only four have the word "student" mentioned. I think this puts the force of the argument rather against the gentleman from North Brookfield.

Mr. WALKER. I think I stated expressly the first time that I spoke on this subject, that several of the States—I did not remember whether it was four or five—had this provision, word for word; while in nineteen States, there was a general provision in the Constitution on the subject.

Mr. DANA. That is just what I said. The statement of the gentleman from North Brookfield is undoubtedly correct, that the Constitutions of nineteen States have a provision substantially of this nature, but he did not undertake to say how many of them mentioned the word "student." It is now said that four of them have a provision in relation to students; and the inference appears to me to be that fifteen out of the nineteen States have refused to make special reference to "students." This provision has stood in the Constitution of the State of Maine for thirty-three years; and out of nineteen States which have adopted the provision substantially, fifteen have struck out the clause relative to students, while only four have retained it. Now, if we are to be governed by the views of the majority of the States, in relation to this matter,—and the presumption is, that the majority are the wiser,—the argument goes rather in favor of striking out this clause in relation to the students than in favor of retaining it.

Mr. WILSON, of Natick. I suppose that after listening to the arguments of the able and learned gentlemen of the legal profession,—I call them learned, because that is the custom in this Convention,—we are prepared to come to a vote to-night. At any rate, I hope we shall take the vote, if these various gentlemen do not agree in their opinions, for nobody expects to find lawyers agreeing unless they are paid for it; if they do, they expect more than I do. Now, while they disagree very much in their interpretation of this article, it seems to me that the people who, like me, are no lawyers, will have no difficulty in understanding this question. In my view, the declaration is simply this—that the mere fact of the presence of a man in Massachusetts who belongs to the army of the United States, shall not make or unmake him a voter; the mere fact of the presence of a man here who belongs to the navy of the United States, shall neither make nor unmake his right of suffrage; his mere presence while navigating the waters of this State, or of the United States, shall not have that effect; nor shall his mere presence as a student in Massachusetts, make or unmake his right of suffrage; that is the whole of it. After all these arguments, it merely amounts to that, and nothing else. Now, Sir, I do not rise for the purpose of making a speech upon this subject. We have had a great many interpretations put upon this matter, and it seems to me as though gentlemen had undertaken to see to what extremity they could carry this matter, and how far they could make these various interpretations consistent with the language of the resolve. I hope, Sir, that we shall take the vote to-night. We have spent quite as much time upon this question as I think it deserves; for I regard it as of very little practical consequence any way. As it is becoming late, I hope the vote will be taken at once.

Mr. WALKER, of North Brookfield. I do not rise for the purpose of making a single argument, or of replying to a single argument which has been made; but I understood the gentleman from Cambridge to complain that I had imputed improper motives to him and to others who acted with him. I did not intend that my language should bear any such construction. I only said that if the gentleman from Cambridge had been as much troubled with the interference of the students in the university there, as the people of some other places had been from a similar cause, I thought they would feel very much as other people do. I did not desire to be understood as imputing any bad motives to those gentlemen, for I know they bear a highly honorable and respectable character.

Mr. PARKER. I am very happy to hear the gentleman's disclaimer; but his language went a little farther than that, if I am not mistaken. I understood him to say that, the views of the gentleman from Cambridge were determined by the fact of the operation of the resolve in their locality, as to the manner in which the students might vote in the elections in that city and in Middlesex county.

Mr. WALKER. I certainly did not intend to impute any improper motives to the gentleman, although it is well worthy of note, that in the first place, the motion to strike out came from one of the gentlemen from Cambridge, and another gentleman from Cambridge took hold with a great deal of zeal upon the same side. Now, the gentleman who has just spoken, (Mr. Dana,) I thought, rather reflected upon the Committee, that they had not examined the matter themselves, but, reported the resolves in order to please the gentleman from Williamstown. In regard to that matter, I beg leave to state that, the Committee is constituted, like all the other committees of this body, of gentleman of the different political parties; and if I mistake not,—I can tell, of course, by referring to the records,—there was not a single objection to the reporting of this resolve.

QUALIFICATION OF VOTERS.—WALKER—PARKER—STEVENS.

Mr. DANA. If the gentleman will allow me, I will state that, I imputed no improper motives to the gentlemen who composed that Committee; I only thought that they had a good deal of tenderness of heart for the gentleman from Williamstown.

Mr. WALKER. Well, Sir, I did not observe any particular emotion upon the part of the Committee for the gentleman from Williamstown. That gentleman appeared before the Committee and presented his case; he presented these astounding facts of what he saw, and what he knew, and what he had experienced. I admit that those facts had an effect upon me, and, Sir, they ought to have an effect upon any one who should become acquainted with them. When we come to consider, therefore, what ought to be done under these circumstances, and when we had presented to our minds the fact which has been adverted to here, that this same provision existed in the Constitutions of several other states, which have been formed within a few years past, it seemed reasonable and proper that we should recommend its adoption. Not a word was said in Committee as to its political effect in Williamstown either upon one side or the other. I did not know how a single member of that school voted, and the matter was considered without reference to its political bearing, so far as I am aware. Indeed, I had no suspicion of anything of the kind until I discovered the very earnest efforts in regard to this matter arising from a particular quarter. I should be very happy to have the vote taken; I think the subject has now been sufficiently discussed upon both sides.

Mr. PARKER. I must say, Mr. Chairman, that the latter part of the remarks of the gentleman from North Brookfield have taken away very much of the virtue of the explanation which he had just made. [Laughter.] It seems to me that he has gone back again to the original imputation; and in relation to that, I have only to repeat that I have had no connection whatever with political affairs in Cambridge. I never have been in a situation that made me desirous of meddling with this, that, and the other matter, that may have a bearing upon political questions as they arise in Cambridge. As I said before, no person has ever heard me request a student to vote or not to vote, or to vote either one way or the other. No person has ever seen me marshaling the students at the polls in order to control their action; nor am I aware that I have ever been present to see a student give a vote, or that one has ever been present to see me give one. I think I may stand exonerated from all imputations of that character, and I hope that I may of all suspicion of being biased, or of my acts being controlled, by any reference whatever to the effect of this measure upon the city of Cambridge.

Mr. STEVENS, of Clinton. I must beg the indulgence of the Committee to a few remarks, although the hour is late, and we have already had a protracted discussion upon this subject. If I did not give this resolve the same construction which the gentleman from Williamstown and the gentleman from Lenox have put upon it, I certainly should not have moved to strike out this clause; but with this construction, I cannot see why a distinction should be made between this class of persons and any other class who may reside in a place for a temporary purpose. I did not, however, rise for the purpose of stating my views at length, but merely to allude to certain statements which have been made by gentlemen in their arguments upon this subject. The gentleman from Williamstown alluded to a law which had been enacted in New Hampshire, and which had the effect of disfranchising the students of Dartmouth college; and the reason which was given by him for procuring the passage of this act, was the interference of the students in the general business affairs of the town. It so happened, Mr. Chairman, that I was a member of that college at the time when this act was passed; and I supposed, and I always have supposed, until I heard the statement of the gentleman from Williamstown, that I knew the reason why that act was passed. The fact was, that the voters of that town, aside from the students, were very nearly equally divided in politics—so nearly, that if the students did not vote, it was very doubtful which way the election would turn, and when aided by the votes of the students, it was pretty certain that the representatives of the town of Hanover would be of a particular party. This was not satisfactory to certain gentlemen of that and neighboring towns in the same county, and at the suggestion of some of their political friends in the college, the bill was introduced into the legislature. It was supposed at the time to have been carried through for political purposes alone. I supposed so then, and I have never seen or heard anything since to induce me to change my opinion. So far as the students taking part in town affairs is concerned, I never heard one word of sensible complaint upon the subject. On the contrary, the students acted on school committees, and in other capacities in relation to the schools of the town on many occasions, and were very highly commended for the manner in which they performed these duties. When this proposition was brought in here, remembering at once the circumstances of the enactment of the law in relation to Dartmouth college, I asked the gentleman from Williamstown whether the passage of this resolve would not produce a different result in their political elections; and he said it was true that it would do so, but at the same time that it was not introduced for that purpose, but simply because the students ought not to vote as a matter of principle. Now, although I had no doubt but that the gentleman was perfectly honest in making this statement, yet I did not believe that it was entirely true; I did not believe that this resolve would ever have been thought of, unless it had been for its bearing on political parties. If the great body of the students had voted the other way, I think you would never have had this resolve introduced into this Convention. This was the conclusion to which I arrived, judging from what I had seen at Hanover; and now, Sir, I will ask the gentleman from Williamstown whether the students voted in the same way with the majority of the citizens.

Mr. DUNCAN. I will say that the most flagrant outrage has been committed by the party to which I belong; and the very acts of which I complain have been committed by the party to which I belong. The flagrant act of which I complain was, that one Sabbath afternoon forty men, belonging to the college, were put upon the list to vote at the polls the next day. These men were those belonging to the institution, who had all the ordinary qualifications, such as being over twenty-one years of age, and who had been in the State two years and in the town six months, and they were all allowed to vote.

Mr. STEVENS. As I did not mean to detain the Committee long, I will now pass to a statement of the Chairman of the Committee setting forth the reasons why this resolve was reported. Without meaning to reflect at all upon the course of the Committee, it seems to me very singular that the Committee should report resolves to engraft into the Constitution, or organic law of the State, a provision like this, simply from certain facts which were brought before them in relation to evils existing in one locality, without making inquiry whether the same evils existed in other and similar localities. I have heard of no such complaint from any other quarter. There are probably, in the city of Cambridge, four or five times, and perhaps even ten times, the number of students which would come under the provision introduced for the benefit of Williamstown as in that town. I have myself made inquiries of gentlemen from Cambridge, Amherst, Andover, and Newton, in all of which places seminaries of learning exist, whether any provision of the kind is desired by their citizens; and they unanimously tell me that no such thing is desired in those localities. I am certainly disposed to gratify the citizens of Williamstown in anything which is reasonable, and I am especially anxious to gratify my friend from Williamstown, who is so earnest in this matter; but why should we disfranchise so many persons, who are not guilty, in order to punish a few persons who are guilty? If this provision should be introduced into the Constitution it would operate harshly upon all this class, merely because a few persons, in a certain locality, have been guilty of certain offences. Now, because these individuals are guilty, are you going to punish the innocent, who are much more numerous in other localities, because, simply, they embrace the same occupation?

One word in regard to the remarks of the gentleman from Lenox, (Mr. Bishop). He says that this restriction, instead of abridging the right of voting, enlarges it. And how does it do that? It enlarges it, as he says, because it fixes the domicile of a party for all time to come, and that the student, instead of losing six months' time in gaining a residence when he enters college, and six months in gaining another when he leaves college, keeps his residence all the time. Now that may, in one sense, be true; but, I hold that whatever tends to obstruct and interfere with the right of suffrage, in another sense abridges that right, and is practically an interruption of that right. Now, what will be the effect of this. I presume to say, that a very large number of the students in seminaries of learning, who find themselves there after they are twenty-one years of age, are there, simply, because in their early life their parents had not the means of supporting them at school, and they spent their early years in laboring upon the farm, or in manufacturing, or mechanical pursuits, for the purpose of acquiring funds to obtain an education. It chances, frequently perhaps, that they do not acquire funds until after they arrive at twenty-one or two years of age. At the age of twenty-one, before connecting themselves with any seminary of learning, no matter where they may be in this Commonwealth, they are entitled to vote, possessing the usual qualifications, but at twenty-two, a year afterwards, they pass, perhaps, into a seminary of learning, and what is the result? They have, as I said before,—and it is true to a great extent, and gentlemen here know it is true in respect to a very large number of persons,—they have labored hard to acquire funds to enable them to get this education. Now, in order to enjoy the right of suffrage, they must not only leave the institution where they are pursuing their studies, for a time, longer or shorter, but they are also compelled to draw heavily upon this small fund they have so labored to acquire, to enable them to reach their homes, where they are entitled to vote. I ask if this is not a restriction upon their right to vote? Is it not a virtual deprivation of it? We have already agreed to abolish certain tax qualifications, heretofore required of voters, because of their effects upon some classes of individuals. I yielded to the force of the arguments which were brought in favor of that change. I yielded assent to all that was said of the influence which the payment of the dollar, or the small pittance which the State required to be paid, exercised upon the voter; and I now ask you, Mr. Chairman, and gentlemen of the Committee, whether we shall adopt such a provision as this, which virtually requires a student, who is endeavoring to fit himself to perform well the duties he owes to his country and to the world, to withdraw from his scanty and hard-earned funds, a still larger sum than you have heretofore required of voters, or otherwise lose his right of voting? I, for one, cannot do it. It is not right to take from him his funds in order that he may be secured that right. These are the reasons why I hope the Committee will adopt the interpretation put upon the resolve by the gentleman from Lenox and the gentleman from Williamstown, and then support the amendment. I am very sorry to see that there is a difference of opinion as to the true meaning of this resolve, because it will affect the vote upon this question. Some will vote for it because it is harmless and means nothing, out of respect to the Committee reporting it; and others will vote for it because it is stringent, and they desire to abridge the rights of this worthy class. If I were going to do anything to affect injuriously the exercise of the right of suffrage by any one class, I certainly should not begin here. I cannot support any provision that will operate upon one class of our citizens alone, but I would rather provide that it should be universal, and confined to no one class. If you propose to restrict the right of suffrage at all in reference to residence in a town for a temporary purpose, carry out the principle and apply the rule to all persons who are in a town for a temporary purpose. Let the mechanics of New Hampshire, who come into the city of Lowell every spring to engage in temporary employments during the summer months, be deprived of the right to vote.

QUALIFICATION OF VOTERS, &c.—WILKINSON—WALKER.

If gentlemen will examine the debates of the Convention of 1820, they will find that the question was discussed there, not in reference to students, but in reference to those engaged temporarily in agricultural pursuits. The farmers complained, then, that they employed laborers to help them through the spring and summer months, and that they were permitted to come to the polls to vote, and thereby, perhaps, might control their affairs. But the Convention of 1820 wisely determined to place a restriction of the right of voting upon any class, and I hope we shall not begin at this late day to do what they would not do in 1820.

One remark of the gentleman from Lenox, (Mr. Bishop,) surprised me much, and that was, that we have persons in this State who come here from other States to pass a period of their lives in study, who have no interest in our town affairs, and, therefore, ought not to be permitted to take a part in them. Now, Sir, I supposed that we prided ourselves somewhat in our government. We have been inclined to boast of ours as a model State, and very many gentlemen have spoken here of the little democracies, the pure democracies, which exist in the municipalities of our State, as the cause of our prosperity and success. Now, I would ask, when a young man comes here from another State to acquire an education, why not let him perfect it?—why not let him take a part in town affairs—in these democracies,—study in these “schools of freedom,”—so that when he returns home he may carry with him the seeds of true democratic liberty, and disseminate them among the community where he may reside?

Mr. WILKINSON, of Dedham. The question is simply, whether we will incorporate into the Constitution a correct exposition of a provision contained therein, somewhat doubtful and uncertain, at least to those who are not lawyers. I do not understand the gentlemen who argue against this cause to deny that the explanation should exist somewhere, and be in some form accessible to those who are to decide upon questions of domicile. They doubt the expediency of putting it into an organic law. It is not perhaps of vital importance so to do. It seems to me, however, that all provisions of the Constitution should be made as plain and clear as practicable. That all necessary explanations should appear upon the face of the instrument itself. The framers of the Constitution in 1780 were of this opinion, and they undertook to define “inhabitaney” as used in the Constitution. They evidently considered “inhabitaney” (or residence, as adopted since, each being equivalent to domicile,) as needing explanation, and they thinking the Constitution the proper place for this explanation, inserted the following provision,—“To remove all doubt concerning the meaning of the word ‘inhabitant’ in this Constitution, every person shall be considered an inhabitant for the purpose of electing and being elected into any office for place within this State, in that town, district, or plantation where he dwelleth or hath his home.”

The trouble was that this definition was about as indefinite as the term defined. It by no means removed all doubts. Questions of great difficulty arose, eminent lawyers differed in their construction of this provision. Its application in the several instances enumerated in this resolve was matter of argument before the Supreme Court. It has been there settled in accordance with the doctrine of this resolve, as I understand it. Should the amendment proposed by this Convention be adopted, residence would be the sole qualification of voters. This rather increases than diminishes the propriety of allowing a satisfactory definition to accompany the use of the term.

If there is any difficulty in the phraseology of the resolve it can be put into any form the gentleman from Manchester may desire. No one doubts his capacity to incorporate these rulings of the Supreme Court into such words as may not be susceptible of any ambiguity. The amendment proposed by me would seem to cover all the objections urged by the gentleman for Manchester. It relieves the resolve of all invidious distinctions, if it were obnoxious to any such change before. It has been said that this matter is a proper subject of legislation: that the legislature may pass an act regulating these cases of doubt. I think this suggestion mistakes the true functions of the legislature. The court and not the legislature must interpret the Constitution. The sources of constitutional construction, aside from the instrument itself are the decisions and opinions of our highest judicial tribunal. These are not equally accessible to all. If then this resolve embodies a clear judicial construction of an ambiguous constitutional term, why should it not have a place in the Constitution?

Mr. HALLETT, for Wilbraham, called for the reading of the resolves, as proposed to be amended. They were accordingly read.

The question being taken on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Dedham, (Mr. Wilkinson,) it was decided in the affirmative.

The question was then taken on the motion to strike out the words, “or while a student of any seminary of learning,” as amended by the adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from Dedham, and it was decided in the negative.

So the motion did not prevail.

The question recurred on the adoption of the resolution as amended. A division being called for, and no quorum voting,

Mr. CROWNINSHIELD, of Boston, moved that the Committee rise and report that fact to the Convention.

The Committee accordingly rose, and by their chairman, (Mr. Giles, of Boston,) reported to

THE CONVENTION,

That they had under consideration the resolutions relating to the subject of the Qualification of Voters, and had made some progress therein, but no quorum being present, they had been unable to come to any vote upon it.

On motion by Mr. CROWNINSHIELD, of Boston, the Convention then at fifteen minutes to seven o'clock, adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, July 6th.

The Convention assembled, pursuant to adjournment, and was called to order by the President, at ten o'clock.

Prayer by the Chaplain.

The Journal of yesterday was read.

Report from a Committee.

Mr. WALKER, of North Brookfield, from the Committee on the Qualification of Voters, submitted the following Report, which was referred to the Committee of the Whole, and ordered to be printed.

whom was referred an order of the 19th of May, in regard to the expediency of so amending the Constitution as to provide that no person who shall make or become, directly or indirectly, interested in any bet or wager depending upon the result of any election, shall have a right to vote in such election, or be qualified to hold any office for which he shall be a candidate at such election; also, the expediency of so amending the Constitution as to exclude from the right of suffrage, and the right to hold any office of profit or trust, all persons who may be convicted of bribery, larceny, or other infamous crime; also, all persons who forcibly, or by promises of reward, shall attempt to induce any voter to refrain from voting, &c.; also, the order of June 18th, on the expediency of providing that no voter, during the time of holding any election at which he is entitled to vote, shall be compelled to perform military duty, attend court as a suitor, juror or witness, &c.; also, the order of May 31, in regard to the expediency of requiring that all persons who may be admitted to the right of suffrage after the year 1856, shall be able to read the Constitution of this Commonwealth, printed in the English language; also, the petition of Harriot K. Hunt, that she may be excused from paying taxes, or allowed to vote; also, the petition of Wendall Phillips and others, that woman may be heard at the bar of this Convention in support of her rights, report, that it is inexpedient for this Convention to take any action in relation to the same.

AMASA WALKER, Chairman.

Mr. WILSON, of Natick, moved that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of the resolves on the Qualifications of Voters.

The motion did not prevail.

Mr. WILSON moved that said resolves be laid upon the table.

The motion was agreed to, and the resolves were accordingly laid upon the table.

On motion of Mr. WILSON, of Natick, the Convention resolved itself into

COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE,

Mr. Wood, of Fitchburg, in the chair, and proceeded to consider the Report of the Committee on the Encouragement of Literature, on the subject of

The School Fund.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:—

Resolved, That the legislature shall, as soon as may be, provide for the enlargement of the school fund of this Commonwealth, until it shall amount, at least, to the sum of two millions of dollars; and the said fund shall be preserved inviolate, and the income thereof shall be annually appropriated for the aid and improvement of the common schools of the State, and for no other purpose.

The resolution was agreed to, and, on motion of Mr. WILSON, of Natick, the Committee rose and reported the same to

THE CONVENTION,

With a recommendation that it do pass.

The Report of the Committee of the Whole was concurred in, and the resolution was ordered to a second reading.

On motion of Mr. WILSON, of Natick, the Convention resolved itself into

COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE,

For the purpose of considering the Report of the Committee on the Encouragement of Literature,

In relation to amending the second section of the fifth chapter of the Constitution; that Committee having reported that it is expedient to amend said section by striking out therefrom the words "University of Cambridge."

Mr. Oliver, of Lawrence, in the chair.

The Report was read.

The question being on concurring in the same.

Mr. WOOD, of Fitchburg, asked for the reading of that part of the Constitution which is proposed to be amended.

It was accordingly read by the Secretary.

Mr. WALKER, of North Brookfield, remarked, that on reference to this provision of the Constitution, it was evident that the change proposed was a proper and desirable one, and one which ought to be adopted.

Mr. WILSON. I moved the consideration of this subject in Committee of the Whole, because I thought that the question was a plain and simple one, and that there would be no difficulty in arriving at a conclusion in regard to it.

Mr. WOOD, of Fitchburg. The consideration by which the Committee was actuated is simply this. In making provision for the encouragement of literature, it is deemed inadvisable to make a distinction in favor of the University of Cambridge. The Committee, therefore, recommend the striking out of those words, because they make an invidious distinction in favor of that institution. The proposition is designed for the encouragement of literature in grammar schools and other public schools, as well as in higher institutions of learning.

Mr. EARLE, of Worcester. If I understand it aright, this puts the subject exactly on the ground upon which the friends of Harvard College have long wanted it to be put. Their desire is, simply to stand upon an equality with other colleges. When this university at Cambridge was founded, there was no other institution of a similar class in the Commonwealth. As an evidence of this, it will be recollected, by those who are familiar with the subject, that, in applications for aid that had been made to the legislature for years past, for the benefit of the college libraries, &c., such applications have always been coupled with applications for the aid of other colleges. This amendment simply puts all institutions of learning upon an equal footing in reference to the aid to be furnished by the State. And it appears to me eminently proper that the report of the Committee should be adopted.

The report was concurred in.

On motion of Mr. WILSON, the Committee rose, and by their chairman reported to

THE CONVENTION,

That the resolves ought to pass.

The Report of the Committee was concurred in, and the resolves were ordered to a second reading.

On motion of Mr. STETSON, of Braintree, the Convention resolved itself into

COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE,

On the unfinished business, being the Report of the Committee in relation to Loaning the Credit of the State.

Mr. EAMES, of Washington. It appears to me that the House is not full enough at present to consider this subject. I move that the vote by which the Convention resolved itself into Committee of the Whole be reconsidered.

Mr. STETSON. Is that motion debatable?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not debatable.

The question on the motion to reconsider the vote was decided in the affirmative.

IN CONVENTION.

The question recurred on the motion to go into Committee, and being taken, it was decided in the negative.

Secretary, Treasurer, &c.

Upon motion of Mr. WESTON, of Duxbury, the resolves reported by the Committee on the Secretary, Treasurer, &c., with the motion made by the member for Manchester, (Mr. Dana,) to reconsider the vote by which they were finally passed, were taken from the table for consideration.

Mr. WOOD, of Fitchburg. At the time that the motion was made to reconsider the vote by which the resolves were passed, I certainly understood the gentleman for Manchester, (Mr. Dana,) to object to the passing of only the second resolve, viz.: that relating to judges of probate, clerks of courts, commissioners of insolvency, district attorneys, registers of deeds, county treasurers, and county commissioners. I understood him as urging upon the consideration of the Convention, that it would be better that the judges of probates should be elected for a longer term of time than three years, and in that respect taking him out of, and distinguishing him from, the commissioners of insolvency, district attorneys, county treasurers, county commissioners, &c., and as giving some reason at that time, in regard to that matter. At a subsequent period, a few days ago, when the subject came up, I understood the gentleman to say, that he intended that the motion to reconsider should extend to all the resolves, and the President so considered it. But, I believe, however, the gentleman in his argument, though speaking somewhat generally in regard to the other officers, confined himself more particularly to sheriffs and judges of probates. In regard to sheriffs I believe he abandoned the argument, after it was stated by the gentleman from Lenox, (Mr. Bishop,) that there would be some provision made in regard to the removal of sheriffs, if he should refuse to perform his duties as such. I say that he then abandoned his argument in that regard, and confined his remarks to judges of probate.

Now, Sir, I wish to say that the election of judicial officers, is somewhat of an innovation into the principles of our government. It has generally been considered in this Commonwealth that it would not be safe to trust the people with the election of any judicial officers, and although our Committee have already reported that the judges of the Supreme Court and of the Court of Common Pleas, should not be elected by the people, and that it is inexpedient to make any change in the Constitution in that respect—which report has not yet been acted upon, but will be, and probably will be accepted—yet it is said that the judge of probate so far partakes of the nature of a judicial officer, that this is an innovation which had better not be introduced, and if introduced, that he should not be elected for a longer time than three years. Now all this, it appears to me, arises from the fear of the people. The apprehension may, perhaps, be well grounded, or it may not be. But there is, and there always has been, a large party in the United States, which say they are not afraid to trust the government in the hands of the people; that, although the people may be wrong, and sometimes excited and carried away from the rights, for the moment, yet they settle down aright, and after all, the principles of our government are founded upon the people. That is theory, and that is the principle, and this large party has carried out the principles, to see if the people can govern themselves. There has been an apprehension of trusting the people from the beginning. It arose in England when the popular power was growing stronger and stronger, and it was supposed that there must be one branch of the government beyond and above the power of the people, otherwise there would be no stability or safety in the government—that either the executive, or legislative or judiciary branch should be out of the control of the people, or our whole government would be endangered.

I do not intend upon this occasion to go into that argument at any great length. I say I belong to the party, heart and soul, which is not afraid to trust the people, and I do not believe that an instance can be found where I have hesitated to rest power with the people, and running out the principle into the small communities of the people. That, I believe to be the true principle of republican governments. Hence, it is not surprising that I should be in favor of the election of judges of probate by the people. I say the people are safe to be trusted, and every argument introduced upon this occasion has seemed to imply that it is not safe. It has been said, in the first place, that you want a man who shall be independent, you want to elect a judge who shall feel above any small, petty movement of the community, or of any influential man in the community, by whom he may be guided, or whose influence shall control his independence. Is it not as important that the governor of the State should be independent, as it is that the judge of probate should be, in any one of the counties of the State? Do you not, by saying that unless a man is elected for a long term, he is good for nothing, in consequence of his reliance upon an annual or triennial election, strike down all our annual elections? Does it necessarily follow, that a man is not independent, and that he does not feel that he can judge righteously between man and man, merely because he is dependent for his continuance in office, upon an annual election? It seems to me that the idea carries with it a suspicion that the people are not to be trusted. It is said that you want a man to be independent, and if you rely upon the people for the selection of a judge of probate, he will not be an independent, but a time-serving man, one who is kind and benevolent, and will say "yes," "yes," to every-body. Is that such a man as you like, and will the gentleman for Manchester, (Mr. Dana,) say that such is the man he would prefer? He says, let the governor select. But is the governor any more than one of the people, and is he any wiser, or any safer to be trusted than the people themselves. Will not the people require that the man whom they shall select as their judge of probate, shall possess the same sterling qualities as their governor? It seems to me that it will be so, and, therefore, it strikes me, that if we provide that the judges of probate shall be elected by the people, and that they shall be elected for a long term, instead of a short one, strikes at the principle that it is not safe to trust the people in certain difficult cases, and that there is something over and above the control of the people.

One remark more, as to the question whether a judge of probate should be elected for a longer term than commissioners of insolvency, district attorneys, and the other officers named in this resolve. It is said by the gentleman for Manchester, (Mr. Dana,) that the nature of the business which comes before him, requires that he should hold his office for a longer term. I think not, and my experience is directly the contrary. I know of nothing connected with his business which renders it necessary that he should continue in office for any longer period than the commissioners of insolvency and county commissioners. The county commissioners have not been chosen oftener than once in three years, and although there is business which comes before them, which continues a much longer time than that, and which sometimes hangs along for five or ten years, yet we have experienced no great difficulty in that matter. It sometimes proves a benefit, as it brings up the matter afresh before a new commissioner, who investigates and decides it immediately, which would not be the case if the old commissioner remained in office for a longer time.

Now, it is said that there are a great many matters connected with trust estates, which come under their direction and control, and that it is necessary that a man should remain in office long enough to become familiar with that subject. But it is not supposed that a man will be put into that office to learn the trade, as it were, from the foundation, but one who will bring with him some previously acquired knowledge, of the subject, and of the general principles which control and govern such matters.

And further, I say, that judges of probate are not called upon to decide cases judicially, oftener than are county commissioners. The county commissioners have greater powers, and it is more important that they should be well schooled in their business, than the judges of probate. Questions of the most complicated nature come before them. We have submitted to the election of county commissioners, triennially for many years, and have experienced no inconvenience from it. And I ask if you have found them any more dependent and time-serving, when elected by the people, than when appointed by the governor.

I can see no reason why the judges of probate should not be elected for the same time, and in the same manner, as your commissioners of insolvency, your district attorneys, your county treasurers, your registers of deeds, and your county commissioners. These officers are all to be elected by the people for the term of three years, and there is no reason in the world why the judges of probate should be taken out of and made exceptions to that list, except that singular apprehension resting in the minds of us all—inherited, descended to us from the monarchical government of England—that there must be some power resting somewhere to preside over our people, which cannot be affected by them; else the people would not be safe. It is entirely an anti-democratic feeling. Many times has it been flung in our faces; and the question asked, why we do not carry out democratic principles or monarchical principles? Why not come out clearly, and show that the people are capable of self-government, or come up like men and acknowledge that they are not capable of self-government? Why not take one side or the other? If we say they are capable of self-government, then why not trust the whole power of elections in their hands? why withhold certain officers from their election? The very effort that has been made in this Convention to elect the judges of probate for six years instead of three years, springs entirely from that feeling. There has not, to my knowledge, been one single reason suggested in this Convention why the judges of probate should be elected for a greater length of time than the other county officers, except that they are in part judicial officers, that it protects their judicial capacity better to make their tenure of office a long one, because they will not thus be made, to so great an extent, subservient to the people. Well, Sir, if a man is to be subservient because he is elected to office, to the men who elected him, why he had better not be elected at all. Let him be appointed as heretofore. But if there is any such danger, which I do not apprehend, the argument presented the other day by the gentleman from Boston, in relation to this matter, appears to me to be perfectly unanswerable. It is this: if you have a good man elected for judge of probate, you can re-elect him, but if you have a bad one, and he is placed in office where he cannot be removed until the term of office expires, I ask you if three years is not long enough?

Now, Sir, we are going to introduce a new principle into our Constitution, in making all these officers by the people, and it yet remains to be seen how it will work. We shall undoubtedly be a little bungling at first. We shall not be as likely to select as good officers at first, as we shall by-and-by. We shall make some mistakes, and do we not want the power of correcting these mistakes as soon as possible? For the first three years, although we make our selections cautiously, fairly, and impartially, of the best men in our judgment, for the offices, yet we cannot always tell who are the best men. A man may be good for many purposes, and yet when we come to try him for judge of probate may be found to fail, although he may be found as suitable for many other equally important and responsible positions with any person who could be selected. We can only find who are the best men for judges of probate by experience, and, I submit, whether three years' service is not long enough to make the experiment upon? If your choice is a good one, you may re-elect him, and continue to re-elect him for life if you choose; but if your choice proves to be a bad one, I ask again, if three years is not long enough to keep him in office.

With these considerations I leave the subject, hoping, that the motion to reconsider will not prevail, but that the Convention will allow the resolutions to stand as they have been passed.

Mr. HILLARD, of Boston. In the few remarks which I submitted to the Convention on Friday evening, it was my aim to be as brief as possible, because the minds of the members of the Convention had been in a state of tension all day,

Wednesday,]

SECRETARY, TREASURER, &c. — HILLARD.

[July 6th.

and I did not like to ask them to listen to anything approaching to a long speech.

Certainly there are considerations, which apply with great force to the cases of sheriffs and clerks of courts, to which I did not allude; and I did not allude to them, because the arguments which I had just used with reference to the judges of probate, would apply with equal force to the sheriffs, but as to the clerks of the courts, it seems to me that the relation between them and the judge is of so intimate and confidential a nature, that it requires no argument at all for any candid mind to come to the conclusion, that it would be hardly respectful to the Bench, to say the least, to deprive them of the power of appointing their own officers.

The gentleman from Lenox, (Mr. Bishop,) replied to some of the remarks, which I had the honor to present, and I trust he will allow me to thank him for the manner as well as the matter of that reply. I shall always remember it with gratitude. He told me that I was mistaken in point of fact, in the opinion I ventured to express, that a faithful discharge of the duties of a judge of probate would not insure that favor which would be likely to lead to re-election. Perhaps, Sir, I am mistaken; it is my habit of mind to defer in my judgment to those who have had larger opportunities of gaining information upon the particular matter at issue. I admit that the gentleman from Lenox, and the gentleman from Fitchburg, (Mr. Wood,) are both of them in positions more favorable for coming to correct conclusions in relation to these subjects, than I am, and that the testimony given by them upon this question is entitled to more consideration than mine; and, although I cannot give up my own opinion entirely, yet, I confess, that I cling to it with a less tenacious grasp than I did before.

The gentleman says, that if I mingled more with the people, perhaps I should have greater confidence in their readiness to do justice to men who act from an inflexible sense of duty. Sir, perhaps the gentleman does me injustice in that remark. I have not lived an absolutely cloistered life—I have been for nearly twenty years of my life in the practice of the law—not extensively, not conspicuously, but during that time I have sustained a great variety of other relations towards the community, perhaps more than most of the members of the profession; and my observation of humanity is such—I cannot help it—that I cannot come to the conclusion, that a faithful and efficient discharge of the duties of a sheriff or of a judicial officer, is that which invariably and inevitably wins popular favor.

Now, Sir, the gentleman from Lenox will permit me to say, that perhaps there is an element in his experience which takes something from the value of his opinions upon this subject. He has lived in the county of Berkshire. It may well be held, that the principle of popular elections may safely be intrusted to a community like that—a rural community—an intelligent community, in which there are no very large towns, and where the interests of the people are nearly homogeneous. It would be a matter of less consequence to me if the entire population of the Commonwealth were like that in Berkshire, what was the mode of election of judicial and other officers. I have always looked upon that county as a sort of Goshen, and I feel a mixture of compassion and respect for gentlemen from there, who are obliged to leave their breezy homes upon the hills, and come down here at this season of the year, to live among brick walls and dusty streets. I have not often had the pleasure of visiting those scenes, but when I have, as I looked around me, I have said to myself, that if the men who dwell in so fair a region were not better than others, they were not grateful to God who had cast their lines in, such pleasant places; that if the spirit that dwells in those woods, those winds, those waters, does not pass into the hearts and characters of men with elevating and healing power, it must be because the mind of man is not acted upon by nature—a conclusion that not only poets, but all good men would shrink from.

I can only say upon this, as upon all other subjects, that I am ready to yield my own opinions whenever I find them mistaken. I have had occasion to do so many times before, and I expect to do so many times again. I can cheerfully say to the gentleman from Lenox, that if he held the office of judge of probate and decided against me never so often, if he did it with that gentle dignity with which he replied to my argument on Friday last, he should have my hand and my voice for his re-election just as long as he desired the office.

Now, Sir, I have a word to say to the gentleman from Lowell, (Mr. Butler,) and I am sorry not to see him in his seat. He replied to the remarks I made upon this subject the other day, in that characteristic style with which this Convention is but too familiar; for, to do him justice, he distributes his courtesies with a pretty impartial hand. Like an elephant in an Indian army, he sometimes sets his foot upon friend and sometimes upon foe. In every political troop there are men too rash for captains, too mutinous and headstrong for subalterns. That gentleman thought proper to misinterpret an expression which I made use of, and to make it the ground of a coarse personal reflection upon myself. From the more than common glow of self-complacency which diffused itself over his countenance, he evidently thought he was making a crushing response. But I have survived it. The expression, "the hand that feeds us," which I made use of the other day, is like to have a currency second only to that of the memorable "huge paws." I have been somewhat amused at the ingenuity which has been brought to bear in perverting an expression, which meant simply to express, that there was a relation of good taste and of good feeling between a man and the community in which he lives, which should govern his language among those who were, if not enemies, at least unfriends to that community.

First, it is intimated that I am a friend of proscription for opinion's sake. In the next place, that I am willing to sell my opinion, and to sell my conscience for the lucre of gain.

Sir, nothing is more easy than to make a speaker responsible for sentiments which he never uttered. You have only to tear a particular sentence from its context, and then wrest it from its obvious meaning, and your task is done. We have all heard of the ingenious preacher, who preached a pungent discourse against a prevalent fashion of head-dress, from the text—"top-not, come down"—leaving out the previous portion and close of the verse. That was the perversion of quaintness, but quaintness is not half so good at that work as malice. That sentence has more than once been flung into my teeth in this Convention, by gentlemen whose path I never crossed—to whom I never gave one jot or tittle of provocation. The gentleman from Lynn, (Mr. Alley,) the other day upon this text discharged at me a small pellet of something that tried to be sarcasm, but could not. The report of his pop-gun was so faint that I do not think it was heard by half the Convention. Indeed, nothing but a respect for the decorum of the place prevented me from calling out encore! I thought it selfish to be amused by an exhibition in which so few participated.

Then I have been assailed by divers newspapers. I have been much blackened by printers' ink. A quantity of very formidable nouns, pronouns and adjectives has been let loose upon me. A bit of the Plymouth Rock has been flung at me; and even the uplifted sword of the great Commonwealth has been brought down upon my luckless head. Now, Sir, I wish to say to all these writers and speakers, in the Convention and out of it, that they have the largest liberty of abuse and misrepresentation, that even they can desire. And can I put the case more strongly? They may "cut and come again." My words have been spoken. Where they have fallen, there they shall rest. I will take nothing back. I will explain nothing, I will contradict nothing. They may speak of me as one who is willing to take his opinions from his clients—who is prepared to sell his honor and put his conscience into his bills. And I can tell them of a trick in this game, which perhaps they have not thought of. As unlike most of my political associates, I have not opposed the secret ballot, they may say that I want it for my personal protection; that I want to vote against my clients, and yet not lose my fees. They may paint me a slave who means to be a liar. They may even represent me as one prepared to enter into a secret contract, by which I shall vote for a man, whose political principles I abhor, on condition that he shall vote for a man whose political principles he abhors. That, perhaps, is a depth of baseness of which even their imaginations have not conceived.

They are welcome to all the honor, all the votes, and all the subscribers they can thus gain. I hope that the bread which is buttered with lying, and the meat that is seasoned with slander, may be savory in the mouth and nourishing to the frame. Let them pour on: I shall endure. "Tray, Blanche, and Sweetheart, the little dogs and all"—the bull dogs and the "curs of low degree" may all yelp at me. I shall cast no stone at them. Their bark is harmless, and bite they cannot. The exercise may do their lungs good, and may prevent some of them from dying of a suppression of venom.

Let me come back to this matter of proscription for opinion's sake. As I have been personally attacked, I am sure the Convention will indulge me in a few words of personal explanation. Sir, to those who know me, who know the modest position which I hold in this community, who know my modest fortunes, the idea of my wielding the power of political proscription, is nothing more or less than absolutely ludicrous; and it is especially ludicrous with reference to the gentleman from Manchester, (Mr. Dana,) whose position is notoriously and deservedly higher than mine at the bar. And as to the other part of the charges—that I am ready to take my opinions from the hand that feeds me—if such were the degrading sycophancy of my character, should I be so unmitigated an ass, as to come up here, where every word is recorded and remembered, and make proclamation of it? Such wickedness, such baseness and such folly do not meet in the same person.

By way of defence to this last charge, I hope I may be allowed to refer to one or two passages in the history of my life. The first time I had the honor to be called into public life was in 1836, and at that time in the House of Representatives, upon the question of the exclusion of witnesses on account of religious belief, I took ground against my party and against my constituents. The gentleman for Wilbraham, (Mr. Hallett,) if he were here, could bear testimony to that fact.

Upon this matter my constituents judged me according to their cast of character and feeling. The amiable pitied and lamented my backsliding, and the malicious accused me of having sold myself bodily to the Democratic party, to further my ambitious schemes. For years I was laid upon the shelf, and the door of political promotion was shut against me.

Again, about ten years since, I had the honor of holding a seat in the school committee of Boston, and while holding that position I introduced a petition, and enforced it by a speech, to induce that body to break down the system in Boston, by which colored children are sent to separate schools—a system which I then regretted, and do now regret. Out of a body of twenty-six there was only one person who voted with me. At that time I represented ward No. 6, and there is no part of Boston where such a course could have been more distasteful, from local reasons, known to those who live here. When the question came up, as to my reelection, and it was discussed whether I should be a candidate or not, my friends said, to borrow an illustration founded on an incident in the life of Mr. Clay, that I had missed fire, or at least fired into the wrong flock, but they would pick my flint, and try me again. They did try me again, although there was not a man who voted for me that did not regret my course. I was touched with their confidence then, and am touched by it now when I recall it.

The charges to which I am now replying, form part of a system of vituperation to which I have been exposed for the last three or four years, brought upon me from the fact that I could not, in conscience, join a certain political organization, which has come into existence within the last five years. It was my faith then, and is my faith now, that that political party rested upon a mistaken basis, and that the practical operation of that party was to increase the evil which it proposes to lessen. That was my faith then, and I call God to witness that it is my faith now—and yet I do not suppose that there is a man of that party now listening to me who will do me the justice to believe that I am speaking the truth.

Mr. KEYES, for Abington. I rise merely to make an inquiry of the gentleman. Did not the gentleman state in a speech, upon one occasion, if he was twenty-five years old that he would have joined this same party. [Laughter.]

Mr. HILLARD. I did say so. Because in that event, I should have been young and inexperienced. [Laughter.] The gentleman for Manchester, (Mr. Dana,) of whose reply I do not in the least complain, and to whom I bear no malice therefor, said that there was something he would not say; as the Committee doubtless remember. That is not the first time nor the twenty-first time that the thing which he did not say has been said. I have been told in kindness and unkindness, in friendliness and unfriendliness, in sorrow and anger, that the reason why I did not join that party was, because I did not dare to join it, and that I was afraid of losing my clients. I have yet to see the first member of that party who will do justice to the motives of a political opponent, of the party to which I belong. There may be such a man, but I have yet to see him. I never met any one who admitted that the course of a Whig opponent was dictated by conscientious motives. Towards another class of their opponents their charity is more than Christian. Although we are told that we are to forgive our enemies, yet I do not read that we are required to embrace them. [Laughter.] Proscription for opinion's sake!

We have heard a great deal about proscription for opinion's sake. The matter has been brought up here upon this floor, and the changes rung upon it, again and again. The evidence of it has been found in a scrap from the New Bedford Mercury, and another scrap from the Daily Advertiser of this city. A conspiracy to set Charles river on fire, and the evidence is a squib in a man's hat and a cracker in a boy's pocket! Proscription for opinion's sake! I have seen that consummated and perfected. I have seen the block erected, the victim laid out, the head cut off, and the bloody axe waved aloft in triumph. The time was in 1851, the scene was the Senate Chamber of Massachusetts, the victim was a gentleman nominated for a professorship of history, in Harvard University, and the executioners were the combined Democratic party. No man can say that that gentleman was not qualified to fill that post, by his talents. No one can cast a stone at his character, and no one can say that he was obnoxious to the students, for they one and all petitioned to have his appointment confirmed. No. But he was guilty of holding offensive political opinions, first upon a certain armed contest, four thousand miles off, and then upon a certain civil contest, four or five hundred miles off. For that reason, the brand of rejection was set upon his forehead, the bread taken out of his mouth, and himself cast forth with an indignity set upon him rarely known in the whole annals of that institution. If the case had been reversed, if he had been a Democratic professor, and had been rejected by anti-democratic influence, should we have ever heard the last of it? I respectfully submit it to any candid man, if there was ever in this Commonwealth or anywhere else, a more marked and decided case of proscription for opinion's sake.

The gentleman from Lowell, (Mr. Butler,) in the course of his remarks, spoke about the manners of the bench. I suppose there is no one, who does not now and then get a lick from the rough side of a judge's tongue; but no well-natured person allows the sun to go down upon his wrath.

The occupation of a judge is trying to the patience and the spirits. His laborious and monotonous duties are in themselves trying. He is further tried by the unseasonable pertinacity, the long speeches and the intemperate zeal of the bar. Especially is he tried by the bad manners of a portion of the bar. At the bar there is an assortment of manners; some good, some bad, and some neither good nor bad. There are men at the bar, and conspicuous there too, whose elevation seems to justify the sarcasm of some man of wit, that there were three requisites for success at the bar—impudence, impudence, impudence,—whose professional bearing is marked by coarse brutality and foul-mouthed ferocity—who sometimes tear their victims with their claws, and sometimes bespatter them with their filth—who import their morals from the State Prison, their manners from a bear-garden, and their language from Billingsgate. Who has not seen lawyers of this stamp swaggering about a court house, with the port and bearing of a bar-room bully, after his second mug of flip, insulting witnesses, treating the opposing counsel with indignities studied and unstudied—and especially hectoring and brow-beating the bench? Is there any spectacle which more moves pity and indignation, than that of a judge, who, from weakness or self-distrust, allows himself to be overcrowed by one of these legal ruffians? When, therefore, we judge the severity of the bench, we must measure the provocations by which that severity is called forth. So long as this aggressive spirit dwells among the bar, it is desirable, it is necessary that there should be a power on the bench to keep it within bounds. We may consent to have a hedge of thorns around the fountains of justice, if they are to be protected against swinish tusks and swinish hoofs. So long as we have jackalls and hyenas at the bar, I hope we shall have a lion on the bench, who with one stroke of his vigorous paw, can, if need be, bring their scalps right down over their eyes.

Mr. WILSON, of Natick. Mr. President: I must confess my surprise, my utter amazement at the exhibition we have just witnessed on the floor of this Convention. This exhibition of harsh language, ill-temper and ill-manners, must surprise even that gentleman's friends.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair cannot allow the gentleman from Natick to allude to the manner and appearance of a member of the Convention. It is not in order for him to do so.

Mr. HILLARD. So far as I am concerned, I hope the gentleman from Natick will be allowed to proceed.

Mr. WILSON. I thank the Chair for calling me to order. I do not wish to say anything out of order. I have been in the legislature eight years, and during those eight years I was never called to order for words spoken in debate. I regret that I have said anything that looks like a violation of the rules of order. I have not uttered an unkind word towards any member since I came here, and I have no wish to do so now.

Mr. BATES, of Plymouth. I rise to a question of order. The gentleman from Natick was called to order for referring to certain language—the language which the member from Boston, (Mr. Hillard,) used when referring to the members of the Convention in and out of it. He referred to members of the Convention as “dogs and curs of low degree.” It appears to me to be competent—

The PRESIDENT. The gentleman from Natick was not called to order for referring to the language, used by the gentleman from Boston, but for describing the manners of a member of the Convention.

Wednesday,]

SECRETARY, TREASURER, &c.—WILSON.

[July 6th.

Mr. WILSON. I regret to say that I have listened to-day, to such language applied to members of this Convention as I never listened to before. I deeply regret that the member from Boston should apply to members of this Convention language such as the member from Plymouth has referred to—language which no member of this Convention should permit himself to use on this floor—language which no member should be permitted to apply to members of this Convention unrebuked.

The other day, the member for Manchester, (Mr. Dana,) made an allusion to the city of Boston. He made some reflections upon this city, it is true, but his tone and manner was kind, and could not excite angry feelings in any bosom. The gentleman from Boston, (Mr. Hillard,) referred to the allusions of the member for Manchester, in a manner that took the Convention by surprise. Considering the personal relations of these gentlemen, the tone, language and bearing of the member from Boston, surprised and pained many of us. In that debate, the member from Boston uttered that unfortunate phrase, that it did not become either of them "to strike at the hand that feeds us!" This phrase will make the tour of the country. It is one of those phrases that will be often flung before the people. It is one of those phrases that will long linger in the popular mind—as a phrase that expresses the extremest servility. I then regretted its utterance, and I assure the gentleman that I now regret it. I will here, and now, say, that I do not believe that he is capable of entertaining the sentiment of servility embodied in this unfortunate phrase; I will go further, and say, that I regret some of the remarks that have been made upon that phrase, in and out of the Convention—remarks which I know have stung the gentleman to make the remarks which have fallen from him to-day.

The gentleman talks of bitterness of feeling, of dogs, and "curs of low degree," of hyenas and lions, of manners and morals borrowed from the State's Prison. Sir, I think the gentleman has made the greatest exhibition to-day, any of us have ever witnessed, of the feelings, language, characters and manners he describes. He comes into the Convention with a carefully prepared speech, and, because the member from Lowell, (Mr. Butler,) had referred to him with some severity, he applies to members of the Convention, epithets, that I would apply to no member of this body. He singled out my friend from Lynn, (Mr. Alley,) and, in his absence, applied to him language of scorn and contempt, in a tone and manner insolent and overbearing. It does not become the gentleman from Boston to assume such lofty airs. It does not become any man, and especially a gentleman who makes such pretensions to the refined courtesies and proprieties of life. In intelligence, in character, in moral worth, the gentleman from Lynn, (Mr. Alley,) has few equals on this floor. In accurate knowledge of American history, he has few superiors in this Convention. He is a gentleman of great practical talents, of intellectual and moral worth, and if the gentleman from Boston had known him better, he would not have indulged in such language as has fallen from him to-day. He is my friend—a friend I honor for his sterling qualities of head and heart. If he were here, he would speak for himself, but, in his absence, I will not permit the gentleman from Boston to assail him with impunity.

Sir, the member from Boston indulges in a fling at the secret ballot and its friends. Perhaps the gentleman has just been reading the debates in the British House of Commons. The reformers of England have made another effort for the ballot. They have again contended for it on the floor of that House which, for more than twenty years, has witnessed their noble efforts to secure the independence of the electors of England. But again they have fought in vain. How were they met in their arguments and appeals? Lord John Russell rose and quoted the action of the legislature of Massachusetts. He told the sturdy reformers of England, that the "intelligent State of Massachusetts" had tried the secret ballot, and that the people had abandoned it, after two years of trial; and, therefore, the ballot should not be introduced into England. Yes, Sir, the action of the legislature of Massachusetts, for 1853, is quoted by Lord John Russell, on the floor of the House of Commons, to put down and silence that glorious band of reformers, who are struggling to secure to the people of England those great rights it is our privilege to enjoy. Does the gentleman from Boston feel proud of the fact, that the English minister quoted the action of his whig friends of the last legislature? Do the whig members of the Convention feel proud of the fact, that the action of their friends was quoted, to silence the reformers of England? Tell us, gentlemen, do you feel proud of that speech of the British lord? Sir, I feel indignant and mortified to know, that the acts of Massachusetts can be quoted in the Old World, to silence the friends of liberal institutions. I thank God for the hope I feel, that the people of Massachusetts will, in November next, place in their Constitution the secret ballot, so that Lord John Russell, nor no other lord, can ever more quote the action of a partizan legislature to silence the demands of the people of our fatherland, for the protection of the ballot. Next year, the reformers of England, I trust, will be able to tell Lord John Russell and his brother lords, that the "intelligent State of Massachusetts" has placed the secret ballot into the fundamental law—beyond the reach of party folly and madness.

Sir, the gentleman tells us that charges have been made here. Charges against whom? Against his political party? I deny it, altogether. He refers to an article read by me from the New Bedford Mercury, and to another from the Boston Daily Advertiser. Why does he refer to the reading of these articles? Does he justify those articles? Does he endorse the sentiments avowed in those articles?

Mr. HILLARD. Certainly not.

Mr. WILSON. Then why assail us for referring to those articles? Those articles appeared in leading political and commercial journals. I quoted them to show what men in moments of excitement would say. Why does the gentleman complain of our quoting what he will not defend? He dare not defend here or elsewhere the atrocious doctrines avowed in those articles. I uttered not a word—no, not a word against any political party. I said then, and I now repeat it, that men in moments of intense political excitement, will say and do what reason and justice will not sanction. I referred to the articles in these papers simply to prove the truth of what I uttered.

The gentleman in his remarks to-day has spoken of the political scenes of 1851, and of what he is pleased to call the political proscription of that year. He has referred to an act which took place in the Senate chamber, an act in which I had some little part. He refers to the rejection of Francis Bowen, for the professorship of history, in Harvard University, and he has charged that upon us as an act of proscription. He says, that the block was raised, and that then, and there, that act of political proscription was enacted. I deny the charge of political proscription altogether. I say here, and I am prepared to show it now or at any time, that Francis Bowen was rejected by the Board of Overseers for other reasons than, the sentiments and opinions uttered by him in the North American Review dishonorable and disgraceful as were those sentiments and opinions to the American name, and to the literature of the country. That Review was arrayed upon the side of Austria and Russia, and of despotism, in the great struggle of those times. It was arrayed on the side of falsehood and ignorance also, and for that we rejected him. Will the gentleman from Boston dare rise upon this floor and defend the opinions of Bowen, or deny the facts I now assert? Did not a lady of Roxbury, through the Christian Examiner, in articles of great ability and research, show the gross ignorance, dishonesty and falsehood of the man who edited the North American Review? She has there shown him not only grossly ignorant of the subjects which he discussed, but that in his statements in regard to the questions discussed, he misstated facts, and for that falsehood and ignorance he was rejected in 1851. For that rejection in 1851, the men who put a brand upon him received the universal commendation of the American people without distinction of party, except the little coterie of the Mutual Admiration Society.

I know not, Mr. President, why the gentleman brings these party topics into this Convention. The general tone of the Convention up to this hour, has been to keep partizanship out of the discussions of the great questions pending. The gentleman bitterly complains of the injustice manifested towards himself and friends. He tells us that we can never do justice to our Whig opponents. I dare say that we are sometimes unjust towards our opponents. We may judge them sometimes too severely—too harshly. But we treat them as men—as equals, here and elsewhere. Can the gentleman and his friends say as much? Have not the presses and orators of the party with whom that gentleman acts, for years sneered at, ridiculed and derided their political opponents? Have not the orators and presses of the party with which the gentleman acts, assumed airs of lofty superiority in dealing with their opponents? When, in 1851, the Free Democratic and Democratic parties hurled the Whig party from power, when they took the reins of the government in their hands, did not the deluded Whig presses and orators, in tones of asserted superiority, deplore the sad fate of Massachusetts, whose government had passed into hands too feeble to hold the reins of power? Did not the followers of these jubilant orators and presses come even into this Constitutional Convention with the idea that the men of the majority would go down on this floor before the mighty and overshadowing powers of their chieftains—chieftains before whose lights the men of the coalition would "pale their ineffectual fires." Two months have passed, and that innocent delusion has also passed away. Now, the gentleman from Boston tells us, in sad accents, that we never do justice to our opponents! Sir, it has been my misfortune to differ with the gentleman from Boston in times past. That difference left in my bosom no feelings of unkindness, none whatever. I have none but feelings of personal kindness and regard towards him now. I know he has been hardly dealt with, in and out of the Convention, for that unfortunate phrase, which will not soon be out of the public mind. He is a public man, and he will pardon me for saying that he should not be stung by the taunts of the public press, or by the flings of political opponents, into the use of language unworthy of himself, of the place, and of the body of which he is one of the most gifted members.

Mr. HILLARD. The gentleman from Natick, (Mr. Wilson,) has replied to me in a manner to which I take no exceptions. I shall not treasure up his language against him. Before closing the remarks I have just made, I had intended to apologize to the Convention for the tone of personal justification into which I fell. My defence must be found in the fact, that my language has been wilfully perverted and my personal character assailed. Could the gentlemen of the Convention see the attacks which have been made upon me, and the charges which have been brought against me, they would pardon something of warmth even to a colder temperament than mine. If I have transcended the rules of order; or violated the decorum of debate, I regret it, and throw myself upon the indulgence of the Convention. I can only say, that nothing which has sprung out of this discussion shall leave any root of bitterness behind. Whatever irritation may have been aroused by it shall pass away and leave no sediment of malice behind.

Mr. KEYES, for Abington. I do not propose to prolong this debate, nor to take any particular part in it. But, I wish to call the attention of the Convention to one lesson, which may be, perhaps, drawn from it. It is easy enough to understand the sensitiveness of the gentleman from Boston. I am not surprised at his anger, as I have read many of the articles to which he has referred. They are, indeed, absurd and ridiculous. They charge him with meaning what he did not mean, as we all know. But that is the bitter penalty we are called upon to pay when we enter into politics. I would have him recollect, however, that his party and his friends have, for long years, with almost the entire newspaper press of the State in their hands, and by the use of the public forum, the bar and the pulpit, indulged in one constant and sweeping strain of abuse and slander of the party to which I belong, and the men who compose it. And the gentleman himself has not failed, on this occasion, to follow the example of those whom he so fiercely rebukes, and to use, himself, terms as abusive as any of which he so bitterly complains. I do not say that he has taken an active part in the general system of slander, although one expression of his, to-day, was as pointed and vindictive as anything I have heard from any other source. But it grows, naturally, out of the circumstances in which he is placed, and the society in which he lives. The very air which he breathes has, for long years, been thick and heavy with opprobrium of us and our cause, and that is the source of his inspiration, and, perhaps, the cause of his extreme sensibility.

Instead of being restricted to the feeble means which are at our command, he and his friends have had nearly the whole power of the press of the Commonwealth on their side. If, therefore, we have sometimes, in our agony, breathed words not very polite and courteous, let him remember, that we only did what he has done to-day, uttered, under the influence of excited feelings, words bitter and wrathful, which, perhaps, had better have been left to the imagination, and let him see in it our justification, if there can be any justification for harsh language. The gentleman said one thing, this morning, which calls for a remark. He is a gentleman with whom I do not wish to dispute, and I do not believe it possible for him to create within me any feeling of anger or hostility. In his first speech, he stated that I held my opinions, because the Whig party took the opposite ground. Now, however well he may judge me in other particulars, he could not have possibly made a greater mistake than he did with regard to that.

Mr. HILLARD. Mr. President, I wish to make a personal explanation. The gentleman, of course, relishes a joke, and understands very well that my remark was made in a spirit of pleasantry, and he would have so received it, if he considered my manner at the time.

Mr. KEYES. I supposed that the gentleman had so long studied the newspapers of Boston, that he considered me as a rash, reckless, villainous hyena, or something worse.

Mr. HILLARD. Not at all, not at all.

Mr. KEYES. I supposed, that when the gentleman made his speech at Worcester, to which I referred in my question, he believed the Freesoil party to be correct.

Mr. HILLARD. I believe them now as I did then.

Mr. KEYES. When we saw the two great parties in the country totally subservient to the slave power, sacrificing patriotism, honor, and honesty, in their zeal for the increase and protection of slavery, we thought it wisdom on our part to unite for freedom, as they had united for slavery. It seemed to us just and proper to do so. I do not believe that any man, with such an intellect as is caved in his skull, ever doubted that we were right, and, that that was the only way to conquer our enemy. It was not until this morning that I supposed he had a particle of doubt on the subject.

I wish to refer to one allusion which he made in regard to voting for men by a secret ballot, which he characterized as being so bad that no human mind could conceive of its baseness. I understood that remark to be applied to those persons who united in the election of those two gentlemen, (Messrs. Boutwell and Sumner, then sitting side by side,) the one to the office of governor of the Commonwealth, and the other to a place in the Senate of the United States.

If it is an act of infamy, I confess, I committed it openly in the face of day, and I have never regretted it for one moment, even under the pressure of the heavy charge of the gentleman from Boston just made. I did not suppose that in the vote which I gave for the gentleman, (the delegate for Berlin,) I was committing an act of infamy, the depth of which no human imagination could conceive. I suppose that gentleman may hold opinions different from my own. It would be strange if he did not. But, I ask the members of this Convention, and the gentleman himself, if they can, now that the deed has been accomplished, and the results have been seen, point out the spot where the infamy lies. I ask the gentleman from Boston if it is such an act of infamy as he has described; and I ask him when he makes such a charge against me or the gentlemen who act with me, on such a foundation, if he cannot make some allowance in favor of those persons who slander him.

Mr. HILLARD. The gentleman's argument eliminates the fact that he did not understand my application of the remark which I made. I said, vote secretly.

Mr. KEYES. I understood the gentleman to refer to voting for coalition candidates.

Mr. HILLARD. I am not responsible for the manner in which the gentleman understood me.

Mr. KEYES. He has described a case and I could not suppose that he was using any delicacy; for he employed language not often used in any public body. It was the boldness of his speech which occasioned most surprise. He says that no freesoiler would do a whig, who remained out of that party, justice. Do a whig justice! They would not condescend to give us an opportunity to do them justice. They would not listen to our speech, or respect the grounds of our action. Trampling us under foot with sneers and derision, was all the notice the whigs, at first, took of us. I can account for it.

A great deal has been said about Boston, and I am not disposed to dilute those streams of eulogy poured out in such abundance upon her. I know what Boston is, and I know what Boston whiggery is. It is a halter about the neck, in many different shapes. Years ago, when a whig myself, and residing in Boston, if I asked the name of an unknown individual, and he happened to be a democrat, it was not thought necessary to tell me. It was sufficient to say, Oh! he is nothing but a loco.

So much for the self-sufficiency of whigs, which does not, by any means, grow out of their superior knowledge on political subjects. I believe that a majority of the people of Boston, intelligent, educated and cultivated as they may be on other subjects, are more ignorant of the politics of the State than the people of the country. We remember with what speechless astonishment they heard, one morning, of the defeat of their party throughout the State, an event which the country people had predicted long before.

In Boston, every man of consequence is supposed to be a whig, as a matter of course. When living there myself, I should as soon have thought of renouncing civilization, as of going out of the whig party—the party. The only party, it was considered, for a gentleman to belong to.

The very air of Boston is whiggish. Not to be a whig is to be an outlaw and an outcast. I was coming into town a few days since, (and Boston extends something beyond its geographical limits,) I chanced to meet with a whig, who undertook to give me some good advice with regard to our action in the Convention. He was reading the Journal, and he remarked, that in reading the papers he always skipped the doings of the Convention. That, said I, is the reason why you, and such as you, are so ignorant. You read only your own side of the question; you do not wish to know that you are on the wrong track, nor would you take the other if you did. You are bound to your organizations, determined to sustain them, and know nothing beyond them. Ask them if they read the Commonwealth, and they will reply: "Do you think that I ever read the Commonwealth?" "No, sir! but I should think you had need enough to read it." [Laughter.] Now, Sir, I did not intend to say anything about such matters as the following, but when gentlemen tell us about the open-day acts of the city of Boston, we are reminded of some not so open. The acts which we reprobate, were not done by daylight; they were done by cowards, and they were done in a cowardly manner; the sun of heaven was not permitted to shine upon them. The poor wretches who took part in that act of meanness and oppression (the surrender of Sims) should be hissed with scorn and derision by all the men of Massachusetts, and they would be, if a majority of the people were not themselves slaves to fashion and party.

The city of Boston has a great many merits and a great many weaknesses. It will not do to eulogize it altogether, for there is a great deal of meanness and servility in it, as well as a vast amount of humbuggery of every description. The gentleman speaks of the proscription of a professor who had been nominated for the office of teacher of history in the University at Cambridge. Sir, I was utterly surprised to hear the gentleman from Boston call that proscription. If he had been proscribed for simply holding abstract opinions, I concede that it would have been improper. But he was a man employed to teach the youth of Massachusetts and of the country, the facts of history; and those who were called upon to confirm his nomination believed his doctrines pernicious and hurtful, and unworthy to be taught the rising generation, and they discharged a high and sacred duty therefore, when they decided that he should not hold a place where he could poison the minds of our youth with his pernicious errors, in an institution under the patronage of the State. It is to be hoped that what has occurred will convince the gentleman from Boston that there are two sides to questions; and seeing how sensitive he is himself to criticism, may he learn to appreciate more correctly the injustice of those criticisms which he and his friends have so long bestowed upon others.

Mr. MORTON, of Quincy. I should think that the subject of Judge of Probate had now been fully discussed, and, I, therefore, move the previous question.

Mr. CUSHMAN, of Kingston. By the indulgence of the Convention, I desire to say a single word before this question is taken, as I have been in very feeble health for the past ten days, and have taken no part in the debate. On the 7th of March, I was elected to come here and attend this Convention, and I considered it to be duty that devolved upon me to do so. I was aware of the magnitude of the work that was to be performed, and I took into consideration my inability to perform the duties of a member of this body; but, Sir, I have attended, supposing there might be some occasion where I could perform a humble part. I knew that there were different views and opinions entertained by different gentlemen who belong to the various parties, and when I came here I expected to find more or less of that division exhibited in this Convention. But, Sir, on visiting my home, I have been asked the question, whether politics often ruled here, and my answer was "No; it has ruled but very little—far below my expectations." It has appeared to me, Sir, that the divisions between people in regard to the measures brought forward, subsisted as much among the parties as it did between the parties; and in consequence of this, I reported to them my belief. I considered that but few of the speeches that had been made here, but few of the measures that has been brought forward here before the Convention, were dictated with party spirit. I thought that had in a great measure subsided, and that there was union and harmony prevailing among all the members of this body, and a disposition to do all the duties devolving upon them, in a manner creditable to themselves and to the Commonwealth. I thought that there was an earnest desire and endeavor to transact our business in such a manner as best to promote the welfare of the Commonwealth. I hope such scenes as we have had to-day will be avoided in future, and that we shall go on and do our business as heretofore.

Mr. EARLE, of Worcester. I hope the previous question will not be put now; for before it is put, notwithstanding the extent to which this subject has been debated, I also wish to say a few words in reply to the gentleman from Boston, upon my right, (Mr. Hillard).

The PRESIDENT. The motion is not debatable. The gentlemen from Worcester cannot proceed unless by general consent.

Mr. EARLE. I will say, then, that I hope the motion will not prevail, because there have been some things said personal to myself, to which I feel called upon to reply. If I can be allowed to proceed, I will engage not to occupy the time of the Convention more than ten minutes.

House of Representatives.

Mr. STETSON, of Braintree, demanded the consideration of the subject which had been specially assigned for half-past ten o'clock this morning, being the resolves on the subject of the House of Representatives, on their second reading.

The resolves were read.

Mr. BOUTWELL, for Berlin, remarked that it appeared to him the better way would be to dispose of one subject at a time. In order, therefore, to enable the Convention to dispose of the subject just now under consideration, he would move that these resolves be laid upon the table.

Mr. LORD, of Salem, inquired whether the resolves, if laid upon the table, would not lose their character, as a special order.

The PRESIDENT. That will be the effect of laying them upon the table. They will go upon the Orders of the Day as a subject to be acted upon when reached.

The question, on the motion of the gentleman for Berlin was decided in the affirmative. So the resolutions were laid upon the table.

Orders of the Day.

On motion by Mr. BOUTWELL, the Convention resumed the consideration of the Orders of the Day.

Mr. EARLE. I will redeem the pledge which I made, to be brief in my remarks. I was about to say, that the gentleman from Boston has impliedly, if not directly, made a charge—

The PRESIDENT. The Chair will remind the gentleman from Worcester that the previous question has been called for, and debate is not in order.

Mr. EARLE. I supposed that the motion for the previous question fell upon proceeding to other business.

The PRESIDENT. The taking up of the special assignment did not cut off the motion for the previous question, which had previously been made.

Mr. EARLE. I hope that the previous question will not be sustained, in order that I may have an opportunity to say a few words by way of personal explanation.

Mr. DANA. I hope the main question will not now be taken—not, however, because I wish to make any remarks upon any other subject than the Judges of Probate, as scarcely anything has been said about the unfortunate judges of probate and sheriffs. I should be sorry to have the previous question put now, because everything but the subject matter has been discussed, and I am afraid that would be one reason why the Convention would order the previous question. I did want to say a word or two upon the main question, and but a word or two. I think a reason might be given which would induce the Convention to reconsider its action, almost perhaps, if not quite, with the concurrence of the Committee who reported the resolve.

The question being then put on ordering the main question, on a division there were—ayes 102, noes 117; so it was not agreed to.

Mr. EARLE. I was about saying that the pledge which I made to the Convention, I intend to redeem by making my remarks as brief as possible. The gentleman from Boston, as I understood him, made a charge, by implication certainly, if not directly, that the coalition party had gone into that coalition corruptly, and with a bargain that we would vote, upon one side, for men whose principles we utterly detested and abhorred, on condition that those upon the other side would vote in the same way for candidates, whose principles they abhorred, and to whose doctrines they do not assent. Now, I utterly deny and repudiate the correctness of any charge like that, either here or elsewhere. It is entirely false as relates to the original inception of that coalition, and it is false in relation to all its details. I do not think it very strange, that the gentleman should come here and repeat what he has read so often, and seen so many times, in all the papers which such gentlemen as he are accustomed to read, and which has found no chance for denial, except in such papers as they do not think it worth their while to look into. I say it is false as to the very inception of the movement. So far as I know, the first movement of the kind was made at the Freesoil County Convention in Worcester. When the proposition was made, it is within my certain knowledge, that a preamble and resolutions were adopted, in which it was stated that, inasmuch as we agreed, in the main features, with the policy of the democratic party in relation to the State government and State affairs, if they chose to unite with us and nominate a ticket for State officers, we would unite with them in such nomination.

Mr. MORTON, of Quincy. Mr. President, I rise to a question of order. The subject of discussion is the Judges of Probate, and although I do not like to interfere, yet I moved the previous question for the purpose of cutting off this discussion on these other subjects which have so long passed by. I am, therefore, under the necessity of calling the gentleman to order.

Mr. SCHOULER. I rise to a question of order also. I call the gentleman from Quincy to order because he is addressing the Chair while he is out of his seat. [Laughter.]

Mr. EARLE. I have no doubt that this debate has all been out of order; but if the Convention will allow me to go on, I pledge myself to occupy but a very short time. I trust I may, therefore, be permitted to proceed with my remarks.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair has not yet decided the gentleman to be out of order.

Mr. EARLE. I was remarking that resolutions were passed at that Convention, in which it was set forth that, as we agreed substantially with the democratic party in relation to the affairs of State government, we consented to unite with them in the nomination of a senatorial ticket, but with the express understanding that we did not thereby sanction their peculiar doctrines in relation to national affairs; and, while we did not object to unite with them in the nomination of a State ticket, we committed ourselves in no degree to any opinion, which they might entertain in relation to other matters, on which, we had not hitherto acted in common with them. Nor did we understand that they, by uniting with us in the nomination of such a ticket, assented to any opinions which we might hold adverse to them, or expect that they would endorse such opinion. That was the sole condition on which we entered into the coalition or remained in it, and the only condition, as I understand it, on which it was ever based anywhere. Parties were so evenly balanced in the legislature that the organization of the government could be effected only by a union of some two of the parties, and hence it was necessary that they should unite. What then? Would the Whig party have refused to unite with either of the other parties, if they had a chance? I tell you "nay;" they were ready; and not only were they ready, but they even made propositions to that effect, themselves. They were ready to unite with anybody, who would unite with them, and give the lion's share too, for the sake of it, although differing more widely from both the other parties, than those parties differed from each other.

It being thus necessary that some arrangement was needed for the sake of organizing the government, it was perfectly natural that those who most nearly harmonized should unite for that purpose; yet, as I understand it, at that very time when the great question of the election of a United States senator was under consideration, which detained the House of Representatives so long, and which divided the members of the general court upon the questions of national policy, no man gave a vote in violation of his principles; but, the distinguished gentleman now representing Marshfield, (Mr. Sumner,) was elected by those who concurred with him on national questions, while those democrats who differed from him steadfastly refused to give him their votes, and stood out in their opposition to the last. I do not understand, on the other hand, that, at that time, any one of the representatives voted either for governor or for any other State officer, with whom he did not agree in principle, on those questions of State policy on which they respectively had to act. Yet, as has already been stated by other gentlemen, not only were our opinions misrepresented on that occasion, but no opportunity has been afforded to a large proportion of the people of this Commonwealth to understand this great question. So habitual has become this system of falsehood and misrepresentation, that it seems to have become interwoven into the very texture of the whole system of tactics of the party to which the gentleman from Boston belongs.

As an illustration of this system, I may be permitted to allude to a circumstance, somewhat personal to myself. Since this Convention has been in session, the most prominent political paper in this city, (the Atlas), edited by a leading member of the party, has put forth statements in relation to a member of this body, as utterly groundless as any falsehoods that ever were concocted, and has spread them before the people for the purpose of producing political effect. The statements in that article have been authoritatively denied in another paper, and the author defied to produce any evidence of their truth; and yet, this leading whig paper has not the manliness either to meet the denial or retract the statements, but undertakes to turn the whole affair off with a sneer, notwithstanding that the brand of falsehood remains stamped upon the face of its author and he cannot escape from it. I allude to this incident, merely, as an illustration of the system of falsehood that has been persevered in up to this time by the political press of that party, and which, I am sorry that the gentleman from Boston, to some extent, seems to sanction.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair must inform the gentleman that it is not in order to indulge in that course of remark.

Mr. EARLE. Whether the gentleman from Boston, in consequence of reading only such papers, has come to the belief that everything therein stated is true, and whether he ignorantly supposed that we agreed to vote for candidates who would not fairly represent our views, I do not know, and it is not my purpose now to inquire. It is sufficient for me, that the charge was made; and I felt it my duty to repel it, inasmuch as I was engaged individually before the people, primarily, in making these arrangements, and afterwards in the legislature in carrying them out. I felt, therefore, called upon to make the remarks which I have made, and having accomplished the purpose I had in view, I yield the floor, in conformity to the pledge I made on taking it.

Mr. LORD, of Salem. I perfectly agree, for the purposes of this debate, with the gentleman from Worcester, that he has not done anything of which he need be ashamed, and that the Worcester Spy is just the same old foggy newspaper that it ever was. [laughter,] and that those gentlemen who went off in 1848 because General Taylor was not whig enough, were better whigs than they are democrats now. But while I agree to all that, I do not propose to enter into the merits of the question at this time, but to discuss the question of judges of probate, for I believe that is the question which is properly before the Convention. I shall, therefore, keep out of this general mêlée, by observing the importance of the question before us; and when we want to have a little skirmishing, we can do so when we have some question before us which nobody cares anything about.

I had the honor of addressing the Convention the other evening; and because I thought, then, that there was a disposition on the part of the Convention to place judges of probate and other officers in a different position from that in which the resolves places them, I ventured to make the remarks which I then made.

In reply to the gentleman from Fitchburg, that we dare not trust the people, or are afraid of them, I beg to say to that gentleman, that he does not surpass me in respect for the judgment of the people, whenever their mind is brought to bear upon a subject; and, when he says that we complained that if judges of probate were elected annually, they would not be independent, he is entirely mistaken, for such is not the line of argument which we have adopted. Our objection is, not that the men will not be independent, but it is to the tenure itself. When I addressed the Convention the other evening upon this subject, I undertook to show that the mode of appointing judges was comparatively immaterial; that what we most wanted was an independent tenure when they were appointed or elected; and that, in my judgment the people of Massachusetts, generally, require a higher degree of qualification for public officers, than the executive does. But that is not to my purpose. The proposition to which I will endeavor to call the attention of the Convention is this—that we should make the tenure of the office of judge of probate independent—that we should not permit it to be in the power of any single individual of any political party to say, that because a certain decree is rendered, or because a certain decree was refused, the judge so rendering or refusing should no longer fill his place. I care nothing about the appointing power. In my judgment, it is of vastly more importance that the tenure of our judges of probate should be independent, than it is that the office of judges of general jurisdiction should be independent. Sir, if it were left to me to decide, as to whether I would annually elect judges of probate, or judges of the supreme judicial court, I would say at once, rather let me elect the latter every year than the former? Why so? For the obvious reason that the candidates for the office of judge of the supreme court, will be men who are known throughout the Commonwealth. They will be men of wide reputation, and no little jealousy or local feeling can disturb them in their places. On the other hand, if you take a mere county officer, or a judge having merely local jurisdiction, it must be obvious to all, that in many instances a single individual who has a purpose to subserve, can pack a caucus, by reason of his own political influence, to dispossess him. I have seen such things done numbers of times in relation to county commissioners. A gentleman inquired of me this morning, how it was in the county of Essex, when one candidate had six hundred votes and another only five or six, in one town, while in another town the fact was almost exactly reversed, the gentleman receiving the units in the former town, receiving the hundreds in the latter; and, although the other evening I referred to the same matter, I repeat it now, and shall beg of gentlemen to pardon for saying the same things to a certain extent, that I said the other evening when there was scarcely a quorum present. The explanation which I made to the gentleman was this: in one town, a road had been located contrary to the wishes of almost the entire population, and it was supposed that it was much owing to one of the commissioners, and the entire vote of the town almost was thrown against him; in another town, there was a strong desire to have a free instead of a toll-bridge, and under authority of an Act of the legislature, obtained the year before, entrusting the expediency of the matter to the county commissioners, the inhabitants of the town thought it their duty to throw their almost unanimous vote for the townsman whose views upon the expediency of the measure were perfectly understood.

Through the rest of the county there was almost an entire absence of all interest in the election. What was the consequence? One party wanted a road made in one place, and another in another. One party wanted a bridge here, and another party there; and all the interest that can be enlisted in these county elections is merely local, and often involves personal feelings and prejudices in favor of this or against that candidate. In one county a controversy was waged in regard to a road in one place and a bridge in another, and that road and bridge have made and unmade the county commissioners ever since. Now, suppose that all these matters were thrown at once into a public caucus. Suppose, that the people of one part of the county wanted a bridge, and that those of another portion wanted a certain man for judge of probate, and that between them they could muster a sufficient number of votes to have it all their own way, by each voting for the project of the other; would not some such combinations always be resorted to? Undoubtedly. While, therefore, I am in favor of popular elections for many county officers, yet for judges of probate and commissioners of insolvency, and officers of similar character, I would say that they ought to remain in office so long that they would never desire to become candidates for re-election. I am not anxious about any specific term of years, so that it be long enough to induce men of capability to accept the office. Say seven or ten, or twenty years, if you choose, so that the candidate shall not feel that during his official career, either he or his judgments are liable to be passed upon in a political caucus. And, Sir, all those who are at all conversant with the decisions of judicial tribunals, will agree with me in this—that those decisions which most excite the approbation of the public mind, are those which are most firmly based in right, in law, and in justice. Why so? Because judges are like other men; and they know what the passions and feelings of other men are. If, therefore, there is a high state of feeling on any subject, a judge will not run counter to that feeling, unless compelled by his oath and the duties of his office. Then, Sir, you will have that kind of judgments which it is the boast of this republic to possess—a judgment that is right in itself, and according to the laws of the land. I would not, therefore, have the judgments of our courts of law reviewed in political caucuses, because, on all great and exciting subjects they would be so reviewed. We all can, doubtless, remember in our experience, many instances, in which the decisions of our highest tribunals have been received in the first instance with disfavor by the public mind, but which have afterwards received the sanction of the sober second thought of the people. We have all seen occasions when the public mind has been so excited by judicial decisions, that if the people had had the power immediately to have constituted a court so as to have these decisions reversed, they would have done so. And it will always be so, so long as man is man; for certain parties know just exactly where to spread their sails to catch the popular breeze; and hence, whenever a decision is pronounced, involving any question of that kind, every politician who is anxious to get his party into power will attack it, and make it a subject of political capital to go into market with.

I would not, therefore, have these judges' decisions reviewed and revised by a political caucus. But, I beg the Convention not to understand me at this, or at any other time, as advocating the appointment of judicial officers by the executive. That matter will come under consideration at another time, and be in abler hands than mine. Nor, would I be considered as an advocate of a life-tenure of office. I care not, for the purposes of my argument, by whom the judicial officers shall be appointed. What I desire is, that when they are appointed, whether by the governor, legislature, or the people, they shall hold their office by an independent tenure, and that they shall be subject to removal for nothing but mal-conduct. Now, if five years is enough to accomplish that end, say five years, or if ten is necessary, say ten years shall be the term of holding the office.

I agree, that if you were to submit the election of the judges of the supreme court to the people of Massachusetts to-day, the result would be, that they would elect as good a bench of judges as can be selected. They will start right, and will select good men, but if the judges are to be elected annually, or triennially, and an exciting question should come up before them, which should be decided adverse to the general sentiment of the people, although the decision should be right in itself, yet when the caucus for nomination should come together, they will immediately ask themselves the question, whether it would not add something to the strength of their party, whichever it may be, to enlist that element of diversity of views, in favor of their party. The result will be, if the judges are upright men, they will be set aside, and others elected, who will execute the will of the people. I beg the Convention to make a distinction which the gentleman from Fitchburg, (Mr. Wood,) this morning neglected to make, the distinction between an independent judge, and an independent tenure of office. We should have independent judges, at any rate, until the politicians found they could control the matter of electing them, and then we should have a class of men elected, who are not independent men. The difficulty is, that we could not keep the matter out of the control of political assemblies.

Every suggestion which has been made in relation to the election of judges of the supreme court, or judges of probate, may be applied to the election of Commissioners of Insolvency. I may be pardoned for the reason already stated for repeating some things which I said the other evening in relation to the commissioners of insolvency, an office in relation to which, I think we made a mistake a year or two ago, when we increased the number of them. I think we did right when we said that there should be but one of them in a county. When we increase the number, we give men an opportunity to select the one before whom they will present their petitions. There is always some choice, and when a man is unfortunate, and is obliged to go into insolvency, what will be the qualities which he will seek for in a master of chancery, or a commissioner of insolvency, if he has a choice between two? He will seek for a commissioner who will "put him through." I suppose that phrase is perfectly understood. I do not know what may have happened in other places, but I have heard of a case where it was said that a master in chancery agreed with a man for a specified sum of money, to "put him through." One master of chancery told me, not long since, that a man—the advertisement of whose insolvency proceedings I saw in the newspapers—came to him, and told him that another master had agreed to "put him through" and give him a discharge for thirty dollars. He told him he could not put him through in that way. Now when you multiply commissioners of insolvency, there must be some choice, in that respect, between them, and the one will be selected who will put a man through best. That difficulty is much obviated by providing that there shall be but one in a county. If, therefore, we insert into the Constitution at all a provision in relation to commissioners of insolvency, it seems to me that it would be better policy and wisdom, to say that there shall be no two of them having jurisdiction over the same person, so that there shall be no opportunity for a choice.

I would make the same limitation in regard to justices of the peace, for many of them act pretty much in the same way. There is a common saying, perhaps founded in some truth, that every lawyer has his justice before whom he brings his actions. If you give parties the selection of their tribunals, they will select those which will act most favorably to their wishes. A tribunal thus selected will, by an unerring and unmistakable tendency of the human mind, act favorably towards the party which thus gives it the preference.

As to commissioners of insolvency, then, I would say that there should be but one in a county, and I would not let the tenure of his office depend upon popular favor, any more than I would upon the executive favor. I would have him feel, while in office, that there is nothing but his own misconduct which can remove him. I do not believe that the public mind of Massachusetts, is prepared to say that the judicial decisions of the judges shall be reviewed in political caucuses.

Judges of probate have the most important, and most delicate of all trusts committed to them. They are the guardians of those who have no guardians. Minors, and persons incapable of acting for themselves are before them, and their rights are decided upon. And who does not know, that when there is no person upon the one side but a minor or minors, and upon the other side an active and bustling political man, who makes a noise in his local district, that when the latter presents his account—especially when the election comes off the next month, and the judge wants office—the judge will pass his accounts a little more carelessly than he would under a different state of things. I am speaking now of the best of men. I believe that the best man, if unfortunately he is in the position to desire the continuance of his office, will unconsciously to himself, act less stringently under the pressure of political power than he otherwise would. Well, Sir, if that is the case with the best of men, how would it be with those who care about nothing but their continuance in office? There are some such men, and they are the ones, who, if the office is submitted to party scramble, will act unjustly and oppressively.

SECRETARY, TREASURER, &c. — DANA — BATES — SCHOULER.

I wish, therefore, that this matter may be reconsidered for the purpose of providing in some mode—I am not particular about the way in which it is done—that persons who perform any judicial functions, shall, when they are in their places, stay there, notwithstanding political caucuses do not like their decisions, and notwithstanding a single person or many persons may be dissatisfied, unless there is a mal-administration of his duties.

I ought, perhaps now in closing, as I did not in the outset, beg pardon for calling the attention of the Convention away from a racy discussion which was going about matters and things in general, to the matter directly under discussion. But when we shall have disposed of this subject, and have something before us not very serious in its nature, I should like, for one, to discuss the gentleman from Worcester, (Mr. Earle,) a little, but I am afraid to do it now, because if we lose sight of this subject at this time, when we come to vote I fear we shall not be disposed to reconsider it. But if we now act and bring our judgments to bear upon it, as men acting for the interests, not only of ourselves, but of those who come after us, I think we shall determine to make judicial officers independent in their tenure of office.

Mr. DANA, for Manchester. I suppose that the responsibility of deflecting the course of business upon this subject devolves somewhat upon me, and I feel considerable responsibility because I moved a reconsideration of this question. I supposed then that after half an hour's discussion, the whole matter would be ended. But this subject has been taken up several times, almost always in a thin House, and discussed there. And it is proposed this morning in a House of four hundred members to take the question upon a matter which had been discussed in a House of ninety-seven members, and I thought it was fit that a few words should be said upon the question. But when it did come up again, we had two or three hours taken up upon a question which was not relevant.

I beg the indulgence of the Convention a few moments, while I state a few reasons for the reconsideration of these resolves. The Convention will recollect that they have taken their final passage, and if we fail to reconsider them now we cannot undo the work hereafter, and the Committee, upon whom that duty devolves, will immediately put in form what the Convention has resolved upon. If you do not reconsider this question you will have declared that the judges of probate, sheriffs, clerks of courts, and commissioners of insolvency, shall be elected once in three years. I do not propose to discuss the general question of an elective judiciary upon these resolves, because of all the officers named in the resolves, only one, the judge of probate, is judicial, and even he only semi-judicial, and I think it probable that many gentlemen who would not be in favor of an elective judiciary, would still vote to have the judges of probate elective. But I am told that the Convention has pronounced in favor of the election of a judge of probate every three years. If so, I should not be willing to seek to reverse a judgment of the Convention, formed after mature deliberation and pronounced at a regular stage of the proceedings upon the resolves. If the Convention thinks that these various officers ought to be elected, I have nothing to say upon the question, and I do not propose to raise it in my remarks, and I regret that the friends of this measure should have raised the question of an elective judiciary upon this issue.

I had the honor of suggesting to the Committee, yesterday or the day before, that we have declared that the sheriff should be elected by the people every three years, but had made no provision for a removal or suspension of that officer. So that whatever might be the conduct, he could not be removed. I am informed by the chairman of the Committee that they are about to present a resolve to cure that defect, and the very Committee who brought in this resolve acknowledge that it is absolutely necessary to clothe the governor with the power of removal or suspension, and they are now preparing a resolve to that effect. I would simply ask, whether in the judgment of this Convention, it would not be well to agree to a reconsideration, without any further debate, until that Committee bring in their other bill, without which, they confess, it would not be safe to pass this resolve?

There should also be a power in the courts to remove or suspend their clerks. I do not believe that the judgment of the Convention has been particularly taken upon the question of electing clerks. It seems to me that the clerks would be better appointed by the courts. The people might as well elect the clerk of the House of Representatives, the clerk of the Senate, the speaker of the House, and the president of the Senate, as to elect the clerks of the courts. I believe every great body is better fitted to elect its own officers, than any power outside of it. But still, if the Convention have deliberately considered the subject, and think it best that a foreign power should appoint the officers of a particular tribunal, I should have nothing to say upon it, because I do not think that any great harm will grow out of it. But, I think the courts should have power to remove or suspend their clerks for misconduct, or faithlessness in the discharge of their duties. You have, however, given no such power.

I find, also, in the Convention, a number of members who are in favor of the election of the judges of probate, but think that term of office is too short. The gentleman from Otis, (Mr. Sumner,) in whose society, within arm's reach of my seat, I have had much pleasure during this session, has said that he thinks the term too short, and wishes to extend it to six years.

Since there may be some doubt about the propriety of electing the clerks of the courts, and since we ought to give the judges power over these clerks, and we ought to give the governor power over his sheriffs, which we have not given them,—apologizing to the Convention for having brought up this question again, and having most unintentionally and innocently been the means of consuming much of its time, having unfortunately brought up the subject under most unfavorable auspices,—I submit to the Convention whether, under the circumstances, it will not be better to reconsider the vote by which these resolves passed, let the matter lie over until the Committee make their other report, and then let all the subjects connected with the matter be disposed of together.

Mr. BATES, of Plymouth. I certainly hope that the motion to reconsider the vote, by which these resolutions have been adopted, will not prevail. I have no particular feeling, as a member of the Committee which reported the resolve, about the tenure of office of the judges of probate. But the course which this debate has taken, makes it somewhat singular in its character; and there is manifested, upon the part of some members, a disposition to bring into the debate an element which I am sure was not intended by the gentleman for Manchester, (Mr. Dana,) who moved the reconsideration. Of course I do not impute improper motives to him, because I know him to be incapable of entertaining them, but the disposition is consequent upon the course which the debate has taken since the motion to reconsider was made.

Now, Sir, when this matter came up for consideration on the adoption of the resolutions, it consumed an entire day in the Convention, in the absence of the gentleman for Manchester. In the course of that debate all these objections were considered with reference to the election of clerks of the county courts, and in relation to the district attorneys, the county treasurers, the county commissioners, and the commissioners of insolvency. All these objections were thoroughly and fully discussed, and under these circumstances the resolves passed the Convention with only forty-one votes in the negative.

But a motion was made to reconsider, and upon that motion we have consumed three days of the time of the Convention in the discussion of the same questions over again, as well as almost every thing else, and now we are asked to reconsider the vote by which these resolves passed, and allow the matter to lie over until another report is presented from the Committee, and then take up that report in connection with these resolves, which of course will open the whole question again, and we shall probably have three or four days more discussion upon the same subject. It is now plainly and openly put to the Convention, that the clerks of the courts, and certain other officers named in the resolves, should not be made elective. This is made as one of the strongest reasons for a reconsideration, and of course this question will open a new field of debate from that which was intended by the gentleman who made the motion, (Mr. Dana,) and I submit, therefore, to the Convention, whether, under these circumstances, after the resolves have been finally passed upon with so great unanimity, and after we have spent so many days in discussing the motion to reconsider, we shall now agree to a motion which will again place the subject back where it was when we commenced, and open it again for a protracted discussion? I certainly hope the motion will not prevail.

Mr. SCHOULER, of Boston. When these resolves were first before the Committee of the Whole, I said a few words in favor of the Report. I voted for it and I intend to vote for it all the way through. But after all the discussion which has taken place in reference to this matter, and after the course the debate has taken this morning in regard to an elective judiciary, and especially after the remarks of the gentleman from Salem,

Wednesday,]

SECRETARY, TREASURER, &c.—SCHOULER—LORD.

[July 6th.]

(Mr. Lord,) I think it necessary that I should say a very few words upon the subject.

I am opposed to an elective judiciary, but I never supposed, and I never heard it supposed by any one until this morning, that it was more necessary that the judges of probate should have a life tenure than in the case of the judges of the supreme court and court of common pleas. Sir, I cannot concur in that doctrine at all. The judges of the supreme court and court of common pleas have a great deal more power placed in their hands than do the judges of probate. They can put a man into the State prison, and they can do a great many things which the judges of probate cannot. They, in fact, have control over his life, his property, and his liberty, which, I presume, no man would contend the judges of probate have.

I believe these officers ought to be made elective. I believe we shall find no difficulty, and a great deal of advantage arising out of it; at least, we shall find more than sufficient advantage arising out of it to counterbalance the evil. Sir, when we get a good man in office, he will of course discharge his duty in such a way as to merit the respect and confidence of the community. The very fact, that he has the property of widows, orphans, and infants to administer and take care of, and the fact, that if he does not take care of it properly, the community will take care of him, by not reelecting him, instead of being an inducement for him to do injustice to that class of persons, in my opinion, would be an inducement, if to swerve at all, to swerve towards the side of weakness—towards the protection of that class of persons who always have the sympathies of the community.

I say, I can see no evils arising out of the principle, and I have perfect confidence that it will have the effect to carry out the ideas of those who desire that a judge should always lean, in his sympathies, towards the side of the weak, without swerving in the least from the path of justice. It is true that a hue and cry may be raised by some politicians against the judge for this reason, but where there is one against him there will be ten or twenty in favor of him.

Now, with regard to these officers, my friend from Salem, (Mr. Lord,) says, we wish to have the commissioners of insolvency made elective, so that they may put the insolvents through, and he gave us some instances of the way they put them through down in Essex county. Now, Sir, I would like to ask the gentleman from Salem, whether those men, who advertised that they would put a debtor through for thirty dollars, were commissioners elected by the people or appointed?

Mr. LORD. The gentleman from Boston has entirely mistaken my argument. I did not argue against making these officers elective. I argued, that the tenure of these officers should be made permanent and independent, and the cases which I mentioned, to which the gentleman alludes, took place where the tenure of the officers was not permanent or independent. They were subject to removal at any hour. What I want is, that they should be made independent.

Mr. SCHOULER. Well, Sir, I understand we are going to have a resolution reported by the Committee, making these men amenable to the executive, or some other power, to be removed whenever they do anything wrong, or worthy of removal, and, therefore, their tenure will not be any more permanent after they are elected, than before. But, I think three years is long enough to continue them in office. But the question I wish to ask is this: if there are men appointed or elected, such as the gentleman has described, who will advertise in the newspapers, that they will put a man through for thirty dollars, or for any sum? I want to know if anybody supposes such men could be reelected in the county of Essex? No, Sir; the very fact that a man's conduct is to be reviewed by the whole people in the county, will be sufficient to prevent the appearance, hereafter, of advertisements from commissioners of insolvency, that they will put men through for thirty dollars apiece.

But, Sir, the gentleman says, it is the policy of these commissioners of insolvency to clear a man of his debts, because the friends of the debtor will go for his reappointment. Now, Sir, if these officers are made elective, and they undertake to clear a man wrongfully of his debts, it may be, as the gentleman says, that some strong politician will go for his reelection; but then the gentleman forgets, that perhaps a dozen strong politicians will go against him on that account, so that one will balance the other, or, as I think, one will a little more than balance the other.

Now, Sir, I do not wish to occupy the time of the Convention, but I desire to notice one point more. The gentleman does not wish to have the subject of judicial decisions brought before a political caucus. Sir, I am perfectly aware of the influences which are sometimes made use of in a political caucus, but it sometimes happens, that men who have had considerable to do with them, use them to make a scarecrow of. Now, I have no fear of this. It is not to review the decisions of a judge that the political caucuses are held, nor is that a question likely to come up. The only question in respect to these men will be, as to their capacity and fidelity, and if they are men who do their duty,—as we can find men in all our counties who will,—I do not apprehend any difficulty in reelecting them. But, Sir, I understood the gentleman, sitting on my right, who was district attorney for a number of years in his county, that the office of register of deeds, which has been, heretofore, an elective one, has been continued to the same man in his county for more than thirty years, and I have no doubt that it will be found to be so with the judges of probate, if they are found faithful in the discharge of their duty, and so with all those other officers. Their duties are not of a political nature. They are not political officers, and they cannot well be made such.

Sir, I think we shall gain something by making them elective; we shall, at least, put a little of the urbanity, the suavity, and the grace of life into some of these officers, where, I think, it is very much needed. If it makes a man polite and courteous to make him elective, according to the same rule, it will make him the reverse to give him office for life. It will make him austere and forbidding. Now, I think that, by infusing a little of the popular spirit into one of these officers, we shall gain more than we shall lose,—we shall gain more in making him polite, courteous, and faithful in the discharge of his duty, than we shall lose on account of any wrong influence that may be brought to bear upon him on this account.

Then, in regard to the sheriffs, I am also in favor of their being made elective. I am aware that the duties of a sheriff are not of a very courteous kind; but, then, if they were made elective, I think they would meet a poor man, whom they had to apprehend and arrest, a little more as though he were a human being, than they do now.

I want to infuse a little of this feeling into all these officers, and I think we shall do it, by making them elective. Let them be made removable by the governor, or by some power, if they do not attend properly to their business, and then let the people elect them. I think they will be more likely to perform their duty well. I think it will have the effect to greatly improve the character of these officers, and I think that by adopting it in the Constitution, it will greatly improve the Constitution.

Mr. WILSON, of Natick. I ask the unanimous consent of the Convention, that I may submit a motion that the question be taken at fifteen minutes past twelve o'clock.

Mr. LORD, of Salem. I desire about two minutes, to reply to the gentleman from Boston, (Mr. Schouler,) and then I have no objection to the question being taken. I, however, desire that time, and therefore object.

Mr. WILSON. Then I move that the subject under consideration lie upon the table, for that purpose.

The question was taken, and the subject under consideration laid upon the table—ayes, 112, noes, 56.

Mr. WILSON, of Natick. I now move that the question be taken at 17 minutes after 12 o'clock.

Mr. LORD, of Salem. I do not believe that there is anything to be gained by this motion. This morning the demand was made for the previous question. That motion the Convention would not entertain, for the reason that certain gentlemen desired the matter should be farther discussed, and the Convention did desire that it should be farther discussed. By a rule of legislative bodies, the previous question cannot be moved again during this session. The Convention understood that perfectly well, when they settled that they would not then take the question. Now, by a sort of parliamentary manoeuvring, the gentleman from Natick proposes to lay the orders of the day upon the table, so that he can make a motion to take this question, and avoid the rules which say that the previous question shall not be moved again, when he knows that there are persons who desire to speak, not dilatorily, not to consume time unnecessarily, but to express their honest convictions, which they have a right to express, as good a right as the gentleman from Natick has to talk by the hour about a professor of history in Harvard College. With a poor grace does it come from him, to say that there shall be no discussion upon this question, upon the motion of a gentleman who has been half an hour talking upon something.

The PRESIDENT. The gentleman from Salem is taking too wide a range of debate. The question is upon the time for closing the debate.

Mr. LORD. I submit that I have a right to make a suggestion. I do not know how wide a range may be allowed, but I submit that I have a right to suggest that the Convention ought not to sustain a motion to stop the discussion of the real question, coming from a gentleman who has been discussing politics to the exclusion of the real question, while it was before the House. I desired to say, and I think it is in order for me to say it, that the gentleman from Boston, (Mr. Schouler,) had misconceived certain views which I meant to express, and also to show an illustration of what I thought was the practical operation of this thing. I desired only to discuss the question fairly and properly, and if, by a sort of parliamentary management, gentlemen are to be prevented from discussing questions, when they adhere to the question, by those who do not touch the question, I think that we had better adopt different rules.

Mr. WILSON, of Natick. A single word in reply to the gentleman. The gentleman from Salem has already spoken more than one hour upon this question. I wish simply to say, that I occupied but ten minutes this morning, upon the subject to which he referred, and, with three exceptions, that I have not exceeded fifteen minutes at any time during the session. The gentleman from Salem has already spoken over one hour upon this subject. He spoke forty minutes the other day, and some twenty-seven or twenty-eight minutes this morning. I made the motion, not to preclude him from speaking again, but because I thought we had spent a great deal of time already upon this question.

The question, upon Mr. Wilson's motion, was then taken, and it was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON then moved the consideration of the special order, being the resolve relating to Sectarian Schools.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. TYLER, of Pawtucket. I wish to inquire of the Chairman, or any other gentleman who can give me the information, what is the extent of the meaning to be attached to the word "schools" here, whether it is confined to common district schools, or whether it will include academies, colleges, or other institutions of learning. I should be glad to be satisfied upon that point.

Mr. STETSON, of Braintree. I move that the word "colleges" be added after the word "schools."

Mr. BLAGDEN, of Boston. I do not see that the chairman of the Committee, or any member of the Committee is present except myself, and, therefore, I will answer the inquiry of the gentleman from Pawtucket, (Mr. Tyler). The Committee understood by the term schools, the common schools, and I understood distinctly that it did not embrace colleges.

There is another resolve reported by the Committee, recommending the Convention to strike out the words "University of Cambridge," from the article relating to that subject in the present Constitution.

Mr. LOTHROP, of Boston. I hope the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Braintree, (Mr. Stetson,) will not prevail. The resolve as it stands, it seems to me, is perfectly distinct and clear. The gentleman from Pawtucket, (Mr. Tyler,) inquired as to the meaning of the resolve, and what it was proposed to cover. It seems to me that it covers distinctly the common schools of the Commonwealth, and nothing more. No academies, properly speaking, are entitled to a share from the public money. The public money has a distinct meaning, and every gentleman understands what that meaning is.

Our academies are more or less corporate institutions, in the hands of trustees, like colleges, and they are in various ways connected with the religious or denominational sympathies of the people of the Commonwealth. In general, they are conducted in such a way as to promote the great object for which they were instituted, to provide education for those who wish to avail themselves of their privileges. This resolution relates simply to the common schools of the Commonwealth, and to the public money arising from the income of the school fund, and from taxes levied for the support of those schools, and we wish to provide against any sectarian or denominational influence being brought to bear in their management. That covers the whole extent of the resolution. As my colleague says, there is another resolve reported by this same Committee, recommending the Convention to strike out the words "University of Cambridge" from the article on the encouragement of literature, as it now stands in the present Constitution. We contemplate doing that, because the university at Cambridge, and all the colleges of the Commonwealth are included under the phrase "all seminaries of learning," which is used in that article. The Commonwealth has the general care of these seminaries, and an interest in all of them, yet they are distinct from the common schools of the Commonwealth, inasmuch as they are incorporated institutions in the hands of trustees, and therefore not so particularly or directly under the charge of the Commonwealth, as the common schools. It seems to me that nothing would be gained, by adopting the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Braintree, and considerable confusion might arise hereafter from its adoption. Suppose, that, in the course of a few years, something should occur, which should dispose or induce the legislature of the Commonwealth to make an appropriation from the State treasury, to Amherst or Williams' College, or the University at Cambridge. Each of these institutions, to a limited extent at least, is in the hands of a particular religious denomination; in the public mind, certain particular religious views and opinions are associated with one and another of these colleges, and yet the general interests of education, as well as the interests of the college, might be promoted, and the whole State benefited by such an appropriation from the Commonwealth, to one or the other of these colleges. It would be wise, just, patriotic legislation to make the appropriation. No sensible man in the State, of any denomination, would object to it; and, yet it might be argued that it could not be done under this article of the Constitution, provided the amendment of the gentleman from Braintree prevails, and this argument would be conclusive; the college being in the hands of trustees of a particular denomination, would, upon a strict construction, come within the rule, and be regarded as sectarian in its character. It seems to me that the insertion of the word "colleges" would only produce confusion, and that the resolution, as it stands at present, is distinct and intelligible, and covers all that is important in this matter.

I wish to modify my amendment by adding the words "or any seminary of learning," which I think will cover the whole ground.

Mr. FROTHINGHAM, of Charlestown. I had the honor of being upon the Committee that reported this resolution, and, perhaps, it is not out of order to state, that in the Committee I was opposed to the adoption of this resolution, not however to the subject which the resolution is intended to secure; for, I agree with those who go the farthest, that our common schools should be kept entirely free from sectarian influences of all sects and kinds. But, it seems to me, that there is one provision of the Constitution which is so ample as to cover this subject entirely, and that, therefore, an additional provision in the Constitution would seem to be mere surplusage. I would beg the privilege of reading it. It is in the amended article which was inserted, instead of the third article. It reads as follows:—

"And every denomination of Christians demeaning themselves peaceably and as good subjects of the Commonwealth shall be equally under the protection of the law; and no subordination of any one sect or denomination to another shall ever be established by law."

For that reason, because there was enough in the Constitution already, I was opposed in the Committee to the adoption of the resolve, and I shall vote against it here in the Convention.

Mr. BIRD, of Walpole. I would like to ask the gentleman from Charlestown, whether we have not, with that clause in the Constitution, granted appropriations to Harvard, and Williams-town, and Amherst colleges?

Mr. FROTHINGHAM. The gentleman asks in relation to colleges, and not in relation to schools. I merely answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. STETSON. After looking this over in all its various phases, I think now, that in order to have the construction plain, the word "any" might as well be stricken out. Then I think it may be explicit enough, and I modify my amendment in that manner.

Mr. KEYES. It was suggested to my mind by the remarks made by the gentleman from Williamstown, wherein he seemed to indicate that there was no necessity for this; that I also could not see precisely how it was called for. But, it strikes me, there might a great deal of difficulty grow out of it in consequence of the doubtful meaning of the words "sectarian or denominational schools." What is meant by these terms? Does it mean schools where theology of one sort or another is taught? Or, does it mean those where theology may be taught, and nobody but persons of a single denomination shall go; or does it mean a school where the leading idea is one thing, but where the school is open to every-body? It appears to me, that if there was anything against which, persons might have any objection, in any of our schools,—if there was such a provision in the Constitution,—they might be opposed on the ground that they were denominational or sectarian. All the schools are under the influence, in chief, of some denomination or other; and there is no college but what the leading religious idea is one, whether it be under the direction of the Baptists, Presbyterians, Unitarians, or Episcopalians. When I was a small boy, at Amherst, I did not suppose that there was any other religion in the world than that which was called Orthodox. It never occurred to me that there was any other worthy the regard of good men. I want to know whether these provisions are to apply to such an institution as that, where every professor was of one religious sect, and where every lesson in history, and every lesson from the Bible, had the color of that sect, and where, if we did not have a revival once in a quarter, there was thought to be a great lack of grace. I want to know whether such an institution would be termed denominational or not, under the operation of the provisions of the resolution before us?

And I want to know another thing, which, perhaps, some persons may find a little more delicacy about. I want to know whether it is aimed at the Catholics or not? Now, I pass once or twice a week where I see not "the ruins of the convent," but the ruins of the Catholic college at Worcester. It was by accident burned down; and who knows but that that institution may apply to the legislature for aid in rebuilding its walls. I do not know why that college has not the same right to ask, and why there is not the same duty on the part of the government to grant assistance to that institution as any other literary institution. For all our people are on the same basis, and have equal claims to the patronage of the government as the Medical College at Pittsfield, or colleges at Williamstown, or Amherst, or Harvard, which have received aid from the public treasury. The question is, is this intended to have any such application? Unless there is some technical meaning beyond what is contained in the words of the resolution, it seems to me it is of no use at all, because all our schools are in one sense denominational, and in another sense, none of them are denominational.

I understand the Catholic college—and that is probably the strictest sectarian school in all New England—is open to anybody who has a mind to comply with the regulations, and pay the bills. If that is the fact, then that school and Harvard College stand upon the same basis. Neither one is denominational in one sense, and both are denominational in another sense. Unless there is some special reason why we should embarrass the Constitution with such a provision which has not been adverted to, I hope it will not be adopted at all.

Mr. CHANDLER, of Greenfield. It will be observed that there was another resolution presented to this Committee relative to a public fund, raised for the encouragement of our common schools. I do not find the resolution among my documents, but I think it has been before the Convention, and that they have acted upon it. In that resolution it was declared that when this fund had accumulated to two millions, the avails of it should be appropriated to the support and improvement of common schools, and for no other purpose. This was designed to guard the public fund, the school fund, from being appropriated to any other purpose than the support of common schools and the common school system, implying, of course, normal schools for the education of teachers, and perhaps teachers' institutes; and it was not to go out of the line of the common schools. That, by some of the Committee was thought sufficient, and by others it was thought better to add a particular resolve guarding it still further. And this was added:—

Resolved, That it is expedient so to amend the Constitution, so as to provide that no public money in this Commonwealth, whether accruing from funds, or raised by taxation, shall ever be appropriated for the support of sectarian or denominational schools.

That is a resolution relating to the same fund, to guard it sacredly; and there was no word pointing at the Catholics or any other denomination. But the Committee were aware that denominations are very fond of influences and of receiving countenance from the public, and many would be glad if they could get hold of the public fund, to appropriate that to build up their own denomination. The Committee judged it altogether improper, and they wished to guard the public fund against it; for they wished it to be preserved sacredly for one single object.

The gentleman called for information, and I believe that this is the understanding which the Committee have; at least it is the understanding which I received. I am sorry that the chairman of the Committee is not here to state the matter more fully.

Mr. WILSON. I wish simply to say a single word in relation to the amendment of my friend from Braintree. I hope that amendment will not be adopted. I suppose that this resolution is intended to apply strictly to common schools. The object to be attained is this—that our common schools may be open to all the children of the State, without distinction of sect or condition; so that the school fund may be forever preserved, not only that portion, the proceeds of which are to be applied to common school education, but that which is raised by taxation, so that our common schools shall stand in the future just as they do to-day, and as they have stood in the past, and to avoid if possible the question which may hereafter arise as to the establishing of sectarian schools. I think the resolution not so clear as it ought to be. I have seen a resolution drawn up by the distinguished delegate from Cambridge, (Mr. Parker,) which I think, if I fully comprehend it, covers the whole ground. As to this amendment, I cannot vote for it in any way. I am willing to vote money, if we have it to spare, to Williams' College, or Amherst, or Harvard Colleges, or any other sectarian colleges or seminaries of learning. They are all sectarian, more or less, and I think they should not be mixed up with the common schools, where we all say sectarianism should never come. I wish my friend from Cambridge would move the amendment which I have seen in his hand, and which I think is quite sufficient. I hope, at any rate, the amendment of the gentleman from Braintree will not prevail.

Mr. STETSON. I did not intend to say a word upon this subject, but the remark of the gentleman from Natick has drawn me into it. I do not believe it is necessary that this resolution should pass at all, but, if it is to pass, I think my amendment is necessary, because, as the resolve now stands, it is not sufficiently explicit; and then, I do not know why we should not appropriate money to schools which may be called sectarian, as well as colleges which are sectarian. If any gentleman will give a good reason why we should not, of course I would have no more to say. But, my opinion is, that there is no necessity for such a provision in the Constitution; therefore, I have moved the amendment, so that all may go together.

Mr. BLAGDEN, of Boston. I should be glad to give way to allow the gentleman from Cambridge an opportunity to offer his amendment, if he has a resolution which will be more specific than this will be. But, I have here an amendment, which I have the honor to offer to the amendment of the gentleman from Braintree, and which I think is in order and which will cause the resolution to be more acceptable to him, which is, that "no money shall ever be appropriated for the support of any common school of a sectarian or a denominational character." That will be specific and will meet the object which the Committee hoped they had met by the wording of the resolution. I apprehend that this will be specific enough, and I hope the gentleman from Cambridge may make his suggestion if it is necessary, and I will adopt it into the amendment which I have the honor to make, if possible.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair will suggest that the amendment of the gentleman from Boston will be in order after the amendment of the gentleman from Braintree is disposed of.

Mr. STETSON. If the gentleman from Boston wishes to perfect his resolution, I will withdraw my amendment.

Mr. BLAGDEN. I then offer the following amendment to the last part of the resolution. It now reads:—

Shall ever be appropriated for the support of sectarian or denominational schools.

I move that it be amended so that it will read:

Shall ever be appropriated for the support of any common school of a sectarian or denominational character.

Mr. RANTOUL, of Beverly. I do not see any necessity for adopting this amendment in the Constitution. It seems to me that greater evils will result from the adoption of it, than will ever occur from its omission, and, therefore, I think it is inexpedient to adopt it.

With respect to sectarianism and denominationalism, I believe there are no two persons who agree what is meant by it. I never found any two who could tell. It will, as it seems to me, lead to discussion immediately of that particular subject, and it will extend through the Commonwealth and be attended with consequences which we do not foresee. The Catholics, on the one side, may contend that the protestant schools are sectarian schools, and, therefore, that the Commonwealth ought not to give any money for their support. On the other hand, the protestants may contend that the Catholic schools are sectarian, and, therefore, should not receive the aid of the school fund. It appears to me the anticipation of the effect of this provision's being introduced into the Constitution, should deter us from adopting it, because we ought not to hasten the discussion which will come soon enough in this country in all probability between the Catholics and protestants. The Catholics are increasing very fast, and ought not to do anything in any way which will promote or encourage discussion upon that subject.

I have heard no explanation whatever from the gentleman who reported this resolution, or any other one, as to what is meant by sectarianism or denominationalism, and I apprehend there is a difficulty in stating that meaning. We are attempting to do what no two persons can agree about.

Mr. PARKER, of Cambridge. I hold in my hand a sketch of a resolution or amendment which I suppose my friend from Natick referred to. I was purposing to offer it whenever it might be in order to do so. I suppose it is not strictly in order, but with the indulgence of the Convention, I will read what I have prepared to offer at a proper time. I propose to strike out all after the word "Resolved," and insert the following:—

That the money raised by taxation in the towns and cities for the support of public schools, and all moneys which may be appropriated by the State for the support of such schools, shall be applied to no other schools than those which are under the order and superintendence of the town or city authorities according to law, in which the money is to be expended.

The PRESIDENT. The immediate question is upon the amendment moved by the gentleman from Boston.

Mr. BIRD, of Walpole. It is somewhat singular that yesterday this order was up before the Convention, and it required all the skill which I possessed to prevent the Convention from rushing to the final passage of this resolution by the suspension of the rules. The rules were suspended, and nobody said one word against the resolution, and we were upon the point of taking the final vote, when a motion was made to postpone the further consideration of the subject, which was with difficulty carried. Now we find every-body to be opposed to the resolution.

The hour of one o'clock having arrived, the Convention adjourned until three o'clock, P. M.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The Convention reassembled at 3 o'clock.

Report from a Committee.

Mr. HALL, of Haverhill, from the Committee on Secretary, Treasurer, &c., submitted, (in behalf of the Chairman,) the following Report, which was referred to the Committee of the Whole, and ordered to be printed.

COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS.

In Convention, July 5, 1853.

The Committee on Secretary, Treasurer, &c., to whom was referred the Order of June 4th, have considered the same, and report the following Resolves:—

HENRY W. BISHOP, Chairman.

1. Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Constitution, so as to provide that the electors of the several towns, shall elect, in such manner as the legislature may direct, Justices of the Peace, whose term of office shall be three years, and whose jurisdiction shall extend throughout the county in which they may be elected; their number and classification shall be regulated by law; they may be removed after due notice, and an opportunity of being heard in their defence, by such court, as may be prescribed by law, for causes to be assigned in the order of removal.

2. Resolved, That it is expedient so to amend the Constitution, that the Governor may remove any officer in the former resolves of this Committee mentioned, within the term for which he shall have been elected, giving such officer a copy of the charges against him, and an opportunity of being heard in his defence.

3. Resolved, That it is expedient to provide in the Constitution, that, in case of vacancy by resignation or otherwise, of any State, County, or District officer, whose election is provided for in the Constitution, the governor shall issue his warrant to the mayor and aldermen of the several cities, and the selectmen of the several towns, to fill the vacancy at the next annual election after it shall happen; and the governor, with the advice and consent of the council, may appoint suitable persons to fill vacancies until an election by the people.

Upon motion of Mr. LELAND, of Holliston, the Convention proceeded to the consideration of the Orders of the Day, the first subject being the unfinished business of the morning, viz: the resolve on the subject of appropriations for Sectarian Schools.

Mr. CHAPIN, of Worcester. I am entirely unable to see any occasion for a provision of this kind. If I understand the amendment of the gentleman from Boston, it proposes to apply this, in some way, to common schools. I suppose that common schools in the State of Massachusetts are those which are open to all the children of the State, and which are supported at the public expense. It is difficult for me to see how, under our present laws, these schools are to be sectarian and denominational. I cannot see any occasion, therefore, for the adoption of an amendment of this kind; and, if it is in order, I will move that this matter be indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDENT. That motion is not in order at the present time.

Mr. BLAGDEN, of Boston. I had not intended to say anything further upon this resolve; but I desire to answer the objection of the gentleman from Worcester, and while I am up I should like to explain the proposition so as to show why it is deserving of the support of this Convention. It is known, that in reference to the school fund of other States, applications have been made from religious sects, and from one religious sect in particular, that the public money of the State should be divided among the schools of a particular religious denomination. This resolve is intended to preserve to the Commonwealth, in all future time, the great benefit of the public common schools, where the children of all religious sects can meet together, and where the modified influence which arises from a common education can reach all the children of the respective cities and towns in the Commonwealth. It was thought by a majority of the Committee that it was desirable to place such a safeguard in the Constitution, so as to continue the influence of the public schools, and to make that influence certain and good for all future time, and remove all cause of controversy. That was the opinion in my own mind, and that, as I apprehend, was the opinion in the minds of all—I was about to say, of the Committee—but, perhaps, I should except the gentleman from Charlestown, (Mr. Frothingham,) who expressed his views upon this subject previous to the adjournment this morning. It was my impression, until then, that the Committee were unanimous in their opinion. This is strictly, and in the true sense of the term, a Catholic measure. In some sects, I am informed that the tendency has been, and the Roman Catholic sect is one of those to which I allude,—to seek to have the funds of the respective States applied to the continuance and the improvement of schools of their own particular denomination. We wish, in future, to have the aid of the State bestowed without reference to sectarianism in the schools, and that is the point that we wish to meet in this resolve.

Mr. BIRD, of Walpole. I do not see the ground of the distinction which some gentlemen here seem inclined to make between appropriations of the public money for common schools and similar appropriations for colleges. My friend from Natick said this morning, that he would leave this matter open, so that when we had money to spare, we might appropriate it to sectarian colleges. Sir, I would do no such thing. If you would not appropriate it to sectarian common schools, why should you appropriate it to sectarian high schools? And if not to sectarian high schools, which are after all common schools, why should you appropriate it to sectarian normal schools? And if not to sectarian normal schools, why should you appropriate it to sectarian colleges? I should like to have gentlemen tell me where we are to stop, and what reason they can give for drawing a line between two of these classes rather than between any other two. If I were willing to vote for a proposition of this kind, I would vote for one that would cover the whole ground, and forever prevent the appropriation of a single dollar of the public money to any school whatever of a sectarian character—using the word school in its broadest sense, as including seminaries of learning of all descriptions. If I would do anything of the kind, I would do that; and that is just what I would like to do. I should like to have a provision of that kind inserted into the Constitution, which would prevent such unseemly scrambles as we have seen here in the legislature to get appropriations of the public money for colleges.

Gentlemen may perhaps recollect, that in the year 1847, Amherst College applied to the legislature for an appropriation of five thousand dollars a year for five years. Every-body knows that up to that time, Amherst College never could get a penny from the legislature—I will not say what the reason was; but it is well known that previous to 1847, there was an influence from some quarter or other which was sufficiently powerful to prevent Amherst College from getting one dollar of the public money. But in 1847 she got the $25,000. I always supposed, I suppose now, that at that time there was some general understanding between Amherst College and all the other colleges in the Commonwealth, that they would let Amherst come in and get this appropriation in 1847, and then they would all come in 1848 and start fair for a large haul. Williams' had previously received grants, and Harvard; but up to that time Amherst had never got anything. I do not mean that there was an express bargain, but that was the idea. "Let Amherst get her portion this year, and next year we will all come in and make a general attack, and see if we cannot get a handsome sum for us all." Well, Sir, that was just what was done. Gentlemen will recollect that the next year after Amherst got her appropriation, all three colleges came in and made a concerted attack upon the proceeds of the public lands, and they came very near getting several hundred thousand dollars; they got almost a unanimous report from the Committee in favor of it, and the thing was urged here by the powerful and combined interest of the friends of these three institutions, Amherst, Williams' and Harvard, all being ably represented here. I confess, Sir, that it was rather wonderful to me at the time that they did not succeed. If any restriction is inserted in the Constitution, I would have one which shall reach another operation.

SECTARIAN SCHOOLS. — WALKER — SARGENT — UPHAM.

Now, I do not know as it is necessary that we should have any clause of this kind inserted in the Constitution. Some gentlemen seem to be afraid that it will operate unfavorably upon the popular vote for the new Constitution, because it may seem to be aimed at our Catholic citizens; but, I have no fears of any complaint on that score, provided, you make the provision a general one, to apply equally. It should equally exclude all classes of sectarians from any portion of the public money, for any class of schools; for of course, if it seems to be aimed at any particular class, you will arouse the prejudices and invite the opposition of that class. I am not sure that anything needs to be done in relation to this matter of sectarianism in the public schools, for I am inclined to think, that public opinion will take care of the matter in future legislatures, and that, there will not be much danger of appropriations being made to public schools of any description, which are of an improper sectarian character. But I hope that this resolve, if it is adopted at all, will be so worded as to cover the whole class of institutions of learning, so that there shall be no possibility of one dollar ever being appropriated to sectarian schools, sectarian academies, or sectarian colleges of any description whatever. I do not know of any difference between a college and a normal school, except, that one is a seminary of learning of a little higher grade than the other.

I took occasion to say, in 1848, in the course of the debate upon the matter to which I have alluded, and my experience since that time has strengthened my conviction that it is the true doctrine, that what we need to perfect our system of school education, is that we should have a higher grade to correspond with colleges. I hope to live to see the day, and if I live a few years, I expect to see the day, when we shall have public colleges in Massachusetts, either by converting Harvard College, and Williams' College, and Amherst College into public colleges, for I think we have the power to do that, and I trust that we shall exercise it; or, if that is not deemed advisable or expedient, we can at least open public colleges, and in that way compel these institutions to do as we have already, for the last twenty years, compelled academies and private schools to do; that is, to shut their doors unless they open them to the public as free schools of the highest grade. There are men, who, will see the day when the public schools of Massachusetts shall offer to every son and daughter of the Commonwealth, the best education which human teaching can furnish, free of charge, when our school system will be perfected by the addition of a higher grade of common schools, performing a part in our system of public instruction to correspond with our colleges as now managed. Believing this, I would, by a constitutional provision, if that is necessary, prevent the possibility of the appropriation of one dollar for a private school, whether sectarian or not; but would reserve all our aid for public schools,—common schools, high schools, normal schools or colleges.

Mr. WALKER, of North Brookfield. I am very desirous of having some provision of this sort incorporated into the Constitution of Massachusetts, for I think that it is high time that we should settle the question, that the public funds are never to be given, hereafter, to any private institution. The original plan of the common school system, as it was commenced in 1642, was, that the system of public schools, which we have now, should be carried out, and that all institutions of learning, which accepted any portion of the public patronage, must be open to all persons—that there should be no sectarian, no exclusion of any sort whatever. I sincerely hope that, the time is not far distant when colleges may be open in this way, and that we shall have free colleges and normal colleges on our original plan. I see no reason why colleges should not be as free to all, as any other institution of learning; and hence, I fully agree with the principles which are laid down in the resolves that have been reported by the Committee. I would have it extended to all institutions of learning, of whatever description; and I think the time has come, when that principle should be distinctly recognized as a part of the Constitution of Massachusetts.

Mr. SARGENT, of Cambridge. I think that in everything we attempt to do, we should first decide that there is a sufficient cause for acting. We have lived under the present Constitution for more than seventy years, and I submit, whether there has been any difficulty arising on this subject during that whole time. If there has been none, then it seems to me, that there is no evil which is necessary to be removed. If there is any difficulty in expectation, if I read this resolution aright, we shall, by passing it, place ourselves precisely in the position which we are seeking to avoid. "No money shall ever be appropriated for the support of a sectarian or denominational school." Now, what is the meaning of these two words, "sectarian" and "denominational?" How are we to determine what is a sectarian school, and what is a denominational school? I suppose that it will be admitted, that the community is divided into two great sectional divisions, or denominations—Protestant and Catholic. Each of these denominations has a Bible of its own, differing from that of the other. Under this clause, I would ask, if these Bibles do not become sectarian and denominational books; and if the one or the other of them be used in a school, and its doctrines are taught there,—not the sectional, but the plain doctrines of it,—I ask, whether you do not, by this resolve, raise the question which must be settled, whether that is not a denominational school? It seems to me, that we are running into the very difficulty which we are seeking to avoid. I think the resolution which was brought before the Convention by my colleague, (Mr. Parker,) covers the whole difficulty that is sought to be avoided, or at least escapes this difficulty, in the resolution before us. I hope, therefore, that the amendment of the gentleman from Boston will not be adopted, and that this resolution will be rejected; and then I hope that the resolution of my colleague will be presented, and that it will meet the approbation and concurrence of this body.

Mr. UPHAM, of Salem. Remarks have been thrown out by the gentleman from Walpole, and also, by my friend the delegate from North Brookfield, that have introduced some confusion with reference to the matter now under consideration. I understood those gentlemen to advocate the establishment, at some future and early day, of public colleges in the Commonwealth; and I am at a loss to know how such institutions can possibly be made to avoid the imputation of being more or less sectarian, or how they can be contemplated as sustained in any other manner than by the public resources. I will ask, whether it is wise to inscribe in our Constitution a principle, which will prevent applications of the resources of the Commonwealth at any future day, for the establishment of such institutions if it should be thought desirable. But, as I listened to the language of the amendment of the gentleman from Boston, it seemed to me that such a topic as my friends have introduced is entirely inapplicable to the resolution. It refers to common schools alone; and now I beg the attention of gentlemen of the Convention for a moment, in reference to this matter. It is proposed to establish in our Constitution the principle that no public money, whether accruing from funds arising from taxation, or from the public lands, or any other source, shall ever be appropriated for the support of common schools of a sectarian or denominational character. Now, I would inquire whether there ever have been such schools in the Commonwealth, whether by any possibility there can be such schools? I understand that common schools are, as stated by one of the delegates from Worcester, (Mr. Chapin,) schools supported by the public resources, and equally open to all. I maintain that there are no such institutions in this Commonwealth of a sectarian character, and that there cannot be any, unless gentlemen take the ground that the usage which has come down to us from our pious ancestors of observing a devotional exercise at the commencement of a school session, and of having a chapter from the Bible read, imparts a sectarian or denominational character to the institution. If the observance of that practice can be regarded as imparting a sectarian or a denominational character to the institution, then it seems to me, that the adoption of such a resolve as this would be in fact an expression by this Convention of the opinion that such a practice should be abandoned. For that practice, Mr. President, does open that question to which some gentlemen have alluded, and which, in a few years, if it has not even now become so, will become a serious practical question.

A large portion of our constituents maintain, that the practice of reading the Protestant Bible in our schools, and of offering up prayers by the teachers who are Protestants, and which prayers are liable to partake more or less of the character of argumentation and inculcation—I may say, perhaps of preaching—gives a sectarian character to these institutions. Now, I do not wish to express a personal opinion here, and I would not advise this Convention to express an opinion upon that point.

The amendment offered by the learned gentleman from Cambridge, (Mr. Parker,) contemplates the only method by which we can avoid this great issue in this Commonwealth, and that is, to allow these matters of detail in the management of our public schools to be determined in all instances by the local authorities. I object to the raising of this question at all, here, in this Convention; and I suggest that it would be expedient for us, in all respects, to adopt the suggestion made by one of the delegates from Worcester, to allow this subject to go to the table. I am confident, from what little observation I have made in these matters,—and perhaps I may say it has not been very little,—and from the circumstances with which I have been made acquainted, from various parts of the Commonwealth, that there are questions and difficulties involved in connection with this matter, which we are not prepared to solve, and which it would be inexpedient to settle by a constitutional provision, but which the good sense and considerate judgment, and the patriotic feelings of the citizens of this Commonwealth, in the various towns and districts, will settle, through the proper agents, the school committees, and the local authorities, in a manner satisfactory to all. If thus left to settle themselves, these questions will gradually become settled in a manner that will avoid a great practical inconvenience.

I had not intended to offer a word of remark upon this subject, but as it seemed to me to be involved in serious difficulties, not obvious, perhaps, at first view, to all, and not easy to be surmounted by any possible phraseology which could be used by this Convention, I have thought proper to suggest that it would be highly inexpedient to attempt to inscribe upon the Constitution anything in reference to this matter, and, also, to explain the vote which I shall give, in all stages, and all forms, against the adoption of this resolve.

Mr. STETSON, of Braintree. As I can see no possible good to arise by the passing of this resolve, I move to lay it upon the table.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

So the resolve was laid upon the table.

Resolves on Oaths, Subscriptions, &c.

The Convention next proceeded to the consideration of the resolves on Oaths, Subscriptions, &c., as the next business upon the Orders of the Day.

The PRESIDENT stated the question to be upon their final passage.

Mr. BRINLEY, of Boston. I move to strike out the third resolve, which is in these words:

Resolved, That the eighth article of the sixth chapter be amended by striking out the words "Senate and House of Representatives in," and the words "assembled" "and by the authority of the same," and by adding the words: "of Massachusetts," so that the article as amended shall read:—

ARTICLE VIII. The enacting style in making and passing of all acts, statutes, and laws, shall be: Be it enacted by the General Court of Massachusetts.

Mr. President, I had the honor to submit the same motion in the Committee of the Whole, which motion I subsequently withdrew, and, I now, in Convention renew it. If it is proper to advert to what took place in the Committee of the Whole, I may say, that the great reason assigned for the proposed alterations contained in this resolve was, that in the first place, the proposed term "the General Court of Massachusetts" was rather shorter than the phraseology now in the Constitution. The reason which induced me to withdraw the amendment was, that the chairman who reported the resolves to the Convention, was not then present to assign the reasons which induced the Committee to recommend the alterations. That course was recommended from a source which I considered entitled to respect, and under those circumstances, it was thought best that the amendment should not then be adopted, but that the Committee of the Whole should recommend the report to the Convention in the form in which it was submitted by the sub-Committee.

I understand that, one reason for the phraseology proposed to be adopted is, that it harmonizes with that portion of the Constitution which prescribes, that the legislative department shall be styled "The General Court of Massachusetts," and it is proposed, in relation to that body, to retain the same epithet in the Constitution.

The Constitution, Mr. President, as it now stands, provides that the legislative department of the government shall be composed of two branches—a Senate and House of Representatives—each of which shall have a negative upon the other, and the legislative body so constituted is called "The General Court of Massachusetts." Well, now I submit that the framers of the Constitution understood the meaning of the language they employed in drawing that instrument, and that they made use of an appropriate and proper phrase when they made use of the words contained in the enacting clause, that, as it now stands, and with which we are all familiar, is as follows:—

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives in general court assembled, and by the authority of the same."

Now, Mr. President, I maintain that that phraseology is fit, proper and appropriate to convey precisely what the framers of the Constitution intended to convey by it. It included within it, as it were, that other part of the Constitution to which I have adverted, viz: that the department of the legislature shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives, and it shall be called the "General Court." Therefore, it seemed to follow very naturally and very logically that the enacting style should be: "Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives in General Court assembled." I maintain, therefore, that there is a peculiar propriety and fitness in that clause of the Constitution, providing for the enacting style.

It is now proposed by the Committee, to vary that, with which, we have been so long familiar, and to adopt the shorter phrase "the General Court of Massachusetts." I see nothing gained by the proposed change, but a very small degree of brevity, to offset which I place the usage of four score years and ten, and that familiarity with the language and phraseology which brings it naturally to the lips and pen of every man who has occasion to employ it.

I concur in the opinion expressed by the gentleman from Cambridge, just now, that an amendment to the Constitution should not be made without some substantial reason for it, and I must confess, that I do not see any reason existing in this case, sufficient to warrant the change proposed. I will not take up the time of the Convention by discussing this matter at any length, but will present my views in the briefest possible form. I believe there were gentlemen in the Committee of the Whole who regretted that I withdrew the amendment, though I am satisfied that I did it upon a right apprehension of the state of things in the Committee, and, therefore, I renew it now.

Mr. HOOPER, of Fall River. I move to amend the motion of the gentleman from Boston, by striking out all after the word "the," in the enacting clause, and inserting the words "people represented in General Court," so that it shall read, "Be it enacted by the people in General Court assembled."

The object of that amendment is, in the first place, to shorten the enacting style, and, in the second place, to express precisely the fact which it is intended to express. It is a fact, I suppose, which no gentleman will deny, that all authority emanates from the people; that the acts of the legislature are simply the acts of the people, through their legislature. Now, the term I propose to use, expresses precisely the whole facts of the case. It expresses the idea that the people are the source of power, and that they enact laws by their representatives assembled in General Court. That, it seems to me, is precisely what we want of an enacting clause.

It will conform, likewise, to the practice adopted in several other States of the Union. In almost all the Constitutions which have been recently framed, a similar phraseology is to be found. In New York, the phrase is, "the people represented in senate and assembly." In almost all instances the term "people"—is inserted in some form or another.

Mr. BRINLEY. I think the other phraseology would carry the idea, that what was done by the legislature was done by the people, quite forcibly enough. And, as the gentleman thinks that it has brevity to recommend it, I would state, as I am informed by a gentleman upon my left, that it is shorter than the phrase recommended by the Committee, only by four letters. And further, it seems to me, that in this good old State of Massachusetts it is not very necessary for us continually to revert to the practice of other States—New York among the rest—to ascertain what we shall do when we propose to vary our Constitution, and, I do not admit the applicability of any such allusions.

Mr. EARLE, of Worcester. The more I have looked at this question, the more I have become satisfied that there is no necessity for any alteration whatever. It appears to me that the present phraseology is very good. It answers the purpose for which it was intended; and, it seems to me, that after the existence of this government for nearly eighty years, we need not put anything into the enacting clause of our laws to remind the people of the source from whence the power springs that enacts them. There might have been some reason for it in other States, when their governments were newly formed, and there possibly might be some reason for it here when our government was new, though I do not admit even that. We gain nothing by the change, and unless we do, my opinion clearly is, that we lose rather than gain anything by making alterations where there is not a clear case in favor of it. If there is no other reason than this against it, it is that we may run foul of the prejudices and preconceived notions of some people, who otherwise may be favorable towards the amendments which we shall have made. I, for one, came here with the hope that we should be enabled so to make such a Constitution as would be acceptable to the great mass of the people, and that what we do here will be ratified by them almost unanimously. Therefore, I would avoid making any amendment that is not clearly needed; most of all I would avoid that which is merely a change of form, and which, as I said before, may run foul of the prejudices of some, and therefore induce them to oppose what otherwise they would not object to.

OATHS AND SUBSCRIPTIONS.—BIRD—EARLE—GOOCH—HALLETT—WILSON—MORTON.

Mr. KINGMAN, of West Bridgewater. A considerable portion of the day has been taken up with the discussion of this subject, and I believe that considerable time has been previously spent upon it, and I am afraid that the rest of this afternoon will be consumed in the same manner, and therefore, I move the previous question.

Mr. BIRD, of Walpole. I would suggest, before the question is taken upon the call for the previous question, that there is a verbal alteration which should be made in another section of the resolve, and that is, that the words "Receiver General" should be stricken out where it occurs, in order to make the resolves conform to what we have already determined upon, in reference to that title.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair would remind the gentleman that the matter cannot be discussed after a call for the previous question.

Mr. EARLE. I do not know how it may be with others, but I have no objection to the previous question being put, provided all other portions of the resolves, besides the one which we have discussed, are satisfactory all around. If the previous question could be called upon the third section alone, which is the one which has been under consideration, I should be satisfied. I would ask if the question can be divided.

The PRESIDENT. It can be; but if the Convention shall order the previous question, it will apply to the whole.

Mr. KINGMAN. I intended to move the previous question upon the particular part which has been under discussion, but as it has been ruled to apply to the whole resolve, I withdraw it.

Mr. BIRD. I now move that the words "Receiver General" be stricken out wherever they occur in the resolves.

Mr. GOOCH, of Melrose. As a member of the Committee which reported this resolve, I have a single suggestion to make. The reason which induced the Committee to make this Report upon the subject now before us was this: in a preceding portion of the Constitution it is provided that the legislature shall be styled "the general court of Massachusetts," and your Committee thought it very proper to make the enacting style correspond with that given to the legislature itself; that, if that body were to be styled "the general court of Massachusetts," it would be very proper that the enacting style should be, "Be it enacted by the general court of Massachusetts."

It is known that the enacting style must be written, printed and read, a great many times in the course of every session of the legislature, and it will be seen that by adopting the recommendation of your Committee it will be made only about one quarter the length of that now in use. It will, therefore, save a great deal of writing, reading and printing, in the course of a single session.

But it has been said, that the men who drafted the Constitution perfectly understood the use of every word they inserted in it. Now will any gentleman tell me what possible force or strength is conferred upon the enacting style by the last clause of that now in use—"and by the authority of the same?" The enacting style now is: "Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives in general court assembled and by the authority of the same." Now, I repeat, what possible strength or force is there conferred upon this enacting style by this last clause?

It seemed to your Committee, that if they could make the enacting style as concise as possible, and make it also conform to the style of your legislature, to wit: "The general court," by so doing, they would render the Constitution to that extent better and more acceptable. These were their reasons for reporting this resolution, and I hope it will be adopted without amendment.

The question was taken upon the motion to strike out the words "general court of Massachusetts" and to insert "the people represented in the general court," and it was not agreed to.

The question then recurred upon the motion to strike out the third resolve and upon a division there were ayes 58, noes 125.

So the motion to strike out did not prevail.

Mr. HALLETT, for Wilbraham. I move that the words "or before a Judge of the Supreme Court," be stricken out where they occur in the first resolve, so that the article would then read:—

And the said oaths, or affirmations, shall be taken and subscribed by the governor, lieutenant-governor, and councillors, before the President of the Senate, in presence of the two houses of assembly, and by the senators and representatives before the governor and council for the time being, and by the residue of the officers aforesaid before such persons, and in such manner, as shall from time to time be prescribed by the legislature.

I understand, that by this resolve as reported by the Committee, the governor, lieutenant-governor, and the councillors may be sworn before any Judge of the Supreme Court. Now, I cannot see any good reason for changing the present usage in this respect. The idea of the governor of the Commonwealth going down into the court room, or of going into some private room, or in any place where he can find a single judge, to be sworn, and then of coming up here to notify the Senate and House of Representatives of it, is to me not a pleasant one. It would seem to me to take away much of the dignity of the office. I trust these words will be stricken out.

Mr. WILSON, of Natick. I hope this amendment will prevail, and then I hope we shall make another amendment, which is this: I hope that we shall strike out the word councillors where they occur in this provision, and that we shall provide some other way for them to be sworn into office. It seems to me, that it is nothing but a farce for the Senate and House of Representatives to go into convention for the purpose of swearing in these straggling councillors as they come along. I think there has hardly been a session of the legislature for the last eight or ten years, when the Senate and House of Representatives have not had to go into convention at least three or four different times to swear in councillors.

I think it is very proper that the governor and lieutenant-governor should take their oaths of office in the presence of the two branches of the legislature in convention assembled. But I do not think it at all necessary or desirable, that these two branches should go into convention for the purpose of administering the oaths of office to the councillors, one by one, as they come along. I think we had better provide, that the oath of office may be administered to them by the President of the Senate, in the presence of the Senate, or by the Speaker of the House of Representatives, in the presence of the House of Representatives, and that both Houses shall not be called on to meet in convention for that purpose. The idea of the Sergeant-at-Arms coming in here and announcing the Senate, the members rising to receive them, and all the formality which must be gone through with, simply to swear a straggling councillor into office! I hope we shall provide some other way for these oaths to be administered in future.

Mr. HALLETT. If the gentleman will offer an amendment which will accomplish his purpose without making two jurisdictions to administer oaths, I will accept it. It seems to me very desirable that we should not have more than one jurisdiction for the administering of oaths. With regard to councillors, if the gentleman will move an amendment providing that the oath may be administered by the President of the Senate in presence of the Senate, I have no objection to it, that will not create another jurisdiction. It would remedy the inconvenience and would furnish all the formality which would be necessary for administering of the oath of office to councillors. I consider it indispensable that there should be but one jurisdiction for that purpose; and if the amendment could be reduced to a form which would provide that the governor and lieutenant-governor should be sworn in presence of both Houses of the legislature, and that the councillors should be sworn in presence of the Senate by the President of that body, it would remedy the inconvenience which exists and would be sufficient for all purposes of formality.

Mr. MORTON, of Taunton. I am opposed to the amendment, and I beg leave to suggest one or two reasons for my opposition. In the first place, I apprehend that no great inconvenience will result from having two jurisdictions to administer the oath of office. But in addition to that, there are other reasons why another jurisdiction than the two houses of the legislature in convention assembled, or than either of those houses, should be provided. It may so happen that in consequence of sickness or for some other reason, councillors elected by the people may be unable to come to the city until after the adjournment of the legislature, and unless you provide some other jurisdiction, under such circumstances, they would never be able to take their seats in that body to which they were chosen by the people of the Commonwealth, or by the people of the district for which they are elected.

Again, it may so happen that the governor elect of the Commonwealth may be prevented from attendance by sickness or necessary absence. It seems to me very necessary that you should have some other persons authorized to administer the oath to him. Now, this may be supposed to be a very remote contingency, and probably it would never have occurred to my mind but for the fact that the governor of the Commonwealth was once thrown into very great embarrassment because the person elected governor was sick, lying at the point of death, and great doubt was entertained whether the lieutenant-governor could act in case of his death without being properly qualified to perform the duties of the office. It was doubted whether he would have the authority to act as governor in case of the death of the governor, without being sworn into office.

I, therefore, hope, that some provision may be made, by which two jurisdictions for the administering of oaths may be provided, because cases may occur in the future as they have in the past, when such a provision would be necessary to prevent the governor from being subjected to very great inconvenience and embarrassment. I hope the provision reported by the Committee will be adopted, and that the amendment will not prevail. The person to whom I alluded was the late Governor Sumner. He was elected by the people, but was soon after taken sick, and although he lived for some time after the legislature met, he was unable at any time to go before them to be qualified, and the fact gave rise to great difficulty and embarrassment in the organization of the government.

Mr. WHITNEY, of Boylston. I think it would save a great deal of time, perplexity and inconvenience, and that the duties of those officers would be performed just as well if we dispense with the oath of office entirely. [Laughter.]

Mr. HALLETT, for Wilbraham. The provision as it now stands is very simple. It reads as follows:—

And the said oaths or affirmations shall be taken, and subscribed by the governor, lieutenant-governor and councillors, before the president of the Senate, in the presence of the two houses of the assembly; and by the senators and representatives [first elected under this Constitution, before the president and five of the council of the former Constitution; and forever afterwards] before the governor and council for the time being; and by the residue of the officers aforesaid, before such persons and in such manner, as from time to time shall be prescribed by the legislature.

We have had that provision a very long time—since 1780. The instance of a governor being unwell has been referred to by the gentleman, an event which has not yet occurred, but which of course may occur. If he should be so unwell as to be unable to come here and take the oath, it is very easy to induce the two Houses to postpone it. I think it will detract from the dignity of administering the oaths by sending either of these dignitaries down to a judge of the supreme court, and that it is wholly unnecessary to change the mode of proceeding which has prevailed so long, for the reason which has been so properly given by the gentleman for Abington, (Mr. Keyes). We ought not to change merely for the sake of change. There should be some substantial reason why we should depart from the present phraseology of the Constitution in regard to this matter.

Mr. WILSON, of Natick. My friend for Abington, (Mr. Keyes,) as we all know, is quite a stickler for forms and ceremonies, and I sometimes think that he is a great stickler for nearly all the rust there is upon the Constitution. That gentleman knows very well—for it has been his fortune to march up and down between the Senate and House to administer the oath of office to councillors—that the whole thing is a matter of ridicule. Why, it is hardly ever done here, without exciting smiles in both branches of the legislature. It generally happens that a majority of the councillors are here in due season, but there is always some one lagging behind hand, three or four days, and then senators are required to march down from the Senate to the House and administer the oath of office to this straggling member of the council who comes along after the session has opened. My friend for Abington says that the two Houses have nothing else to do. I believe one of the reasons put forth for having this Convention was the necessity that existed for simplifying the organization of the government. It was said that our mode of organization was formal and cumbersome, and that it ought to be changed and simplified, so that the two branches of the legislature could meet like other legislative bodies and enter upon their work at once. I undertake to say, for the last twelve years—and I can state it with some little degree of confidence, for the eight years in which I have been a member of the legislature—that the organization of this government has averaged at least eight days each year, which ought to be done in two days at the farthest. The legislature of the State of New Hampshire met on the first Wednesday in June and adjourned before the fourth of July. They met, organized, had two sessions a day, and by the second or third day they were ready to go on and do their business. Our legislature may and can organize in two days. All I wish to do is simply this: that the governor and lieutenant-governor shall be sworn into office in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, that the councillors shall be sworn into office by the president of the Senate, in the presence of the Senate, or by the speaker of the House of Representatives, in the presence of the House, so that if the councillors are not all here on the day of the meeting of the legislature, when one of them comes straggling along afterwards, that he may come before the president of the Senate, in the presence of the Senate, or before the speaker of the House, in the presence of the House, to be sworn into office, and that the other branch shall not be called upon to come in and witness that ceremony. It is a piece of formality which ought to be done away with. When the proposition which has been made by my friend for Wilbraham, (Mr. Hallett,) is acted upon, I wish to incorporate the following words, by way of amendment: “by councillors before the president of the Senate, in the presence of the Senate.”

Mr. GOOCH, of Melrose. The reasons which influenced the Committee in reporting the amendment, have been stated so fully by the gentleman from Taunton, (Mr. Morton,) that it is hardly necessary for me to go over the same ground. It occurred to the Committee that there might be a case where the organization of the legislature might be embarrassed by the sickness or necessary absence of the governor. It was then supposed, as it would not be desirable that the legislature should separate, that some person might be empowered by the Constitution to administer the oath to the governor, if he were not able to be present. The same oath could be administered to the lieutenant-governor, and then the lieutenant-governor would be the acting governor for the time being, and your government might be organized. That was one of the reasons which influenced the Committee to propose this amendment. It did not occur to the Committee, even if the oath should be administered by a judge of the supreme court, that it would be necessary for the governor to go from the council chamber to one of the lobbies of the court house, because they supposed that the thing might be done in another way, that the judge might wait upon the governor at his house, if he should be so sick as not to be able to leave it, or at some other place, or at the council chamber, if it should be deemed advisable to administer the oath there. It was not supposed, that this mode of proceeding would be resorted to as the usual form of administering the oath, except in cases where necessity required it.

The question was then taken upon Mr. Hallett's amendment, and it was agreed to.

Mr. HALLETT, for Wilbraham. At the suggestion of the gentleman from Natick, (Mr. Wilson,) I would move to amend by inserting the word “and” after the word “governor,” striking out in the third line the word “councillors,” and inserting in the fourth line the following words: “by councillors, before the president of the Senate, and in the presence of the Senate,” so that the clause would read: “And the said oaths and affirmations shall be taken and subscribed by the governor and lieutenant-governor, before the president of the Senate, and in the presence of the two Houses of Assembly, and by the councillors before the president of the Senate, in presence of the Senate,” &c.

The question was then taken on the amendment, and it was agreed to.

Mr. BRINLEY, of Boston. It has not been my inclination to oppose amendments to the Constitution, particularly of a mere verbal character. I understand the gentleman from Melrose, (Mr. Gooch,) who was a member of the Committee, to state, that he was inclined to retain the words “General Court of Massachusetts,” in the enacting clause, because the legislature were called the General Court of Massachusetts. In that particular he was inclined to abide by the phraseology of that portion of the Constitution. The resolve presented to us by the Committee, and which has just been amended, provides that oaths and affirmations shall be taken in the presence of the two Houses of Assembly, and I suppose the Committee of which the gentleman from Melrose is a member, adopted that phraseology, because it already exists in the present Constitution. For that reason, I, for one, would not alter it, nor do I propose to make any amendment of that character. I had occasion to remark the other day, that it was a little singular the phrase “Houses of Assembly,” should occur two or three times in the Constitution. It occurs in that portion of it which prescribes the compensation to be paid to members for their travelling expenses in coming here and returning home at every session. The clause reads as follows:—

“The expenses of travelling to the General Assembly and returning home, once in every session, and no more, shall be paid by the government, out of the public treasury,” &c.

It is also used in the clause regarding oaths and affirmations, as follows:—

“And the said oaths or affirmations shall be taken and subscribed by the governor, lieutenant-governor, and councillors, before the president of the Senate, in the presence of the two Houses of Assembly,” &c.

It is sufficient reason for me to be content with the resolve as reported by the Committee, that the phrase does exist in the Constitution. It strikes me if there is great necessity for adhering to this phrase, “General Court of Massachusetts,” that it would be proper enough to substitute some such phrase as that here, “that oaths and affirmations should be taken in the presence of the General Court,” and not before the two Houses of Assembly. If I were disposed to be a little critical, I do not recollect a single instance where the Senate is anywhere spoken of as being one House, although in one or two instances it is characterized as being the upper branch. I suggest to the advocates of great consistency in this matter, whether they ought not to provide, where oaths and affirmations are to be taken, that some other phrase beside that of General Assembly should be used. I make no motion, but leave the suggestion entirely to the consideration of those who are inclined to be critical in this matter.

Mr. EDWARDS, of Southampton. I perceive there is an amendment necessary to the second resolve, in order to conform to what has already taken place in Convention. I move to strike out the words "Receiver-General."

Mr. EARLE, of Worcester. I would inquire if the word has not already been stricken out on a former reading.

The PRESIDENT. The word has been erased in other places, but not here.

Mr. WILSON. In that portion of the Constitution relating to the treasurer, the word "Receiver-General" were stricken out. It will but take a moment to adopt the amendment of my friend over the way, (Mr. Edwards,) and it will conform our action to what has already taken place.

The question was then taken on Mr. Edwards' amendment, and it was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT. The question recurs upon ordering the resolves to their final passage.

Mr. BATES, of Plymouth. I move to strike out the words, "of assembly," in the first resolution and the second paragraph, and insert the words, "in Convention."

The motion was agreed to.

The question then recurred on ordering the resolves to their final passage, and being taken, by a division, there were—ayes, 150; noes, 6.

So the resolves were passed.

Basin of Representation.

Mr. BOUTWELL, for Berlin. I now move that the resolves in relation to representation, be taken from the table, and that their consideration be assigned to half past nine o'clock to-morrow morning.

The motion was agreed to.

Special Assignment.

Mr. WILSON. I rise for the purpose of making a motion, in relation to fixing the time for taking the vote upon the propositions relating to the House of Representatives. The Convention has already assigned the time for their consideration at half past nine o'clock to-morrow. I think it is important to settle this matter this week. I suppose that a large number of the members are absent, who, if a notification were given to them, would endeavor to be here to vote upon this great question. I move, that the hour of eleven o'clock on Friday, be assigned for taking the vote upon that question.

Mr. LORD, of Salem. On that question, I ask the yeas and nays.

The question being taken on ordering the yeas and nays, there were, upon a division—ayes, 21; noes, 162.

So the motion was rejected.

The PRESIDENT. The question recurs upon the motion to assign a time for taking the vote.

Mr. LORD, of Salem. I called for the yeas and nays, because I desired to have them recorded. I thought, that, after gentlemen who were in favor of this basis of representation, had discussed it as long as they should think proper, that then it would be only fair to give those gentlemen, who might wish to reply to any statements or arguments, and it may be misrepresentations that may have been made, an opportunity to do it. But I do not make any complaint. I do not, however, think it worth while to fix the day. I believe that something like one hundred gentlemen have expressed their views. Probably they do not wish to express their views again, and possibly they do not want to hear anybody else. I do not know how that may be; but I should think—although we had a specimen of gentlemen's speaking on other subjects this morning, and not wanting others to be heard—that upon a matter so important as this, a matter which, in my judgment, is not by any manner of means exhausted, except as the patience of the Convention may be exhausted, and which I do not think is properly so; we might be willing to give every gentleman an opportunity to express his views. Because, when we consented to come here, we consented to come and endure the martyrdom of hearing other people's opinions, even if they do not agree with ours. And, Sir, when the town which I represent, sent delegates here, they supposed that they would be entitled to be heard if their representatives wanted to be heard; and they did not suppose that the Convention would say that a subject should be taken up at such an hour, and in the very next breath, say that it should be finished at such a moment; that debate should be just so long and no longer. They did not believe that, Sir, or rather they hoped they would not have to believe that. But if this Convention chooses to take that course, I certainly shall not make any objection to it. I suppose, during the brief period that shall remain for discussion, the President will, of course, give the floor to those who are the most active, and the first who catches his eye. But here is a matter very important, and one which I believe everybody is agreed, must be amended in its details, before it shall be finally acted upon; because the Convention have passed votes utterly inconsistent, and there they stand upon the record, utterly and diametrically opposed to each other, and it must be altered.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair must suggest that the gentleman is debating the merits of the question.

Mr. LORD. I ask pardon of the President; I am not intending to discuss the merits at all. I am stating a fact, that the Convention has adopted two propositions diametrically opposed to each other; one of them limiting the number of representatives, which was adopted upon the motion of the gentleman for Berlin; and subsequently another amendment was adopted, upon the motion of the gentleman who represents Wilbraham, reducing the number which shall be the mean increasing ratio, and which would be utterly senseless, while the limit remains, except it be introduced fallaciously, for the purpose of shearing the large towns one cut deeper.

The PRESIDENT. The gentleman is debating the merits of the resolutions, and not the question of assignment.

Mr. LORD. I am stating what the Convention have done; I am not saying whether I approve or disapprove, or whether I would have it otherwise. I am stating that they have adopted these inconsistent propositions, and that having adopted them, one of them, at a proper time, to perfect the resolution, and, therefore, must be taken out.

The PRESIDENT. The line of argument which the gentleman is pursuing opens the whole question.

Mr. LORD. I do not know how that appears to other people; but, if it is out of order for me to state the proposition which I have stated, then I am very sorry that I have transgressed the rules of order. But, I understand the rule of Parliamentary law precisely as the President has ruled it over and over again during this session, that in discussing the assignment of time, it is proper to state what the propositions are before the House, and the details of them, but not to go into the resolves themselves.

The PRESIDENT. The gentleman may allude to them; but, if he characterizes them in such a manner as that it will be necessary for other gentlemen to reply; it is improper. The gentleman characterizes them as being inconsistent, and every gentleman will see immediately, that that opens the whole merits of the question.

Mr. LORD. I had supposed that if I have a right to allude to them, and one resolution should say, that the assembly shall be composed of white men, and the other resolution should say, that it shall be composed of black men, I should have a right to say, that they are inconsistent. And I should not care how many reply to that.

The PRESIDENT. But the gentleman in alluding to the resolutions cannot discuss their merits.

Mr. LORD. I do not propose to discuss their merits, and I cannot be driven into it. I only propose to say, whether it is proper to take up the question only twenty-six hours before the time when the final vote is to be taken. In doing that I am doing only what the President says, I am in order in doing. A proposition is before the House, and I am stating what that proposition is. I have gone no further than that, and I do not propose to go any further than that now, and I cannot be coerced or driven to go further than that.

Well, Sir, if the Convention chooses to say, that no more time shall be taken, under any circumstances whatever, it seems to me to be the most offensive form in which the previous question can be applied to a subject upon which, of all others, discussion should be permitted. I do not think that such a course for fixing the time is proper. If, however, the detail of the debate is to follow as the member from Natick shall indicate, and if he is to determine just how long it shall be before the discussion ought to close, I have nothing to say at all. But, Sir, I say this is a proposition upon which the Convention cannot act understandingly now. Nobody knows what other amendments may be offered. Suppose that to-morrow morning,—I am only putting this as an illustration,—the gentleman from Natick and one of his friends get up, one of them moving an amendment, and the other an amendment to the amendment, and both of them perfectly immaterial; and then the question is discussed up to the hour for taking the vote. Nobody else can move an amendment, simply because the Convention have fixed the hour when the discussion shall cease.

Now, Sir, it is not probable that any gentleman

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES. — WILSON — LORD.

[July 6th.

would do such a thing as that; but, when gentlemen will resort to such measures as I have seen resorted to for the purpose of stopping discussion, that is the next step, and I should not be much more surprised to see the next step taken if they do not want amendments proposed, than I should have been to have heard before the deliberations of this assembly commenced, that such measures would have been resorted to as I have seen resorted to. I want to propose an amendment; the gentleman from Natick thinks I had better not; and, thereupon, he gets up and offers an amendment, and gets a friend to offer another amendment to that, and a debate springs up which takes up all the time during the twenty-six hours, and there is no opportunity for mine to come in. I say, we cannot tell beforehand, we cannot act understandingly beforehand, and if we decide now that the question shall be taken at that time, we decide it blindly, we decide it without acting upon the merits of the question, we agree that we will do the thing at that moment, not knowing whether it will be right or wrong to do it at that time, when it comes; and, therefore, I say, that we ought not to fix that time thus in advance. If the Convention had chosen to have this matter determined in such a manner that every individual would have had an opportunity to stand right upon it, I should not have troubled the Convention by any remarks of mine. I am not anxious to be obtruding myself continually upon the attention of the Convention. But when what I consider to be a valuable right is invaded, I do not care how great the majority is that votes me down, I can speak and I shall; and I shall say, that the determination, before we touch a subject, that it shall not be discussed beyond a certain moment, and that within twenty-six hours of the time for taking the question, is an invasion of the rights of the minority.

Mr. WILSON. I wish to say a single word in reply to the gentleman from Salem. I made the motion, Mr. President, for the purpose of giving the friends and the opponents of this question fair notice, that on Friday next the question would be taken. The notice could go out to-night, and as it is well known that many are absent, they would be present when the vote is taken. I made it for no purpose of restricting or cutting off debate. If adopted, it gives nine hours of debate, seven to-morrow, and two the next day; and then, during that time, nothing of the kind can be sprung upon us. I made the motion, Sir, with no intention of crowding off the gentleman from Salem, (Mr. Lord,) for I can assure him, that I never listen to his sweet and melodious voice, nor see his smiling face, [laughter,] without experiencing as much pleasure as any gentleman on his side of the house can feel. Now, Mr. Chairman, in Committee of the Whole, eighty-two speeches were made, occupying thirty-nine hours, wanting three minutes. I kept an exact account of the time of every speaker on that matter. Since the Committee reported, twelve hours have been spent in debate, making fifty-one hours spent in the discussion; and, I believe one hundred and seven speeches have been made on the subject.

Now, Sir, I think this Convention understands this matter very well; and if they do not understand it, I can tell the gentleman from Salem, that he will have seven hours to-morrow to explain it to them—I will agree to that. I will consent to give him just as much time as he wishes. If he wants to lengthen out his hour to two or three hours, he may set me down as one of those who will vote to allow him that privilege; for certainly I do not wish to crowd him or anybody else. The only object which I had in making the motion was, that I supposed it was the general desire of the Convention that the question should be settled this week; I knew we had already had fifty hours of debate upon the subject, and the time between now and the hour I have named for taking the question, will probably be sufficient for all those gentlemen who have any more speeches to make. The gentleman from Salem knows that no man will offer trivial amendments, for the purpose of consuming the time. I do not believe he would do it, and I know that no other gentleman would; but, on the contrary, there will be ample opportunity to discuss the question, and when it has been discussed to the satisfaction of every-body, we can take the vote. So far, in the course of this Convention, every allowance has been made, and the best disposition and feeling have prevailed, to hear all sides of the question fully discussed. We shall have all day to-morrow, and the gentleman from Salem can have all the time which he wishes. I will vote to extend his time, for I shall be delighted to hear him speak, and shall listen to him with the greatest pleasure, for he is a favorite of our side of the Convention.

Mr. LORD, of Salem. We are almost every day reminded, that it is not well for politicians to have long memories. I really wish that the gentleman from Natick could remember as long back as this forenoon, when I told him that I wanted just exactly two minutes—I think there was no sarcasm in it, and no "little pleasantry" with regard to personal appearance or any other natural endowment; and, yet, that gentleman did not feel quite willing then to allow me two minutes. All that I asked for was two minutes, and the gentleman pressed his motion, out of the regular course of parliamentary proceeding—not unjustified by parliamentary law, but out of the regular course of parliamentary proceeding, he pressed his motion this morning to cut off a speech which, I said I wanted to last only two minutes. Hereafter, I hope that gentleman's memory will last from breakfast until tea; I ask no more than that, but that, I think I am entitled to ask. Now I have no particular wish to speak upon this question. I have sat here and listened to the one hundred and seven speeches, if there have been so many; and one of them came from the gentleman from Natick, in which he declared what his principle was, and in less than fifteen minutes afterwards he voted in direct opposition to it. I am not upon the record at all; I have not said that I was in favor of the district system, and then within fifteen minutes voted against it, but that is one of the hundred and odd speeches that have been made, of which the gentleman from Natick has taken pains to keep an accurate account. Now, Sir, if I felt disposed to speak upon this subject, I have no doubt but that I could say a word or two—wise or foolish, as the case might be—that has not yet been said. I do not consider the whole range of debate upon this question to have been exhausted. I do not think that even when this entire Convention goes out—I trust I shall not be considered out of order in saying what a member of the majority said the other day—when this entire Convention goes out, I do not think that all the wisdom will be gone by any means. I think there is another consideration connected with this subject of representation, which has not yet been urged; and Sir, that is a consideration which, in my judgment, will be most effective upon the popular mind in the settlement of this question, and it has never yet been alluded to by any speaker. That is my judgment with regard to the matter; but I do not know that I shall desire to speak, even if this discussion should continue until the whole four hundred members had spoken their twice apiece. And yet, Sir, I confess that I am so constituted—and perhaps in that respect I am not alone in the Convention—that just as soon as the majority says "you shall not speak," the old Adam within rises up and says: "I will speak." Are there not a good many more here who feel just in the same way about this thing? I do not mean to say, that the time which has been suggested by the gentleman from Natick is not long enough; what I mean to say is, that the Convention cannot beforehand determine whether it is long enough or not. We do not know what the state of things may be at the moment when this particular time arrives for taking the vote. If the minority in this House were a factious body—if this discussion had been extended through so many days and all these speeches had been made by the minority, I should not complain, for one, if the majority should feel it their duty to take the matter into their own hands and decide that the discussion should be brought to a close at a certain period, because the responsibility would rest upon them if they permitted a waste of time in useless debate. But the case is not so. According to my judgment, nearly the old speeches have been made on the majority side, and but comparatively few, that I have heard, have been from the minority, according to my present recollection; so that it cannot be said that there has been any disposition upon the part of the minority to engage in useless discussion, or to delay the business before the Convention. I say, therefore, that it is a reflection upon the course of the minority, for the majority to make such a proposition as this; and it is one which I think they do not deserve to have cast upon them. Why, Sir, upon a former occasion, a motion was made, on Tuesday, I believe, that the question should be taken on a certain subject on the next Friday; and what was the result? The Convention refused to adopt that order, and it turned out that the question was taken on Wednesday instead of Friday. There was no disposition then to protract debate, and there is no disposition now to protract debate. I will only tell the gentleman from Natick that if on Friday, at half past eleven o'clock,—supposing that this order should be adopted—if at that time a gentleman has not spoken who desires to speak, on the next day he can move a reconsideration and make a speech upon it. Any gentleman would have a perfect right to resort to this parliamentary mode of obtaining an opportunity to speak if he were cut off from his right to address the Convention. Now, Sir, I do not want to force any gentleman to the necessity of resorting to a measure of that kind; I do not want questions taken in that way; I do not want to have reconsiderations. What I desire, is to have the discussion go on in the regular way; and, when gentlemen have become satisfied with discussing the question, then let us take the vote. I do not think that it is necessary that there should be a drum beat to call the members of the Convention in here, to vote upon this proposition. I do not think that if gentlemen choose to absent themselves, we are, therefore, to advertise when we are going to take the question, so that they may be sure to come in and vote. One of the earliest things said in this Convention by a leading member from Lowell, (Mr. Butler,) was, that if members went home at four o'clock in the afternoon, it was not of much consequence whether they were here or not. Although I did not exactly consider, that there was much good taste manifested in that remark, there was something in the sentiment which I confess, met a partial response, at least, from my own mind. If, upon a matter so important as this question on the basis of representation, every gentleman does not find out for himself when the question is to be taken so as to be present and vote upon it, it is not the fault of the Convention. I did not happen to be present and vote upon one occasion when a vote of some importance was taken; but, I do not blame the Convention for my not voting. I had a right to vote if I had chosen to be present, and so has every other gentleman a right to vote upon every question. If this Convention is a mere assembly to record the edicts of any other body or any caucus, and if they are to assemble their members by beat of drum at a certain hour to vote upon questions, it is all very well—I have nothing to say. But, Sir, I do not believe in that doctrine. I do not believe in advertising the hour when a vote is to be taken. I think it very much more proper that the Convention should go on and attend to its business—take up this question to-morrow morning at half past nine o'clock; when it is taken up, let gentlemen discuss it who wish to do so, and when they have done discussing it, then let us take question without waiting for absent members to come in. If this should be the course to be pursued, I should not be much surprised if the question should be taken to-morrow forenoon—certainly not, if it should be taken to-morrow afternoon. It has often so happened during the sessions of this Convention, that a gentleman whose seat is upon this side of the hall, gets up and makes a suggestion which just exactly happens to strike the mind of some other gentlemen seated upon the other side, (poor innocent soul!) as an excellent proposition; just as if we did not know that this thing was all arranged beforehand. It is all cut out and prepared beforehand—so this thing strikes me. If we see certain gentlemen putting their heads together, we know that something is coming pretty soon. Well, before long, one gentleman makes a motion, and directly another gets up and says that this seems to be just about the thing—it strikes his mind favorably; and he does not more than get into his seat before another one gets up, and says, that he had been a little exercised in his mind also, upon the same subject, and the real panacea is provided. Now, I do not like to ask right out of the gentleman from Natick, whether he did not understand that the gentleman from Berlin was going to make this motion, and whether the gentleman from Berlin did not expect the gentleman from Natick to follow it immediately out with his motion, because, it would not be quite fair to ask such questions as these. I will not put those gentlemen to the trouble of denying this—I do not wish to intrude into the secrets of party discipline or party tactics. But to let that matter pass, as I do not wish to discuss that question, I will say, that I think we should dispatch our business in a more expeditious manner—at least, until, on the part of the minority there is shown a spirit having in something the appearance of factiousness—by letting the ordinary course of things be pursued. I do not think, that the gentlemen need be troubled with the sound of my voice, any more than with my personal appearance. As to that matter, perhaps a hot sun does either of us no good. [Laughter.]

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.—LORD—KEYES.

I am not prepared, Mr. President, to join in any cry about a protracted session. I do not think that this session has been protracted; and, if I have occasion at any time to express any opinions upon the subject, the only view which I shall express is, that instead of the sessions being protracted by long speeches, it would rather seem that the truth was so grievous to be borne, and so hard to be endured, that it was important at the earliest possible moment to stop all the sources from which that most important element could be expected—

The PRESIDENT. Does not the gentleman see that he is imputing improper motives to the Convention by the course of his remarks?

Mr. LORD. Really, Sir, I thought I was imputing to them the very best of motives. I did not mean to charge them with doing this with any improper motives. If I had said as is suggested by my friend here, that they were an "unhealthy political organization," that would have been out of order; and I will thank gentlemen not to prompt me to make any such disorderly remarks. [Laughter.] I did not think it necessary to suggest to the gentleman opposite, that his course of remark was out of order, because we all observed it—it was obvious that it was a somewhat disorderly proceeding. But, Sir, I have been led to go much beyond what I had intended when I arose. I arose merely with the intention of replying to the remark of the gentleman from Natick; and, what I say, I take the responsibility of and adhere to, that any such course of proceeding as this, although there is the power here to do it—numbers can determine it—but any such course as this is in my judgment an imputation upon the conduct of the minority. Whether or not the time will be extended beyond the time suggested by the gentleman from Natick, I do not know. If I had permitted myself to be tired of the wisdom which emanates from gentlemen of this body, I should probably have been tired long ago; but, Sir, I do not permit myself to be tired in a good cause. When I hear hour after hour, gentlemen proclaiming their political principles with such wisdom, with such sagacity, and with such profundity of thought, I admit that I am sometimes in some danger of getting tired, but on such occasions I summon up all my patriotism; I compel myself to keep awake and listen to all these orations. I consider this as a part of the martyrdom to which I subjected myself when I voluntarily took this seat in the Convention. I was about to say that I hope the Convention will not fix a time for taking this question; but upon that matter I do not know that I care about expressing any such desire. I have done what I believed to be my duty in resisting this movement; and, Sir, if hereafter it should ever become my fortune to appeal to that power to which we all of us look up as higher than we are, I think that I shall have no occasion to assert that upon this, or any other subject I opposed the limitation beforehand of the right of discussion, or, that I did what was in my power to enable the friends of reform to say, that every measure presented for the acceptance of the people, was fully and freely discussed and carefully considered, and that the minority at least had opportunity on every occasion to discuss to the fullest extent.

Mr. KEYES, for Abington. I suppose the gentleman from Salem, has accomplished his object by consuming a large portion of the afternoon.

The PRESIDENT. It is not in order for the gentleman to make such remarks in reference to members upon this floor.

Mr. KEYES. He has also illustrated the other side of the question, so that there will be no necessity for speeches from that quarter. He has shown the great facility with which this session may be lengthened out, for purposes which may be conceived or imagined by any person that chooses to. Therefore, I hope the Convention will adopt the course proposed at once. The propositions which have been presented to the Convention upon this subject, have been of such a character, that perhaps few have been enabled to fully accord with any one of them, or to unite upon any definite plan. The effect of the adoption of the proposition now before us, will be to concentrate opinion upon something or other, so that we can the sooner reach a result. The debate which may be had, and which will be had, upon the propositions now before us, is not of a character to lead us to conclusions. Three-fourths of the members of this body, have not, and will not, in all the time they shall be here, speak upon all subjects as much as the gentleman from Salem has spoken this afternoon, upon this one subject. It is not that class of speakers that consume the time of the Convention. If gentlemen desire to express their views upon particular subjects they can do it in ten minutes, and such men we are rejoiced to see rise at all times. But there is another class of speakers who are so loquacious, that our hearts sink within us when we see them upon the floor, because they have that power of volubility which seems never to exhaust itself. It is to avoid that kind of speeches that I would have this motion adopted. I supposed that this remark, abstractly, would hardly be in order, under the ruling of the Chair, but, Sir, when we are in Rome we must do as the Romans do. In all public bodies a similar plan has been adopted to cut off debate. We hear something said about responsibility, and who are to be charged with the great length of the session of this body, and all that sort of thing. I care as little about that as anybody, if we only go straight forward and finish our labors as soon as we can. In Congress and in all other deliberative bodies they see fit on occasions to limit debate, or the length of speeches which latter, is precisely the same in principle, as limiting the time when the vote shall be taken. I hope the motion will be adopted, because I know it will bring us to the issue quicker, and in a manner more satisfactory to the people. If any amendments are offered to the proposition before us, let us bring them directly to a vote, and vote them in or vote them out, just as we shall be guided, by our sense of propriety, and right, as they shall be offered.

These are the reasons, which induced me to think, that the time for taking the question should be settled and fixed upon. Indeed when the motion was made, I was surprised that it was put off so long. I supposed the question would have been taken to day, and I came here this morning with the expectation of seeing a full house assembled for the purpose of taking the vote to-day. I think it is quite long enough to put off the taking of the question until Friday, and I trust we shall fix upon that time, and that this alarm which has been raised, will not frighten anybody. It may amuse, but I think it will neither alarm nor instruct.

The question was then taken on the motion of the gentleman from Natick, (Mr. Wilson,) and it was decided in the affirmative.

So the Convention determined to take the question on Friday next at 1½ o'clock A. M.

Amendments and Enrolments.

Mr. BIRD, of Walpole. I move that the Convention resolve itself into Committee of the Whole upon No. 46 of the calendar.

The motion was agreed to, and the Convention accordingly resolved itself into

COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE,

Mr. Griswold, for Erving, in the chair, and proceeded to the consideration of the subject referred to it, being the Report of the Committee to whom was referred so much of the Constitution as relates to Amendments and Enrolments, and to whom was also referred various orders relating thereto.

The Resolves were read, as follows:—

1. Resolved, That it is expedient to provide in the Constitution that, at the general election to be held in the year one thousand eight hundred and seventy-three, and in each twentieth year thereafter, and also, at such other times, preceding or succeeding the above-named year, as the legislature may by law prescribe, the question—"Shall there be a Convention to revise the Constitution, and amend the same?"—shall be submitted to the qualified voters in State elections; and, in case a majority of the same thus voting, shall decide in favor of a Convention for such purpose, the legislature, at its next session, shall prescribe by law for the election of delegates to such Convention.

2. Resolved, That it is expedient further to provide in the Constitution, that, whenever the legislature shall fail to submit to the people, at the periods designated in the foregoing resolve, the question of calling a Convention for the purposes indicated therein, the qualified voters in State elections, in the several cities and towns, may, at the next general election thereafter, and upon notice of such failure by the secretary of the Commonwealth, whose duty it shall be to issue such notice, proceed to vote upon said question, as though it had been propounded by the legislature; and if, upon a return to the governor and council, of the vote so given, it shall appear that a majority have voted in favor of the proposition, the governor shall forthwith issue his proclamation, calling upon the voters of said cities and towns, at meetings legally warned for that purpose, to elect delegates to such Convention; the time and place for holding its session, being expressed therein.

3. Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Constitution by striking out thereof Article 9th of Amendments, and inserting the following:—

Any amendment or amendments to this Constitution may be proposed by the Senate or House of Representatives; and if the same shall be agreed to by a majority of the whole number of senators and representatives elected, such amendments shall be entered upon their respective journal, with the yeas and nays taken thereon, and shall then be referred to the next general court. And if the proposed amendment or amendments shall be agreed to by a majority of the members of the Senate and House of Representatives voting thereon, the same shall thereupon be submitted to the voters qualified to vote in State elections; and if a majority of the same, thus voting, shall ratify said amendment or amendments, the same shall be deemed a part of the Constitution.

Mr. NAYSON, of Amesbury. I do not deem it at all necessary or incumbent upon me, as a member of the Committee which reported these resolves, to take up the time of the Committee of the Whole, with any explanation of the subject matter embraced in these resolves. The report which accompanies the resolves, together with the resolves themselves, will so far explain themselves, and the nature of the propositions contained in them, as to render any explanation I could make entirely superfluous; and, heeding the admonition of my friend for Abington, (Mr. Keyes,) thrown out in debate the other day, that the chairmen of committees, instead of endeavoring to explain their reports, had better, sometimes, leave them unexplained, I feel disinclined to make any statement of a matter which so fully explains itself. Still, if there is any point upon which any person desires any explanation, I shall feel a pleasure in making it, as far as is in my power. Further than that, I deem it my duty to remain silent.

Mr. BOUTWELL, for Berlin. In regard to the third resolve, I should like to hear from the Committee, why they propose that a mere majority of the members of the Senate and House of Representatives shall propose amendments to the Constitution, instead of two-thirds? Also, whether the language of the proposed resolution is not such as to mean, that the majority of the Senate and House of Representatives shall be counted together, when they propose to amend the Constitution?

Mr. NAYSON. In answer to the inquiries of the gentleman for Berlin, I would say, in regard to the first, viz.: in reference to the liability of misconstruing the language used, that it did not occur to the Committee, who made a careful examination of the resolves, that any ambiguity could exist, and that there would be any uncertainty as to the meaning of the terms. The Committee, in employing the language they did, were unanimous in the opinion, that the mode of expression adopted was, on the whole, the best.

In regard to the question, why we propose to change the Constitutional provision which now exists, and which requires the concurrence of two-thirds, instead of a bare majority, to propose amendments to the Constitution, I would say, that it was the unanimous opinion of the Committee that, under the circumstances of the case, it would be better to require a simple majority, rather than two-thirds,—that matters of amendments to different provisions of the Constitution might come up, in the heat of political excitement, when it would be impossible to obtain the assent of two-thirds of both bodies to any proposition of amendment; and, acknowledging the principle which obtains here, that the will of a majority, when fairly expressed, should be acceded to by the minority, they introduced that provision. It was upon such considerations that the Committee suggested the modification of the present provision of the Constitution, so far as to substitute a majority in the place of two-thirds.

Mr. WALKER. I like the general tenor of these resolves reported by the Committee, but I should have been better pleased if they had provided that the question—"Shall there be a Convention to revise the Constitution and amend the same?"—should be proposed to the people in 1863, instead of in 1873.

The Resolve now reads as follows:—

Resolved, That it is expedient to provide in the Constitution that, at the general election to be held in the year eighteen hundred and seventy-three, and in each twentieth year thereafter, and also, at such other times, preceding or succeeding the above-named year, as the legislature may by law prescribe the question—"Shall there be a Convention to revise the Constitution and amend the same?"—shall be submitted to the qualified voters in State elections; and, in case a majority of the same thus voting, shall decide in favor of a Convention for such purpose, the legislature, at its next session, shall prescribe by law for the election of delegates to such Convention.

Now, it seems to me, that we should say, that in 1863, that is within ten years after this Convention, the question should be submitted to the people, whether they will have a Convention to revise the Constitution. It costs nothing to have the question submitted, and if the people do not want a Convention they will say "no," without any trouble or expense. It is no more than fair and just, that the people should have that opportunity as often as once in ten years, and, therefore, I venture to move to strike out from the resolve which I have read the words "seventy-three" and insert in lieu thereof the words "sixty-three." I do it upon the ground that it is but just to the people that they should possess that power.

I do not know what party such a provision will benefit or injure, and am not at all anxious to know. Indeed, nobody in the mutable nature of human affairs can know. It is enough that I believe that the people should, as a matter of justice, have the right at that time to vote upon the subject, irrespective of any legislation whatever.

Mr. BATES, of Plymouth. I can hardly see the propriety of adopting the proposed amendment, and leaving the resolve, in other respects, as it is. If we adopt it the provision will provide that in ten years from this time the question shall be proposed to the people whether they will have a constitutional convention or not, and in each twentieth thereafter, instead of each ten years. If it is important to have the question taken in ten years from this time, it will be just as important to have the question submitted in ten years thereafter instead of twenty years.

I think the resolve is well enough as it is, and I hope it will not be amended as proposed, and at any rate if "seventy-three" shall be stricken out and "sixty-three" inserted, that it will be further amended so as to provide that the question shall be submitted every tenth year thereafter.

Mr. NAYSON. A single word in regard to the proposed amendment. The time was fully considered by the Committee, and after mature reflection the Committee were unanimous in the opinion that the period of twenty years from this time, and every twenty years thereafter, was on the whole soon enough and often enough for sending out to the people a proposition for the call of a constitutional convention. In coming to that conclusion, they were governed mainly by the consideration, that if the legislature shall deem it of sufficient importance, or if the people shall will it, the question of calling a convention to revise the Constitution can still be sent out to the people every year by the legislature. Considering that the provision is in advance of any provision existing in the Constitution of any other State upon that subject, and that the legislature still have the power of submitting the question at any time, the Committee thought the period of twenty years soon and often enough to make it imperative upon the legislature to submit that question. But, had it not been in the power of the legislature, or of the people through the legislature, to submit that question as often as they choose, then the period of ten years might have been a proper length of time for that purpose. The provision provides that a convention may be called every year, if the people, through their legislature, will it.

AMENDMENTS AND ENROLMENTS. — BIRD — NAYSON — BOUTWELL — HALE.

If the amendment of the gentleman from North Brookfield, (Mr. Walker,) is adopted, then the language of the resolve should be changed in other respects, in order to make the different parts conform. I hope, however, that the Convention will adopt the resolve as it stands, for I thought the Committee had been extremely liberal in their manner of treating this matter. The present Constitution, as the report states, is entirely deficient in this respect, and it is only in reference to single and specific amendments, that any method is designated whereby that instrument can be changed. The Committee have endeavored to supply that defect, and by an inspection of the Constitutions of other States, I am bound to say that the proposition now under consideration goes to a further extent, than any that I have been able to find existing in the Constitution of any State in this Union—not even excepting New York, which has been the most liberal in that respect.

The question was then taken upon the motion submitted by Mr. Walker, to strike out "seventy-three" and insert "sixty-three," and it was decided in the negative.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. BIRD, of Walpole. I would like to ask the chairman of the Committee, what reason there is for requiring that when a proposition for the amendment of the Constitution first comes before the legislature it shall be adopted by a majority of all the members elected, but when it comes before the next general court, it need only be adopted by a majority of the members present and voting?

Mr. NAYSON. In answer to the inquiry of the gentleman I would say, that the controlling motive in inducing the Committee to that recommendation was this, if I understand it correctly, to prevent the introduction of unnecessary and uncalled for propositions for the amendment of the Constitution. Supposing that the labors of this Convention will terminate in the production of an instrument as nearly perfect as possible, amendments to any great extent will not be necessary. But if propositions for necessary amendments should hereafter be made, the reasons for them would be so apparent and obvious, that a majority of all the members elected would assent to such a proposition. These were the controlling motives which operated upon the minds of the Committee. They thought it reasonable and proper, under the circumstances, and directly calculated to guard against the infraction of that instrument, and prevent all unnecessary and impolitic amendments being proposed.

Mr. BOUTWELL, for Berlin. I cannot, as at present advised, agree to the third resolve. In the first place, setting aside the usage of Massachusetts and other States, I think it quite doubtful whether the legislative assembly properly has anything to do with the Constitution. So strongly impressed am I with the truth of that consideration, that I am willing to make it difficult for the legislature to amend the Constitution, or to take any initiatory steps towards that end. The members are not usually elected with reference to amendments of the Constitution, and it is with this view that I would rather agree to the existing provision of the Constitution in reference to legislative amendments, than to the proposition of the Committee. The proposition of the Committee is, that amendments proposed to the Constitution in the legislature shall be consented to by a majority of the senators and representatives elected, without any reference to the distinction which exists in the Constitution, that senators and representatives form different branches of the government.

If there should happen to be twenty majority in the House of Representatives in favor of the proposed amendment to the Constitution, and a majority of five in the Senate against it, according to the reading of this resolution, the amendment would be adopted and referred to the next legislature; and then, if there was a sufficient number of senators and representatives present to constitute a quorum only of each branch, and nine members of the Senate, and thirty-one members of the House of Representatives, should vote in favor of the amendment, it would be adopted, and go to the people.

Now, Sir, I had much rather that the Constitution should stand just as it is. It seems to me, that if any great exigency should arise, requiring legislative interference in this matter, it will be taken care of under the existing provisions of the Constitution. Besides this, I am not in favor of holding out any invitation or inducement to the legislature to take this matter of amending the organic law of our Commonwealth into their own hands, to be acted upon when they please, and under whatever peculiar circumstances may possibly exist for the time being. I would rather place it entirely beyond the power of the legislature to take any initiatory steps whatever in reference to amending the Constitution. If the general question is to be submitted to the people once in twenty years, I think we shall not experience any bad consequences; and this resolution I will support. I ask for a division of the question, with the hope that the third resolution will be rejected.

Mr. HALE, of Bridgewater. There has been no explanation given as yet which satisfies my mind that the second resolution reported by the Committee, should be incorporated in the Constitution. From a cursory view which I have taken of the subject, it seems to me, that it is a provision which is entirely unnecessary to be inserted in that instrument. If I understand it, it is intended to provide, that in case the legislature of 1873 should fail to submit to the people the question of calling a Convention, that duty shall devolve upon the Secretary of the Commonwealth, who shall proceed at once to issue notice for that purpose. It seems to me, that by adopting any such provision we shall be casting an unjust imputation upon the legislature of that year, whoever they may be, that they will not do as they are required by an express provision of the Constitution to do; and, Sir, I am the last person who would be willing that any provision containing such an unworthy suspicion should be adopted and made a part of our organic law.

Besides this, it is provided, as I understand the resolution, that the legislature of any year, whether preceding or succeeding the year 1873, may, if it is desired, submit that question to the people; but, if any circumstances should arise which would make it necessary for the people to call for a convention, and the legislature should not deem it expedient to submit that question to them, the people would be very sure, the next year, to elect a body which would conform to their wishes in this respect. It, therefore, strikes me, that the second resolution is entirely unnecessary, and ought not to be adopted.

Mr. NAYSON. I would say a single word in reply to the remarks of the gentleman from Bridgewater. I hope that his motion to strike out the second resolve will not prevail, for if the Committee which had the subject under consideration were unanimous or united upon any one point referred to them, or which presented itself in the course of their deliberations, it was upon the proposal embraced in the second resolve. Taking into account the history of the past, together with the fact that this same provision in reference to the calling of a convention at a specified time, once existed in the Constitution of 1780, and that that provision was entirely disregarded by the various legislatures, the time when the question should be submitted to the people being allowed to go by, and thereby depriving the people of the right of calling a convention—I repeat, taking these facts into consideration, I hope the Committee will be slow in adopting the motion of the gentleman from Bridgewater.

It seems to me a perfectly plain and obvious matter, that a power should exist somewhere which shall enable the people, in case they fail to obtain their right of calling a convention through one class of agents, to obtain it by another means—that is, through the Secretary of the Commonwealth. The Committee considered the subject in that light, and unanimously agreed upon this resolution as the most effectual mode of providing against an emergency of this character. Until such an exigency shall occur, the provision will, of course, lie dormant and useless; but, when the event shall take place, which is not an impossible thing, it will then come in full play, and be the just and proper remedy for the difficulty. I hope, therefore, that the resolve may be allowed to pass as it stands.

A word now in regard to the objections to the third resolution so strongly urged by the gentleman representing Berlin, (Mr. Boutwell). I would call the attention of that gentleman to the fact which he will no doubt recollect, that, in the present Constitution of our State there is no express power given to the legislature to propose specific amendments to the Constitution; and it is for the purpose of conferring that power upon the Senate and House of Representatives that the third resolution has been especially framed, and is so explicit in its terms.

I think, that upon due consideration of this

Wednesday,]

AMENDMENTS AND ENROLMENTS.—BARTLETT—NAYSON—BOUTWELL—COLE—SIMMONS.

[July 6th.

matter, the gentleman will see the necessity for some provision of this kind in the constitution, placing in the hands of the Legislature the power to propose amendments to that instrument whenever such alterations may be required, and will accordingly acquiesce in the Report as it stands. So far as the Committee are concerned, it is perfectly immaterial whether the vote of two-thirds or of a simple majority of the two Houses shall be required upon the adoption of such amendments, so long as the power is conferred upon the legislature to propose amendments whenever they may be necessary. I hope that this explanation will be sufficient and satisfactory, and that no further objection will be made to the passage of the resolution in question.

Mr. HALE, of Bridgewater. The gentleman has referred to the provision in the original Constitution of 1780, that at a certain time the legislature should submit the question of amending the Constitution to the people, but as they did not do it, they lost the power of acting upon the matter, in any way. And there has been no other provision for the question to be submitted by the legislature to the people, at any other period. According to the first resolution here, the legislature may submit the question to the people at any time either before or after the year 1873, or the twentieth year following, so that the contingency could not happen, which arose under the old Constitution, that if it was not presented to the people at a certain time the right of the legislature was entirely forfeited. It can hardly be supposed that any exigency will arise, however, which will require that a legislature shall take immediate action upon the subject, but if such an occurrence should, by any unforeseen event, take place, and the general court should refuse to submit the question to the people, whether there shall be a Convention to revise the Constitution and amend the same, the very next legislature which would come from the people would be sure to conform to their wishes. I think, therefore, that the argument of the gentlemen, so far as it relates to the Constitution of 1780, fails of having any force in this respect.

Mr. BARTLETT, of Boston. I entertain no very favorable regard for either of the resolutions which have been reported by the Committee, but believing it to be a wise policy that if any amendments are to be adopted, and incorporated in the fundamental law of the State, they should be thoroughly revised and understood. I would like to make an inquiry of the chairman of that Committee. It is this: does the second resolution provide for the basis of representation in any Constitutional Convention that may be called by the legislature, or, in other words, how is the Convention to be constituted?

There is, it is true, a crude suggestion, that the electors shall call the Convention together, but whether each town shall have one delegate or more, or whether the towns shall be represented in accordance with the basis of representation of the last decennial period, the resolution does not state.

Mr. NAYSON. So far as I am able, I shall be happy to answer the question which has been propounded by the gentleman. I would say to him, that the matter was fully discussed in the Committee, and they came to the conclusion that, in the choice of delegates to such Convention, the usual course would be followed which is now pursued in all civil bodies of this kind. Precepts would be sent to every city and town in the Commonwealth, calling upon voters to elect delegates, in the same manner as they were issued in convening this body. It is a matter, however, more properly within the jurisdiction of those officers of the government whose duty it is to issue such instruments, and the Committee, therefore, thought it unnecessary to cumber the resolve in question with any details as to the manner of proceeding, which has been alluded to by the gentleman from Boston.

Mr. BARTLETT, of Boston. I think if the gentleman will compare the Act under which the present Convention was called, with the Act which convened the Convention of 1820, he will find that those gentlemen who were delegated to represent towns in that Convention, might be elected from other towns than the one in which they resided.

Mr. NAYSON. I would ask the gentleman if he finds any provision, in the Act calling this Convention, which allows the election of delegates from other towns than those in which they reside? Is it not a matter of inference, merely?

Mr. BARTLETT. I do not mean that it is specifically so provided, but I think it is practically the case. There are living illustrations of that fact all around us. I do not desire, however, to protract the debate. All resolves that are passed in Committee of the Whole, are to be placed in the hands of a revising body, previous to their being submitted to the people, and whatever defects may exist, will be there pointed out and remedied. But, I desire that no resolution shall pass this body until it has been made so clear and perspicuous, that the revising Committee can readily comprehend its meaning and intent.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I have a word to say in reference to the third resolution. That resolution declares, that amendments to the Constitution may be proposed by the Senate and House of Representatives. It is true that the existing provision of the Constitution does not, in terms, declare that propositions for the amendment of the Constitution may be made, but it says that, whenever propositions are made, either in the Senate or House of Representatives, they shall be treated thus, and so, of course, the very language itself implying that amendments may be proposed.

Besides this, we have a usage of many years to justify such a step, and I, therefore, think it as well settled as anything can be, that under the existing Constitution, amendments may be proposed either in the Senate or House of Representatives. Under these circumstances, I do not believe it is worth while to incorporate any provision in the Constitution, which almost every one will agree is there at the present time. As to the form of treating amendments, when they have been proposed, I concur in the provision of the Constitution rather than in the mode proposed by the Committee. I, therefore, hope the third resolution will not be adopted.

Mr. COLE, of Cheshire. I would inquire of the chairman of the Committee, whether the Committee were of the opinion that, in the submission of the question to the people at the time specified in the resolution—namely, the year 1873, and every twentieth year thereafter—any legislative act would be required?

Mr. NAYSON. In reply to the gentleman, I would state, that the Committee do not understand that any legislative act is necessary, for calling a Convention at the time designated in the resolve.

They decided that, as it was a peremptory provision, making it a duty of the legislature to send out that proposition, that body would send it out at the proper period, no other action being necessary on their part. The whole duty of the legislature, therefore, is accomplished, when they shall have conformed to the provision of the Constitution, and submitted the question to the people.

Mr. SIMMONS, of Hanover. There seems to be a variance between the first and second resolve, which I would like to hear explained. By the first resolution, we provide positively, that this question shall be submitted to the people in the year 1873, and at every twentieth year thereafter; then there is a further provision that the legislature may call a Convention at such other times, preceding or succeeding the last named year, as they may see fit. I understand, from the explanation which has been given by the gentleman from Amesbury, that no legislative action is necessary in calling the Convention every twenty years, but will not some action be requisite, if the legislature should call a Convention at any other period than that which has been designated? Then in the second resolve, it is provided, that in case the legislature shall fail to submit to the people at the periods named, the question of calling a Convention, that duty will devolve upon the Secretary of the Commonwealth. I would ask if there is not an apparent inconsistency in these provisions? This is the way in which the resolutions strike me, and I should be happy to hear an explanation in regard to them.

Mr. NAYSON. It may be, Mr. Chairman, that the meaning of the resolutions is involved in all the obscurity, doubt, and even contradiction which the gentleman would have us suppose, and it may be, too, with all due respect to the judgment of the gentleman, that he has failed to comprehend their plain and obvious meaning and intent. As he desires an explanation, however, I will state, that the first resolve merely imposes upon the legislature by a Constitutional provision, the duty of submitting to the people, every twenty years from this time, the question, "Shall there be a Convention to revise the Constitution, and amend the same?" and, in case the legislature shall fail to comply with this Constitutional duty, the second resolve further provides, that that duty shall devolve on the Secretary of the Commonwealth, who shall send out the question for the consideration and action of the people, precisely in the form prescribed in the first resolve. And, if a majority of the people vote in favor of calling a Convention, then it is further provided, that the governor of the Commonwealth shall issue his proclamation to the qualified voters of the cities and towns of the State, calling upon them to elect delegates to such Convention.

It seems to me that the resolutions are obvious and consistent in their meaning, and within the comprehension of every gentleman of this body, and, if any fault is found with the language, the difficulty, if there is any, can be remedied, as has been suggested, when the resolutions shall go before the revising Committee.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Charlestown. As there is some doubt whether there is a quorum present, and as there are not enough, certainly, to warrant the taking of a vote upon this question, I move that the Committee do now rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

The motion was agreed to.

The Committee accordingly rose, and, the President having resumed the Chair of

THE CONVENTION,

The Chairman, Mr. Griswold for Erving, reported, that the Committee had had under consideration the resolutions on the subject of Amendment and Enrolment, had made some progress therein, but had been unable to come to any conclusion, and asked leave to sit again.

Leave was granted.

Leave of Absence.

Mr. FAY, of Southborough, from the Committee on Leave of Absence, presented a Report from that Committee, granting leave of absence to Mr. Taber, of New Bedford.

No objection being made, the question was taken on agreeing to the Report, and it was decided in the affirmative.

On motion, the Convention then, at twenty minutes past six o'clock, adjourned.

THURSDAY, July 7.

The Convention assembled pursuant to adjournment, and was called to order by the President at 10 o'clock.

Prayer by the Chaplain.

The Journal of yesterday was read.

Petition Presented.

Mr. CHANDLER, of Greenfield, presented the petition of C. J. J. Ingersoll, and thirty-eight others, inhabitants of Greenfield, for a declaration in favor of fugitive slaves.

The petition was referred to the Committee on the Bill of Rights.

Quorum.

Mr. COLE, of Cheshire, submitted the following resolution, which was referred to the Committee of the Whole:—

Resolved, That the Constitution be so amended that a majority of the members of the House shall be necessary to constitute a quorum.

Orders of the Day.

On motion of Mr. WILSON, of Natick, the Convention proceeded to the consideration of the Orders of the Day.

The first item being the subject of General Laws for Corporations, was, on motion of Mr. Wilson, passed over.

The next item being the resolve on the subject of

The School Fund,

Reported from the Committee on the Encouragement of Literature, was read, as follows:—

Resolved, That the legislature shall, as soon as may be, provide for the enlargement of the School Fund of this Commonwealth, until it shall amount, at least, to the sum of two millions of dollars; and the said fund shall be preserved inviolate, and the income thereof shall be annually appropriated for the aid and improvement of the Common Schools of the State, and for no other purpose.

The question being on its final passage.

Mr. COGSWELL, of Yarmouth. Mr. President, the question of public or popular education is one of the most truly important subjects which can engage the attention of the Convention during its session. In Massachusetts, founded by men, many of whom possessed minds enlarged by observation, and enriched by careful cultivation of the old world, this momentous interest has at no time been neglected. The loftiest intellects and noblest spirits of the State have considered themselves honored in bestowing their best labors upon this cause. The Pilgrim Fathers, in the darkest and most gloomy days of the infant colony, when it was oppressed by poverty at home, and threatened by savage wars abroad, made liberal appropriations for the support of her schools. And, in the progress of time, has arisen that noble system of popular education which is admired and imitated throughout the world.

The excellencies of this system are, first and best—that it is free and equal. It is established for the benefit of all. It throws wide open its ample portals, and welcomes all to enter in. The school house is built for all. The libraries, apparatus, all its privileges and opportunities, are offered, unrestricted and without reserve, to any and every person desirous of improving them.

Thus this system brings all classes together, and helps them to a mutual understanding and regard. The children of the protestant and the catholic are instructed in the same school room, and taught that God is the maker of us all. The nurslings of fortune sit upon the same form with the children of poverty, and learn that man is respected, not for the accidental circumstances of birth or fortune, but for what he is, and what he becomes of himself. In this way they are trained to mutual forbearance, and made to know each others wants and deficiencies. Thus, too, the sentiments of personal equality and independence are entwined about the life of childhood until they grow with the growth and strengthen with the strength of manhood. Upon the tender and impressive nature of youth, is stamped the conviction that in a free state merit must rise, while the most inspiring examples show them that the lowliest birth, and deepest poverty, are no obstacles to the greatest success.

This is the only system by which the poor can be worthily educated. The poor have special claims upon the State which is the mother of all her citizens. If a young man is forced to begin life under the depressing influences of poverty, he should be permitted to receive the fullest privileges of education, and be recognized as an equal among equals.

But, we must educate the poor, not only for their sake but for our own. It is for the interest of all that they should become intelligent and high-minded members of society. Otherwise, we shall witness the frightful results of ignorance and degradation and crime. Sir, in the course of the debates to which we have listened, upon other topics of vital interest to the State, gentlemen have frequently alluded to the excesses of European Revolutions. If we wish to avoid such excesses; if we wish that the ballot-box, rather than the paving stone of the street should be the engine of political revolution; if we wish to see the reign of christianity, rather than of infidelity, in a word, if we are desirous of enjoying the rule of American citizens rather than of French mobs, let us make liberal appropriations for the instruction and enlightenment of all classes of society.

This system has been abundantly tried, and is amply successful. It is the only one that can diffuse, universally, the benefits of knowledge. It is as free as the air and generous as the dews and rains of heaven. It is become an unit; it is easy, expeditious, and economical in its operations.

Our system of public instruction should be especially dear to us, as being essentially American in its character. It is adapted to the genius of our institutions and is necessary for their perpetuation. Common schools were established in the infancy of our country; they are equally beneficial in these later days of its glorious maturity and development. In these nurseries our children are trained to virtue and independence. They are early taught the lessons of freedom and equality. They are shown that individual excellence and self-reliance constitute the true nobility of manhood. Thus, are they trained for the arduous duties of life and the manifold needs of society.

How different in this respect is the operation of our system of public instruction from the systems of the European states, so much praised and vaunted. They are like, and yet how unlike, our own! In Germany, and Austria, and Italy, and Prussia, schools are abundant, and no expense is spared to secure their excellence. But, after all, they are only nurseries of slaves. Children are taught religiously to believe in the doctrines of implicit obedience to despotic authority and the divine right of kings. They too often become intelligent machines rather than high minded men and women. How different in Massachusetts! Here we wish our children, above all other things, to be taught, both in theory and by example, that all men are free and equal, both by the dictates of natural reason, and in the eye of the law. The advantages of our common schools in the past and present history of the Commonwealth, being so manifest and obvious, the sole question for us to decide is, how we may best perpetuate the system and develop it to its noblest perfection. It may not be absolutely symmetrical in all its parts, its benefits may be extended in different ways, and to those who do not yet receive and appreciate them; but yet it is and will be one of the positive and cherished institutions of the State. Our earliest care will be to supply its imperfections if any are discovered, and furnish the material aid necessary to its operations. This is the practical question now before the Convention. An enlargement of the school fund is needed to meet the increasing wants of the people. Our population is rapidly augmenting. New institutions, tending to promote the general diffusion of knowledge, have been introduced amongst us: they need efficient pecuniary assistance. Teachers' institutes, the normal schools, the scholarships, all look to us for substantial endowments. Shall they not have them? Besides, large sums may be profitably expended in the support of efficient and accomplished agents, the publication and diffusion of educational documents, and the establishment of school libraries. If this provision be adopted, moreover, it will be gratefully received by those numerous towns of large population and scanty means, where taxes for the support of common schools are now so heavy and burdensome." In these towns our school is half our taxes.

I hope, therefore, Mr. President, that this provision will be adopted. It seems to me to be demanded by the necessities of the case and the progress of the times. I believe nothing would more materially promote the prosperity of the State. I believe that justice and generosity alike require us to be liberal in this matter. I would have every poor boy, every friendless child, to feel that the cherished arm of the State is over him for good, and that nothing but his own exertions and perseverance are necessary to raise him from his obscurity.

I do not propose to trespass longer upon the patience of this Convention with this strain of desultory and general remark. Before resuming my seat, I wish, however, to make a single suggestion addressed to the laudable sentiment of State pride—the honest exultation and satisfaction we all feel in the fame of this ancient Commonwealth, for whose good we are now attempting to legislate. Massachusetts is not blessed with great natural wealth or abundant resources; and yet, in spite of her disadvantages, she has grown great and prosperous, and won for herself a fame that the proudest empires of earth might envy. And this has been accomplished by the enterprise and intelligence of her sons alone. A great part of it is to be ascribed to our common schools, that our wise fathers established, where every son and daughter of Massachusetts have been trained to self-respect and honorable labor. Other States have imitated our system of public instruction, and have even made improvements upon it. Let us be careful that we be not the first to take steps backward. Now we see other States, more favored than our own by nature, taking gigantic strides along the road to wealth and prosperity. In the Great West and upon the shores of the Pacific, yearly spring up States of a territorial extent compared to which ours is but a finger's breadth. Constantly the great tide of emigration rolls through our borders on its way to fill up their magnificent prairies and deposit its living millions upon the banks of their mighty rivers.

In the progress of events, States now foreign to us will demand admittance into the Union. This seems the natural course of things, and we can scarcely obstruct it if we would. Now, is Massachusetts to fall back from the proud position she has occupied so long? There is one way and only one to retain it, and that is, by developing still more assiduously and liberally the intelligence and innate enterprise of her children. True, our soil is a hard soil to cultivate, but it is the best in the world on which to raise intelligent and high-minded men.

"Men are the growth our rugged soil supplies,
And minds are ripened 'neath these Northern skies."

I repeat it, Mr. President, if we wish our State to retain the high rank she has so long maintained among the States of the Union, we must foster the interests of education; we must, in the language of our Constitution, "cherish the interests of literature, and the sciences, and all seminaries of them, especially common schools and grammar schools, in the towns." Then in the future as in the past, we may hope that Massachusetts will bestow upon the world her jewels beyond all price. And long may peace and prosperity smile upon her, and her borders be the home of liberty, patriotism, intelligence and virtue.

Mr. LOTHROP, of Boston. I move to amend the resolve by inserting after the word "appropriated" in the last line but two, the words "under the direction of a board of education or such similar agency as may be by law established;" so that the resolve, as amended, would read:—

Resolved, That the legislature shall, as soon as may be, provide for the enlargement of the school fund of this Commonwealth, until it shall amount, at least, to the sum of two millions of dollars; and the said fund shall be preserved inviolate, and the income thereof shall be annually appropriated, under the direction of a board of education, or such similar agency as may be by law established, for the aid and improvement of the common schools of the State, and for no other purpose.

The Committee which reported the resolve under consideration, also reported another resolve which is contained in document No. 94, and is thus expressed:—

Resolved, That it is not expedient so to alter the Constitution as to provide, that a board of education and a board of agriculture shall be established as permanent departments of the government.

I proposed at first to present the proposition which I have now submitted as an amendment to this last resolve, but it seems to me, that the question as to whether a board of education shall be established or recognized in the Constitution may very well be discussed under the resolve now before us.

Upon the merits of the resolve as it stands, without the amendment I propose, it seems to me there can be but very little difference of opinion. The proposition as contained in the Report of the Committee to increase the school fund gradually, without taxing the people, to a sum much larger than the present amount of that fund, is one which, in my judgment, is vital to the best interests of the common schools of the State. I believe that, but for the fund which we already have the board of education would not have been in existence, and all that this board has done towards the improvement of these schools would not have been accomplished. The existing fund has already been and is of immense importance to the State, and its gradual increase to the amount proposed by the Committee, is also a matter of vital moment, and one which I am sure this body cannot fail to carry forward. Even if it is raised to $2,000,000, the amount will not be so large as to produce the effect which is produced in some States where a large school fund exists. If the whole income of the fund were directly appropriated towards the support of the schools, and proportionally distributed throughout the towns and cities of the Commonwealth for that purpose, it would not so perceptibly diminish the school tax as to deaden and depress the interest felt by the people in the common schools. Even if thus appropriated, it would only operate, and as it has been and will be appropriated, to "the aid and improvement of the schools," it would especially operate to increase the interest felt in them. If raised to the sum of $2,000,000, the income will simply be large enough to enable the board of education to carry forward with renewed and increased vigor all the plans which their wisdom may suggest for the improvement of the common schools of the State.

The Committee, of which I have the honor to be a member, have reported on the orders referred to them, that it is inexpedient to establish or recognize in the Constitution, either a board of education, or a board of agriculture, as a permanent department of the government. Now, it seems to me that a board of education and a board of agriculture are two distinct subjects. It might be very well to refuse to recognize a board of agriculture, and yet not well to refuse to recognize a board of education. Agriculture is one of the great industrial occupations of the people of the Commonwealth, and it might with, perhaps, just as much propriety be proposed to establish a board of commerce or a board of manufacture, or a board of the mechanic arts, or a board to regulate any of the great industrial occupations of the people of the Commonwealth. The question of a board of agriculture and a board of education are totally distinct from each other in my mind. It might be very proper to refuse to recognize one, and yet a matter of vital importance connected with the highest interests of the Commonwealth, that we should recognize the other.

Now, Sir, I believe that the history of the board of education in Massachusetts, or rather the history of the common schools of Massachusetts under the direction and management of the board of education, and you cannot separate one from the other, is of such a character and importance as to demand upon the part of this Convention a recognition in the Constitution of a board of education, or some such agency, as a permanent part of the organization of the government. Such an agency is necessary if we would have our system of public instruction, through common schools, efficient, progressive and thoroughly diffused and applied. It is necessary, especially for the benefit of the small towns of the Commonwealth, those portions of the State where the great influences of society do not bear with a very strong pressure. Indeed, the large towns and cities do not much need such an agency. In them there is always a spirit of enterprise, of progress, of improvement, and the strong action of the public mind, in those places, would of itself be sufficient to make it sure that these schools would be well taken care of, kept up at a high standard, and open to every improvement in education. But, in all countries where there has been a system of public education, the great point has been to reach the remote parts of the State—the small, poor towns—to bring up the standard of education there, and to make their schools as good as those in the cities and large towns, so that slumbering talent everywhere may be reached and developed. Such has been the effect of one system of public instruction in Massachusetts. Every portion of the State has been reached, and the whole community has been elevated, and all the common schools in the quiet and retired parts of the country have been improved. The great progress made in this direction during the last sixteen years is to be attributed almost altogether to the efforts of the board of education. This board has been the means of diffusing abroad in the State an immense amount of knowledge. It has awakened everywhere an increasing interest in the public schools. It has raised everywhere in the Commonwealth, even in the most remote villages, the standard of public education, and the whole character of the schools, and of the teachers. There is no State, I believe, in the world, that has increased more in all that goes to constitute an enlightened, prosperous, healthy, and happy community, than has the State of Massachusetts during the last twenty-five years. With no natural advantages of soil, climate, or staple productions, we have prospered in all things, and that prosperity has proceeded from the general intelligence of the people; and that general intelligence is the result, to a great extent, if not wholly, of our system of common schools; and the improvement, the immense improvement, in these common schools during the last sixteen years, is, in my judgment, mainly due to the efforts of the board of education. Permit me to allude briefly to what it has attempted and accomplished.

The successive members of that board have directed their attention to the improvement of the teachers; to the improvement of the school-houses; to greater punctuality in attendance, to the increase of the length of the sessions, and to circulating throughout the Commonwealth the laws of the State in reference to common schools, and all valuable documents upon the general subject of education.

They have improved the teachers by means of normal schools, teachers' institutes, and lectures of agents employed for the purpose. They have improved the school-houses by giving information as to the best plans of construction, the best arrangement of seats, desks, &c.; the most suitable localities, and all the minutiae of those outward, surrounding appearances and conveniences, which have so important an influence upon the mind and heart.

To secure punctuality of attendance, they have been at infinite pains to inform the parents of the amount of absence of children, and of the immense loss they sustain on account of that absence. They have recommended to the legislature laws which have been adopted, and which have had an important bearing upon the question of improvement of schools.

We can hardly conceive of the immense benefit to be derived from a body of men like the Board of Education directing their whole attention to the condition of the schools, and of suggesting to the legislature such changes in the laws as are requisite for their improvement. No member of the legislature, no committee of the legislature, would be able to give the subject so much attention as to understand perfectly what it was best to do without the aid of this Board of Education.

I say, it is mainly through the efforts of this Board of Education, that the important changes and improvements which have been made in our system of common schools during the last sixteen years, have been brought about; and I must ask the attention of the Convention for a moment longer, while I indicate some of these changes and improvements.

In the first place they have increased the compensation of teachers, and by increasing their compensation have elevated the standard of the qualifications demanded of them.

In 1837, the average pay of male teachers by the month, was $25.

In 1852, the average was $36.25—making an increase by the month, of $11.25.

In 1837, the average compensation of females was $11.38.

In 1852, the average was $15.36—making an increase of $3.98.

In 1837, the average length of sessions was six months, twenty-two days.

In 1852, the average was seven months, fifteen days.

This, multiplied by the number of schools in the Commonwealth, gives an increase of seven years and four months' school keeping in the Commonwealth every year, over the amount there was sixteen years ago.

The amount of money raised in 1837 for the support of schools was $387,124.

The amount raised in 1852 was $910,216—making an increase of $513,092.

We have also greatly multiplied the number of the public schools within the last sixteen years. In 1837 the number of schools was 2,918. In 1852, the number was 4,056—making an increase of 1,138.

In 1837, the number of teachers employed was 5,961. In 1852, the number was 8,910—making an increase of 2,949.

Another very important influence, as I conceive, which the Board of Education have exercised in the past and will still continue to exercise, is in increasing the relative number of female teachers employed in the Commonwealth. Every one of experience acknowledges the superiority of adaptation upon the part of females to be teachers; when properly educated themselves, they excel in imparting instruction and are best fitted to have charge of the mind and heart of the young. Everything, therefore, that can tend to elevate the females in the community and give them the means of earning a livelihood, by some elevated and honorable employment, is worthy of encouragement. In our own State, the number of female teachers employed in 1837, I have not been able to ascertain, but the number in 1852 was 6,456, and I cannot doubt that it is a very much greater number than were employed sixteen years ago.

The number of Normal Schools in the Commonwealth, which, also, have a very important bearing upon the subject of education, is now five, and provision has been made for the establishment of another. Of these, three are supported by the State, one by the city of Boston, and one at private risk. The amount of influence which these Normal Schools have had and will continue to have in improving the system of education throughout the Commonwealth is incalculable. Without it our common schools could hardly have been brought to their present improved state. Yet for these in a great measure, we are indebted to the Board of Education; and shall we not recognize this Board or provide for some such permanent agency to take charge of this highest interest of the State. To show something of the state of these Normal Schools and the beneficial influence they are exerting upon the common schools of the State, let me say that at a recent examination of one of these schools, a class was examined in optics. No text books were used at the examination, or had been used in the instruction. The pupils were taken to the blackboard; they drew the figures enunciated, the general and particular truths belonging to the propositions laid down, and illustrated them, and drew the algebraical formulas containing rules applicable to the construction of optical instruments, and in every way showed that they had a thorough scientific knowledge of the subject, sufficient for all purposes of instruction, and yet all the instruction they had received, was given in twenty-one oral lessons, by one of the pupils of the school. The gentleman from whom I had this information mentioned the fact as an illustration of the improvement which had been made in the art of teaching and mode of imparting instruction in our schools, and in the preparation of teachers. These persons, who had received but twenty-one lessons in this science, were all of them, probably, competent to go out into one of the common schools of the State and impart the same instruction in the same manner. This is one of the results which are the consequence of our Normal Schools, in preparing teachers for the duties of their profession.

Now, Sir, I repeat that it seems to me exceedingly important and desirable that we should recognize a Board of Education in our Constitution, and that it should be made the duty of the legislature to continue to provide for some such agency. I am not desirous that the Board of Education should be established or recognized precisely as it now exists. I only desire that we shall recognize the existence of such a Board and the obligation resting upon the legislature always to provide for some similar agency to take charge of this vast and important interest of the Commonwealth. It may be said that so long as the people of the Commonwealth continue to take the deep interest which they do now it is unnecessary to make any further provisions in reference to the subject. But it seems to me that a subject of so much importance should not be overlooked by us. The Board is now recognized and established by the legislature; but it seems to me that the very fact—the fact that it is an important branch of the government, is provided for by the legislature and does actually exist,—is of itself a reason for recognizing it in the Constitution. It has been suggested, that the people are so deeply interested in the public schools, there is no danger of the legislature overlooking the subject, and that it is not, therefore, necessary to put any provision in the Constitution with reference to the Board of Education or any similar agency, but that the whole matter may very safely be left in the charge of the legislature. On this ground we might as well refuse to take any notice in the Constitution of our common schools. Sir, I would notice both—the schools, and the agency by which they are to be constantly improved. If the subject of common schools is of that vital importance which I believe it is; if the experience of sixteen years has proved that under the direction of the Board of Education, the whole system of public instruction in Massachusetts has been most wonderfully improved, elevated and carried forward in every direction, in every portion of the Commonwealth, even in the most remote, smallest, poorest and most sparsely settled towns, it seems to me that it is our duty—that it is incumbent upon us as the guardians of that great interest, to recognize this Board of Education, and to recognize further, if necessary, the duty of the legislature to always provide for the establishment and continuance of some such agency for promoting and advancing this great interest.

I am sorry to trespass so long upon the attention of the Convention, but, I hope and trust, that the view I have presented will have weight in the minds of gentlemen, and that the amendment I have presented will prevail.

Mr. COGGIN, of Tewksbury. I consider efforts to secure the general diffusion of education as among the highest and noblest of human efforts. There is no other institution in our country so essential to our happiness and prosperity, so indispensable to the existence of a free people, as the common school system. Destroy this, and in a short time all our free institutions will follow; for, it is an unchangeable truth, that a free republic cannot exist where the common people are sunk in ignorance. It does appear to me, Sir, that we can hardly attach too much importance to our common schools. It does appear to me, Mr. President, that no laws of this Commonwealth more immediately affect the moral purity, happiness, and prosperity of the whole people, than those laws which go to establish, regulate and improve our common schools. However important our academies, our colleges, and seminaries of learning may be, in themselves, still, are not our common schools equally important? Yea, Sir, are they not more important? We might possibly dispense with some of our colleges and seminaries of learning and not be ruined, but we cannot dispense with our common schools, and as a free, enlightened community, survive the loss.

It is related of one of the presidents of the United States, while making the tour of New England, that he was struck with astonishment at the marks of perseverance and industry which were exhibited everywhere around him. The mountains were, many of them, cultivated to their summits, and all around him bore marks of enterprise, industry, and happiness. He expressed his surprise, and inquired of one of his suite, a distinguished citizen of New England, the cause of the phenomenon. "Do you see," says the gentleman, "on yonder little eminence, a large house with a steeple, and by its side a small white house? There is the solution of the problem—the secret of New England enterprise." The meeting-house and the school-house, always inseparable, contain the elements of that industry which cultivates the mountain's top, and gathers wealth from the mountain stream. The meeting-house and the school-house are, indeed, the source of New England's prosperity—her intelligence and her virtue.

Some parents withdraw their influence from our common schools, from the apprehension that the morals and manners of their children may be somewhat injured by the examples of the children of the poorer classes of the community. Now, those children, thus taken from the common schools, are generally the best scholars—the most studious and exemplary, and thus a serious injury is done to the common schools. Then, again, some of the most competent, faithful, devoted, and successful teachers are taken up by those who have the means and disposition to establish select private schools for their children. We cannot, to be sure, deprive these parents of the privilege of establishing schools for their children at their own expense, but, upon the whole, are they doing right—are they consulting the public good? Depend upon it, the time will come when their children will be exposed to the corrupting influence of bad examples, and at a time, too, less favorable for the parents kind, faithful, interposing, councils, warnings, and instructions. If they would send their children to the common schools, and along with them their fostering care and deep interest in their welfare and prosperity,—if they would help to cleanse the streams at the fountain head, they would confer upon community an incalculable benefit.

It has been said, Mr. President, and, I believe, truthfully said, that all the education which at least nine-tenths of our children ever receive, and which is to prepare them for all the various duties of life, is received at our common schools. I apprehend, Sir, that the views of many in reference to our common schools are very erroneous; an opinion has prevailed, more or less, that they are established for the poorer classes of community only; now a more anti-republican view of the subject could not be presented. Now, so long as such an idea prevails, they who have the means will provide for their own children,—there will be no inducement for the tax-payers, whose children are educated elsewhere, to provide any but the most ordinary accommodations for the common schools. Now, Sir, this evil must be remedied before our common schools will become what they ought to be. But what is the remedy? Why, let those who now educate their children at private schools and academies, exert themselves to make our common schools our best schools; let us have the best accommodations, the best teachers, and the evil would soon be remedied.

Mr. President; I think the opinion of Daniel Webster on this point worthy to be regarded and followed by us all: "If," said he, "I had ever so many sons to educate I would send them all to the public school, and," said he, "it is a reproach to Massachusetts that her public schools are not superior to the private."

Upon that part of the Report which prohibits the appropriation of any part of the school fund for the support of sectarian schools, I would make a few remarks. Though we have reported, that no part of the school fund shall be expended for sectarian purposes, yet, we would not, therefore, be understood as setting aside all moral and religious instruction in our common schools; far from it. Sir, Massachusetts has settled this subject. She has, by her Constitution and laws, enjoined it upon teachers to inculcate piety and Christian morals—love to God and love to man. Neglect all moral and religious instruction in our schools and seminaries of learning, and you cut assunder all the cords of conscience and moral obligations. Tell me, then, what principle remains that can give efficacy to laws in that community? Am I told that education, generally diffused among them, will do it? This is all important, but not enough. Depend upon it, education, the penalties of the statute book, the array of tribunals and executive offices and prisons, are all frail as the spider's web, to restrain the passions of men let loose from the ties of religion. Generally, education and true religion are indispensable to our political edifice; when united they constitute the life-blood of the body politic.

A most insidious effort, however, has been made, and is making, to separate religion and education, under pretence of discountenancing sectarianism, and prevent a union of Church and State. Hence, the Bible, in some instances, in years gone by, has been banished from our common schools, and teachers, in some instances, have been forbidden to pray in their schools, or speak a word to their pupils on the subject of morality and religion. Strange infatuation! that republicans should banish a book from their primary institutions of learning, which contains the only system that meets the wants and guards the rights of the great mass of mankind. Civil and religious liberty has found no place for the sole of the foot on this wide earth, except where the Bible is in the hands of the common people, and where it is studied, and in some measure loved and obeyed.

Now, Sir, let our public schools be sustained, and let the principles of sound morality and religion generally prevail, and our liberties may yet be immortal. Let the immense tide of population, rolling to the distant west, carry with them our common school system, and the institutions of Christianity, and its mountains and vallies shall nourish a growth of freemen; and ignorance and vice, and the regions of despotism, oppression, and slavery, will vanish before them.

Now, Mr. President, depend upon it, they are the truest and best friends to their country whose example and influence contribute the most to cherish and extend the knowledge and the practice, the morality and religion of the Bible, and to prevent or eradicate infidelity and wickedness. And oh! with how ill a grace do those persons boast of their patriotism, and publish their zeal for the liberty and happiness of the people, who are themselves the slaves of vice or the patrons of irreligion.

Mr. BRIGGS, of Pittsfield. I wish to say a word upon the amendment before the Convention. I believe this is the last matter reported by the Committee of which I had the honor to be Chairman. I desire to say, in regard to the amendment now before us, that I hope it will not be adopted. The subject embraced in the amendment did not escape the notice of the Committee, but they thought, in regard to the means of promoting popular education, that it was best to leave the matter just as it stands in the present Constitution. The article referred to the Committee, was that most beautiful and remarkable, and striking one, drawn by the pen of John Adams, whose mind, at the time of preparing it, was full of this subject of popular education, in which he recites the advantages of popular and universal education, the means of disseminating it, and the duty of the legislature to encourage it in all its forms. Under that article succeeding legislatures have proceeded, until our system of popular education has reached its present state. It seems to me, and such is the opinion of the Committee, that as the means of promoting this great object in future, and the instrumentalities to be used, it is better to leave the subject, under the circumstances, to the wisdom of succeeding legislatures, than to undertake to indicate by what instrumentality it is to be done. The amendment now offered adds nothing to the obligation of the legislature, and, indeed, it seems to me, it goes but very little ways, at the least, for it only provides, that this matter shall be in the charge of a board of education, or some such instrumentality as the legislature shall see fit to adopt. That is precisely the duty of the legislature now, and would be in any event. Again, it seems to me, this provision is not the appropriate one for increasing the school fund. I hope the Convention will adopt the resolution as reported by the Committee, which has for its object the promotion of popular education, without encumbering it with any such provision as is here introduced by this amendment.

The question was taken on Mr. Lothrop's amendment, and it was rejected.

The question recurring on the adoption of the resolution, it was taken and decided in the affirmative.

Basis of Representation.

Mr. BOUTWELL, for Berlin. I call for the special assignment.

The PRESIDENT. The special assignment is the consideration of the resolves upon the House of Representatives, which have been read twice, and the question now is upon their final passage.

Mr. WOOD, of Middleborough. It appears to me, that the second paragraph in the resolution requires amendment, and I wish to call the attention of the Convention to that particular section, as it has not been adverted to in the course of debate. The section reads as follows:—

Any two of such towns may, by a vote of the major part of the legal voters of each, at legal meetings thereof, unite together in a district, which shall be entitled to a representative each year, and shall continue for a period not less than five years.

Suppose, that these towns should unite in the year 1854, and the census should be taken in 1855. By that census, either of these towns might be entitled to one representative, having arrived at a number above one thousand, and having united in 1854, they must continue together for five years and cannot separate. Suppose they go on for four years and choose one member each year. Then they will have each of them one member left. Suppose, now, at that period they unite together. They must continue together for five years, because this resolve provides, that they must be united for five years, and then they might go in and choose a representative for five years more, and thus, they would get more than their proportion, which it is supposed they are entitled to, that is together, they would have a representative some eight or nine years. This would be the case if they unite at any period after the third year. If they continue together for five years, they would get more than their proportion, which, I presume, is not the intention of the Convention, by this resolution. The idea, I suppose, is taken from the Constitution of 1840, which provides, that they can only unite in the first year succeeding valuation year, or the year in which the census is taken; but, I do not see how it can be done, save the right of each town, and give the towns no more than their just proportion, unless the union takes place immediately after the census, or immediately after valuation year. In order to call the attention of the Convention to this subject, I propose the following amendment to this section:—

Any two towns may, by a vote of a major part of the legal voters of each, at legal meetings thereof, and held at some time preceding the first election, which shall take place under this amendment to the Constitution, and, thereafter, at legal meetings, held at some time preceding the first election, which shall take place next after each decennial State census, unite together in a district, which shall be entitled to a representative each year, and which shall continue until the next decennial census, excepting the year in which the valuation of estates is settled.

Mr. BOUTWELL, for Berlin. Although I have some views which I am well enough inclined to submit to the Convention upon this question, and it may be in defence of the proposition now before us upon its final passage, I should rather have preferred a moment farther on for the consideration of this subject.

Mr. MORTON, of Taunton. Will the gentleman give way for a moment. I understand from the suggestion of the gentleman, just made, that he would prefer to make what remarks he designs making, after we shall have heard all that is to be said against the proposition now before the Convention. In consequence of that suggestion from him, I propose to make the few remarks—which I had the intention of offering when a convenient opportunity presented itself—at this time, if that course would be most agreeable to him, or I will wait until he has finished, if he prefers it. He is entitled to the floor, and my desire is to conform entirely to the gentleman's wishes.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I will yield the floor with great pleasure.

Mr. MORTON. If it had been my good fortune to have had fifteen minutes more the last time I addressed the Convention upon this subject, I should have had no occasion to trouble them at present. I rise to address the Convention now with unfeigned reluctance. I have received so much kindness and attention from this body, that it would be very ungrateful in me to ask any farther indulgence from them; but, the subject now before the Convention has interested me so deeply, and I have deemed it of so much importance, that I supposed they would pardon me, in justification of my earnestness and pertinacity upon this subject, if I were still further to trespass upon their time and attention. I will pledge myself, in the outset, that I will not wander from the subject into the region of party politics, nor take up the time of the Convention in repelling any attacks or allusions which have been made to me personally in or out of the Convention. I will endeavor—and I hope that has always been my aim—to confine my remarks to the subject now before the Convention.

It is exceedingly unpleasant, at all times, for a gentleman to address a body, whose opinions, in all probability, are entirely made up, and when he cannot expect to convince or essentially affect their judgment; and this Convention, having directly acted upon the several propositions, or the particular propositions, presented here, I have too much respect for them, individually and collectively, to suppose, that there is any reason for believing that they will change those views. They have formed them as I have formed mine, having acted deliberately upon the subject, and I cannot hope to convince them. Still, it is barely possible that some suggestions which I may throw out upon some branches of this subject, may have some possible influence upon the minds of some members. I will endeavor not to abuse their indulgence by repeating anything that I have said before, upon this subject. It may be impossible for me to proceed with my argument without alluding briefly to some things which were said before. I consider the great problem in the establishment of free government to be, to settle and determine the mode by which the whole people are to express their views in the legislation of the country. I have endeavored to show that all the inhabitants of the country are entitled to a voice in the government, and that, the object in fixing the ratio of representation should be to give the whole people an opportunity, through their agents, to make known their wishes upon the subjects upon which it becomes necessary for the government to act.

I have endeavored to show, unsuccessfully, I fear, that the true basis of the system before us, is equality; I have endeavored to show, that this is founded on the principle of democracy, on the principle of justice and on the principle of Christianity. I do not intend to repeat anything that has been said in support of these propositions. I maintain, and other gentlemen have maintained here, that the true principle upon which we should act, is, that every man should at all times be equally represented in the legislative department of the government. As to the number of the agents which may be chosen to represent the people, that is a matter of expediency about which we may very properly differ.

I suppose, Sir, we have all come to the conclusion that we have presented to us here, the alternative either to take, in some form or other, town representation, or a system of representation by districts. The majority of the Convention have manifested their preference for town representation. I suppose that will be established. I maintain, however, that the only way by which you can reach equality or justice in regard to this subject, is by districts; and, I propose now very briefly to state, in addition to what I have already said on the subject, some reasons why the district system ought to be selected, rather than a system of town representation. I propose, therefore, to look at the comparative advantages and disadvantages of these two systems.

In the first place, I maintain that the district system enables us to fix upon a proper number, and that it is impossible to select the right number, in any system of town representation which can be devised. However we may differ upon that subject, and although in all probability I prefer a much smaller number than a great majority of the Convention, yet I take it, that all the Convention must agree that it is impossible, consistently with town representation, to reduce the number of this House at all, much more to bring it within proper and reasonable limits, and to get such a body as can best transact the public business for the use and advantage of the whole Commonwealth. I do not propose, Sir, to go much into this subject, but I wish to make two or three suggestions, which I passed over before in my desire to accomplish what I wished to say within the time allowed me. I think, Sir, that there are very strong objections to a very large House; and I call a House unreasonably large which exceeds the number of two hundred and fifty or three hundred. Certainly, four hundred, which, I believe, is less than the number required, by the ratio in the resolution, is a number entirely inconvenient for the transaction of the public business and inconsistent with due deliberation and advisement.

Such a body—and I intend to speak of it as regards those who have existed or may exist, with all possible respect—such a body, composed of four hundred members, brought together to legislate, be they the wisest men in the whole community, cannot transact the public business, with that understanding, that deliberation and wisdom, which is necessary to insure the best legislation. I hold, that such a body, be it composed of whom it may, necessarily falls into party divisions, and is influenced more or less by party feelings and party considerations. It is impossible for every individual to take a direct part in the transaction of business, and certain active individuals must of necessity assume the relation to the rest, of managers or leaders. It is immaterial what the character of the assembly may be, such will inevitably be the result; and such a body must necessarily be more under the influence of party leaders and party training than a smaller body.

Again, Sir, such a body, thus constituted, is more liable, I maintain, to extraneous and sinister influences. The moment you come to the conclusion that it assumes a party character, that it falls under the influence of leaders, you destroy individual responsibility, you narrow down the sphere upon which extraneous and illegitimate influence may be improperly exerted, to accomplish sinister objects. I am hardly disposed to say, yet I would not deny it, that the class of individuals who enter ardently into the management of public affairs as leaders, who become deeply interested in all public questions and ambitious of succeeding in all the measures they advocate, are more liable to extraneous influence than the members of the body generally. The great foundation of this objection, I apprehend, is this; that in a multitudinous assembly, you destroy personal responsibility. Every man considers the body as the accountable agent, and the individual is lost in the mass. If you have a small number, every individual feels himself personally answerable for every act that is done. In a large body, the members forget their individuality, lose their responsibility, are mixed in the general mass, and go either one way or the other, in the current, without feeling that deep interest in the righteous decision, of every question which is necessary for the proper consideration and examination of it, and the wise and conscientious exercise of their judgments. I have known measures carried by party training and party leaders, through a body of five or six hundred members which could not have been carried through a body composed of any one hundred of the same members. Were I a young, aspiring, talented and eloquent man, I would advocate a House of four or five hundred members. It would open a fine field for political adventurers, and ambitious aspirants for public honors.

But, Sir, I do not intend to enlarge upon the reasons which I have heretofore presented upon this subject, and I shall leave it where it is for the consideration of the members of the body.

I adverted to one other subject, which I deem of good deal of importance, but I had no time to speak of it before, and I will now say a few words in relation to it. I mean the concentration of power, or centralization, as it is called. In the centre of the Commonwealth, where the population is dense, numerous and wealthy, there will of necessity, be an accumulation of influence and power. This danger, to a greater or less extent, undoubtedly, does exist. I contend, that the sure and infallible remedy for the undue exercise of any such influence, is the division of the whole Commonwealth into fair and equal representative and senatorial districts. Because, in the centre of your Commonwealth, in your central population, in your great cities, you find a greater diversity of business, of pursuits, of opinions, of tastes, and of feelings of every kind, than anywhere else. And, when you divide this central population into districts, instead of being united in their action, you will find them balancing each other. And if you look into the rural parts of the Commonwealth, you will find a greater uniformity of pursuit, and much less diversity of interest and of opinion, than you will find in the large cities; and so far as congeniality of feeling and sympathy goes, your farming population will act more in harmony, and be more likely to unite together than the population of the large towns and cities. The moment you form districts, in a central population, where there is a variety of pursuits and competition and opposition of interests, that moment, rivalry and jealousy will spring up, and the more compact the population, and the more close the contact of the districts, the more likely will they be to oppose each other, and the more bitter and irreconcilable will be their disputes and their hostility.

Having said this, in favor of the District System, I will not go further into that subject. Having presented these general views, in favor of this scheme of representation, I wish now to look briefly at the subject of town representation, as it is presented to us, and see what there is to recommend that to our favorable regard. It would be impracticable for me to attempt to take up all the arguments which have been urged in favor of this system of representation. I wish barely to allude to some topics which have been discussed here, and say a very few words upon each of them.

In the first place we are told, that, by adopting the system of town representation, we are adopting the precedents of our ancestors, that we are following the usages which have been established in this Commonwealth for two hundred years. How much weight, Mr. President, ought this argument to have? In the first place, I deny that we are following the precedents of our ancestors; and, in the next place, I deny that we ought to follow them merely as precedents. It has been said, that our representation has always been that of town representation. I shall say a word upon that directly.

But, I contend, Sir, that these precedents ought not to have weight. If we are to adopt a system merely because our ancestors practised it, why should we not adopt it, and act upon it in all its parts, as they practised it? Why should we select one principle, one distinct point, and say that we will follow the precedent in that particular, but we will follow it in nothing else? If we are to be governed by their principles, in relation to the management of towns, why not carry it through, and take the principles as they adopted them?

It has been stated, and I have no reason to suppose that it is not correct, that in the early history of our Commonwealth, they admitted nobody as a legal voter unless he was a member of some orthodox church. They also required that the representatives should be pious and orthodox men. They also, at one time, and in one section of the Commonwealth, provided, that no lawyer should be a member of the general court.

Now let me inquire, if these precedents are so sacred that they must be followed, why not take them as a whole? Why undertake to amend them? Why not give us the full benefit of the whole of them? I am inclined to think that some gentlemen who advocate this system, would, like myself, be rather unwilling to have some of these provisions carried out, especially the last one.

But, again, if we are to follow out these precedents, we should have every town represented every year. But you propose to disfranchise a large portion of the towns for a part of the time. It seems to me, that, after having mutilated these precedents so far, we had better discard them altogether. But, what force ought they to have? Here was a little Commonwealth, one of the most perfect, I suppose, that ever existed, containing, perhaps, ten thousand inhabitants in its early organization. Now we are, upon the same territory I hope immensely improved in many things, though I fear not in adherence to principle and a conscientious discharge of duty, amounting to a million. Why should we adhere to the views which they adopted, or follow the examples which they set? You might as well say, that our parents were wise when they prescribed the clothes we should wear when infants, and, therefore, it would be very disrespectful to them, and unwise to change the fashion of them now that we have grown up to manhood. I apprehend this argument ought not to have much weight.

But if it has any weight, I wish to say, that, I think it has been established from this discussion, that there never was such a thing as town representation. To be sure they provided that the inhabitants of certain towns, upon the principle of equality as near as it could be attained, should be represented in the general court, not because they were towns, but because these organizations being in existence, it was the only mode in which they could conveniently establish their representation. But the principle upon which they established the representation, was that of men and not of corporations; and the town organization was resorted to for the purpose of enabling the freemen to vote, just as it is now in many elections, for State and national officers. But it was only as a matter of convenience, while the representation was the representation of the men, and not of the towns.

I suppose, I may be excusable for examining a little into this matter. Let us look at these towns and see what they were. I deny that they were intended to be established exclusively or mainly as municipal corporations. The great object of the governments themselves were ecclesiastical. The civil government was secondary and subordinate to the great purpose of religious worship. The object of establishing towns, and probably the principal one, was to create a body to exercise parochial powers. The inquiry, when a plantation applied to be established as a town, was, whether they were able to build a church and support an orthodox minister; and, that was almost the only inquiry made. Therefore, they gave establishments to carry out religious as well as municipal purposes, and afterwards it was provided, that the representation of the freemen should be according to their residence within the limits of these corporations, as the powers conferred were municipal as well as parochial.

I once thought, that it was rather singular that they should take the name of town, rather than parish, which was so common in the mother country. But, it is well known, that the origin and meaning of the word town was a fortified place, and this understanding of the import of the word, our ancestors, especially those who settled at Plymouth, brought with them. Those early settlements all had some kind of fortifications to protect them from the ravages of the aborigines of the country, and wherever a settlement was made, a block-house or stockade, or some kind of fortification was constructed with old trees, logs, or bushes, and those settlements, as well before as after their incorporation, were called towns, and hence the name, as I think, originated. But, I maintain, that they were religious, as well as municipal corporations, and were not intended for representation, when they were originally established.

The argument derived from town organization and town administration, is, the great argument in favor of town representation. I listened to it with instruction and delight, and I assented to every proposition which was laid down, except the conclusion which was drawn from it. I drew a directly opposite one. The importance of these municipal corporations nobody will question. Nobody has a higher opinion of their utility, nobody attributes more of the prosperity of this Commonwealth to these municipalities than I do, and nobody has a higher opinion of their use in inculcating and establishing democratic principles.

I believe, that I had occasion when in a public capacity many years ago, to call them little democracies. I maintain now, that they are schools of instruction in democratic principles, and I consider them invaluable for that purpose. The people there learn and practice the rudiments of political science. They meet and select their presiding officers, organize their meetings, and many subjects come before them which they discuss and investigate and refer to committees. They have reports, deliberate upon their adoption, rejection or postponement, move to amend them, to lay them on the table, to take them up, to indefinitely postpone them, and thus, go through the routine of parliamentary proceedings.

I never knew a town go into committee of the whole; but, they often manage to have pretty free discussions without resorting to that mode of transacting public business. But, there are a great many interesting subjects, which necessarily come up in town-meetings, and excite the deep interest and attention of the inhabitants. In many towns they transact their business in almost as orderly and parliamentary a manner, as it is done in the legislature of the State or in this Convention.

The subjects which come before towns, directly affect the welfare, and deeply excite the interest of the inhabitants, and I am not sure that the business done in town-meetings is not as important to the town inhabitants as any of the business of the legislature of the Commonwealth.

The subject of laying out, building, and repairing highways; the subject of the financial affairs of the town; the manner in which the money shall be raised and disbursed; the proper support of paupers; the maintenance of public schools, and the division of towns into districts for that purpose, are subjects which affect the rights, the property, and the welfare of all the inhabitants. These, with many others, are important topics of discussion, and will ever occupy the attention of these little deliberative assemblies, which are, in fact, legislative bodies, making laws for the government of all their inhabitants and exercising the powers and transacting the business of a democratic government.

The subject of establishing by-laws and of adopting petitions and remonstrances to the State, or federal governments, and the passing of approbatory or denunciatory resolves, often come before town-meetings, and open for discussion the science of government and the whole range of politics. In these assemblies are learned the rudiments of legislation and the mode of transacting public business. Here are trained and prepared the future governors, judges and legislators of the Commonwealth. No one appreciates these democratic schools more highly than I do, or would be more unwilling to destroy or diminish their power and usefulness.

And does anybody propose to impair any of these? Does the district system do it? Not at all; if it did, I would be the last man to adopt it. Does anything which we propose to do, diminish the people's deliberations and discussions in any way? No, Sir. It is said, that we take from them the right of representation in the legislature; but that is not done by the district system, for they have precisely the same right to come together and vote by that, which, they have under any other system—they can vote just as they always have voted; and, as far as the matter of merely voting for representatives is concerned, whether it be to represent a town, or a district, it does not change the character of the act. The depositing a vote for a representative, can neither add to, or diminish the instruction of which the gentleman speaks, when he tells us, that it would be a valuable school to initiate them into the forms of procedure in a deliberative assembly. Sir, the district system has not the slightest influence of that kind. What are the facts with regard to this matter?

Why, Sir, in choosing representatives, the people do not assemble together as they do when any subject is to be discussed in town-meeting; they come individually; they come very much as the gentleman from Natick said the councillors came, dropping in one after another. Each individual deposits his ballot, sealed up, it may be, although unlike my friend before me, (Mr. Lothrop,) he might not feel in the same degree degraded by the performance of that act—he comes, deposits his vote and goes about his business. We do not intend in any degree to impair the functions, or the utility of the municipal corporations of this Commonwealth. I disclaim any such idea or disposition.

But to proceed. There is another proposition which has been urged with considerable force, and which struck my mind as being somewhat remarkable. As I understood the proposition, it was, that we must preserve this system of town representation in order to furnish a system of checks and balances for the government. It struck me, as being a very singular proposition, to establish a body of four hundred, or four hundred and fifty members to be a check upon the popular obullition in the other branch of government, consisting of forty sober, discreet, grave men, for the very name of senator implies gravity and seniority.

I may be too radical, perhaps, but I deny altogether the application of checks and balances to a democratic government. I do not admit that they belong to our system. What are they, Sir? They are required only to operate upon some vice in the system of government. You introduce one provision, that is in itself vicious, and will operate unfavorably and perniciously upon the community; and then, you have to introduce another vicious principle in another part of the government to counteract that, or compensate for its injury. You introduce an erroneous principle to check the pernicious, vicious principle; or, you do a wrong to one class, to balance the wrong which you have done to another. I hold, that in a democratic government this is not only unsound in theory, but, is also, mischievous in practice. You propose to establish a body upon unequal and unjust principles; and one, which does not fairly represent the people; a body founded upon corporations, about which I will speak by and by, as a check to the action of the people of the Commonwealth. This seems to be incompatible with all the sound principles of a free government, and if it were decorous, I should say, was in itself inconsistent and absurd.

All that I consider requisite to constitute and render secure a true democratic government, is, that you so provide for the different departments of government, as to ensure due consideration and due deliberation. Whether that could be obtained in an assembly of four or five hundred members, is a problem, which I will not now discuss. Let those who advocate such an assembly satisfy themselves on this point. If you organize your government upon sound principles, and establish such a mode of action as shall ensure due deliberation and due consideration, why do you need checks, or what is there to balance? I hold, that the opinions of the people thus formed and expressed, should prevail without being checked by any factitious scheme or artificial contrivance whatever.

Again, Sir, it would seem that this House of Representatives, which is to be established as a check, is not a popular branch; it is made to assume somewhat the character of the House of Lords of England; that is, it is to be made with reference to particular localities, and to particular corporations, and is to be invested with the attributes, which are given to the House of Lords in other countries where there are such bodies. It seems to be an absurd, if not ridiculous comparison, to liken this assembly, coming from the rural districts of the Commonwealth, to the House of Lords in England, or any of the members of that branch of the government there—either the lords temporal, or spiritual. I will not dwell a moment on this subject, because, I cannot think that it will be deemed deserving of a sober consideration. Will anybody think it necessary or useful to give to the House of Representatives this artificial character to restrain legislative freedom, or to be a check on the precipitate action of that popular body—the Senate?

But, Sir, there is another view of this subject which I desire briefly to present. I have before suggested, that in my opinion, we never have had a corporate representation. I know very well that it has been said, that representation is a corporate right, viz.: that the corporations had a right to decide, whether they would have representatives or not, and I know that it has been said by the highest authority, but I have always doubted the soundness of that opinion. It has long been acquiesced in and I do not intend to stop to controvert it. But, it never has been said, that the House was a representation of corporations. I believe, that every one who heretofore has spoken on this subject, has avowed the doctrine, that the House was a representation of the people, and, that it did not acquire any additional force, or power from any corporations in existence.

Thursday,]

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.—MORTON.

[July 7th.

I consider, Sir, that one of the most threatening evils in our country arises from the multiplication of corporations, and the increase of associations. They are destroying all individuality of opinion and individuality of action among the people. Almost all enterprises and undertakings are commenced and carried on by associated action; and, I maintain, that our innumerable associations, whether with or without corporate powers, tend to destroy a proper reliance on private judgment and to annihilate individual responsibility. I really hope that in these views I shall have the sympathy of some portion of this body. I say, that the multiplication of corporations and associations for all manner of purposes, I care not what—although some of them may, perhaps, be useful and necessary—is extremely evil in its tendency and influence. It is well known, that corporations in their collective capacity will, without hesitation or consideration, do things that every one of the members, in his private capacity would shrink from with horror.

What, Mr. President, is a corporation? It is not very easy to form a definite and clear idea of it. Before attempting to define or describe this anomalous entity, I wish to make three or four remarks upon the subject of representation. I can't resist the conclusion that the present system, as about to be adopted, is founded, to a greater or less degree, upon representation of corporations. Such representations are very rare, the world over; they have a few of them in England. Their universities have representatives in parliament, but members of those colleges, after they have aided in the election of a representative for the colleges, do not lose their right to vote as citizens of the counties, or cities, in which they live.

And here, also, we are about to establish essentially a representation of corporations. In many towns by their numbers, the people do not authorize the representatives proposed; for to a man, in one town, is given four or five times the political weight and power that a man has in another; the people in some towns have a much greater representative power than the same numbers have in other towns. "Why this inequality? Why is so much more given to some than others?" Gentlemen say it is because we must maintain the system of corporate representation; then they give a portion, at least, of the representation to the corporation in its corporate capacity.

How much of the representation belongs to the corporation, and how much to the people? Upon what principle is the apportionment made? It is like all the rest of the system, purely arbitrary. There are no two towns in the State, where the proportion between the corporation and the number of the people is the same. There are no two towns where the political weight of the respective inhabitants are the same. It is all fixed upon an arbitrary rule, without the pretence of any principle to support it.

Now, Mr. President, what is this thing called which is allowed to deliberate and speak and vote in our legislative halls? A corporation. Corporations may be established for various and different purposes; they may be very diverse in their object, their influence and their effect; some of them may indeed be absolutely necessary and cannot be avoided; but none of them, I think, are unattended with evil. What is a corporation? I find it a little difficult to answer this question, and I wish I had my learned friend from Cambridge, (Mr. Parker,) to aid me, but, I see, that he is not in his seat. A corporation is said to be a legal fiction. But, it operates sometimes with tremendous power; and sacrifices property and even lives; but, still, it is only a fiction. What is it? Can you see it? Suppose an officer comes with a ca. sa. or a sub. per. col., where can he find the corporation? Can he execute his precept? It is nothing but an impalpable, fictitious being. Though immaterial, it certainly is not spiritual. The law books say that corporations are invisible and immortal, existing only in intendment of law. Everybody who is so unfortunate as to fall into their power, and has occasion to seek a remedy, will learn these things. It is said that they have no souls—they have really no moral responsibility. A corporation, as such, can commit no crime, certainly none malum in sa.; it cannot be punished at any rate.

Now, Sir, shall we add character and power to this dangerous, irresponsible, being? We admit that, it is possessed of vast influence in the community—shall we give to this soulless fiction a substantial and living representative in the legislature of the Commonwealth? I think, Sir, that if we should, it would be giving countenance and encouragement to all kinds of associations, corporate and voluntary, that it would induce them to make greater advancement, and to go still farther than they have ever yet gone in encroachments on the private rights and private pursuits of individuals. I have been astonished in looking at this subject, to find to what an extent corporations of every kind, religious and municipal as well as others, will disregard and violate the rights of individuals. I hope and am ready to believe, that this is not the case with all corporations, but instances of this kind are of frequent occurrence. Even in those corporations which are composed of the best men in the community, you may see the dangerous tendency of their irresponsible power.

It might be considered invidious to refer to some remarkable examples within my knowledge. But these corporations, parochial and municipal, as well as others, sometimes will be guilty of conduct which would surprise the members themselves. You may find a religious or parochial corporation taking from a poor widow her last seat in the church, her only place for the public worship of her Maker, merely, that they may adorn and beautify their house, or build a more elegant edifice. I have known a case—it is recorded on our Reports—and, therefore, I may speak of it, where a town went through a protracted lawsuit in resisting the payment of the expenses of a surgeon, for amputating the limb of a pauper, by which his life was preserved and prolonged. I would not impute such conduct to every religious or municipal corporation; and, I will not reflect too severely on the motives of those, who were concerned in these things. They may have been very good men, individually, but, when men act in corporations, they seem to forget the rules and principles which govern them in their individual capacities.

I cannot agree to this representative system, as formed by my excellent friend for Erving, or whoever else may have formed it; for, I think, in many respects, it is constituted on the same plan as the English borough system. I dare say, that, this system was familiar to their minds, and it is very possible, that it had more influence upon them, than they are aware of. They have, in one particular, given us a perfect rotten borough representation. They have given us an arbitrary rule of apportionment, instead of a representation founded on population.

Boroughs, as it is well known, in England, elect nearly one-half the whole representation in Parliament; they are corporations vested with the privilege of electing members of Parliament, and, in that respect, they bear more or less resemblance to the towns in this Commonwealth, under the new system—they are entitled to one, two or three members, according to the provisions of their charters, without regard to the number of their inhabitants. This is the essential character of English borough representation. In this matter our friends have imitated them, and this system, I suppose, is the one which is to prevail in this State. There is one thing, however, in which we fail to come up to the English standard, and that is, in the right of representation without residence. English boroughs are not confined at all to their own localities, in the election of members. I believe, by the provisions of the Constitution as it now stands, the towns will be compelled to elect their representatives from among their own inhabitants—which I deem an important and essential provision.

No man can be a faithful representative of his constituents, unless he resides among, and gets his impressions directly from them. In England it is otherwise, and this is the only feature which is wanting, in order to make our system a fac simile of the rotten borough representation of England. I do not know whether this feature is intended to be introduced into the question or not, but, I am informed that there is a motion now pending before this Convention, to provide, that towns shall be authorized to select their representatives from any part of the Commonwealth, without regard to their residence in any particular town. If that proposition should be adopted, it will, in my opinion, give to our system a perfect similitude to the rotten borough system, in every important particular. It will, at any rate, then come much more near to the British precedent, than to the old system of representation as practised in provincial and colonial times.

I had prepared a statement, showing the gross inequality of the system now proposed, but I do not think it would be expedient again to go into its details, because, that part of the subject has been sufficiently discussed and exposed already. I cannot very well help alluding to it, however, before going on.

Mr. President, I have some other objections to this system. I object to the proposed system because it is sectional. If anybody will look at the system, they will see at once that it has a very unequal bearing upon the different sections of the Commonwealth. I trust, that we are not going to establish, or advocate a scheme of representation founded upon sectional preferences, or which gives one portion of the State great advantages over other portions. I do not intend to impute any intention of that kind, to any gentleman who favors this system; I do not mean to say, that the chairman of the Committee, (Mr. Griswold, for Erving,) living in a particular section of the Commonwealth, when he gave to that section two or three times the representation that other sections had, was governed by any other than the most honorable motives. I do not mean to impute anything of that sort, to any gentleman in this Convention. What I mean to say, is, that the system, as it is presented, is a sectional system, because it gives to one section of the Commonwealth much greater representation than it gives to another section; it gives to the north-western portion of the Commonwealth a much greater degree of power than it gives to the south-eastern portion. I say, therefore, that it assumes the character of a sectional representation.

By the Report of the Committee, the three north-western counties, viz.: Berkshire, Hampshire and Franklin, with a population of 114,115, have eighty-four representatives, while Bristol and Barnstable, with a population of 108,976, have thirty-nine representatives—less than one-half. Again, Bristol with 74,979 inhabitants, has twenty-six representatives, while Berkshire, with 48,937 inhabitants, has thirty-four representatives; and Barnstable, with 33,997, has thirteen representatives, while Franklin, with 30,888 inhabitants, has twenty-six, just twice as many. Is there not injustice in this? Is there nothing sectional in it? Again, the four western counties, with a population of 164,339, have one hundred and seven representatives, while the six south-eastern counties, with a population of 254,121, have ninety-three representatives. Thus, the six south-eastern counties, with more than one-quarter of the inhabitants of the State, have little more than one-fifth of the representatives, while the four western counties, with one-sixth of the population, have more than one-quarter of the representatives. But, I believe the inequality, injustice and geographical unfairness of the Report of the Committee, is so palpable, that it has been abandoned by its friends. And the gentleman from Lowell, (Mr. Butler,) has undertaken to remedy some of its defects. But, in this attempt, without correcting the wrong principles of the Report, he has abandoned the only correct one it had. He has somewhat mitigated the grossness of the inequality, but in doing it, has disfranchised, for a part of the time, the small towns.

The amendment contains the same sectional inequality and injustice. The evil is only mitigated, not cured. Bristol, with 75,000 inhabitants, has only twenty-nine representatives, while Franklin, with 30,000, has twenty-one, and Berkshire, with 50,000, (only two-thirds as many as Bristol,) has twenty-eight; Barnstable, with 34,000, has fourteen, and Franklin, with 30,000, has twenty-one, and Berkshire, with 50,000, has twenty-eight, just twice as many. Again, the three north-western counties, with 114,000 inhabitants, have sixty-nine representatives, while Norfolk and Bristol, with 162,000, have only fifty-nine, and Bristol and Barnstable, with 109,000, have only thirty-three representatives—less than one-half.

But, I will not pursue these details. I should exhaust your patience before I mentioned one-half the instances of inequality. They pervade the whole system. The distribution is entirely arbitrary and unjust. No principle governs it. What important object can be obtained by abandoning the great democratic principle of personal equality? It is impossible for me to see any. A most favorable opportunity is now presented to us, to establish our House of Representatives on a basis of equality, fairness, justice and political wisdom. Shall we improve or neglect it?

There is, Mr. President, another topic that seems to have some connection with the distribution of representative power, which I introduce with great reluctance. The Hoosac mountain presents a great barrier to the intercourse between a portion of this State and the State of New York and other parts of the Union. A level passage through this mountain is an object of intense desire to many. But it cannot be accomplished without recourse to the resources of the State.

This is a subject of all-absorbing interest to a portion of the State; and the representatives are so apportioned as to give to this section a very undue proportion. This necessarily presents the inference, that the system adopted had some reference to this particular local enterprise, which excites so deep a sectional interest. It so happens, that the portion of the State which is so anxious to accomplish this great sectional enterprise, in which the aid of the State is necessary, have had the peculiar good fortune to have assigned to them a very large representation. Those who have no interest in this question are represented much less than those who have a very deep interest in it; and, it is notorious, that the chairman of the Committee, (Mr. Griswold,) is not indifferent to this subject. I have said that I did not mean to impute any intentional wrong to that gentleman. I am not restrained by parliamentary rules, but by my own convictions. If I expressed such a sentiment I should belie my own feelings; but, I think, that the proposed system would not have been reported, if that gentleman had lived in another part of the Commonwealth. All that I mean to be understood to say is, that I believe that gentleman is in a greater or less degree liable to those influences which operate upon all of us. Had I been in his situation, perhaps I should have been influenced to a much greater extent than he is.

MR. GRISWOLD. This is not the first time that allusions have been made directly, or indirectly to the subject, which the gentleman from Taunton has just introduced, and I wish to say at this time that, so far as I am concerned, I disclaim being influenced in the slightest degree by any such considerations. No such consideration has had any influence upon my mind, and I can show, if I had the time, that it can have no reference whatever to that question. Nor do I believe, that any gentleman from the section of country which I represent, in part, is influenced by any such consideration as that to which the gentleman has referred.

I wish to say one thing more. I do not know to what proposition my learned friend from Taunton alludes as operating so favorably to the north-western part of the State—whether to the original Report of the Committee, or that of the gentleman from Lowell, (Mr. Butler).

MR. MORTON. I consider both of them as operating in the same way, but, although the original report was more unequal than the proposition now under consideration, yet, I consider the latter as violative of more principles than the former.

MR. GRISWOLD. I agree that so far as population is concerned, my proposition operates more favorably to some towns than to others; but, I am ready to maintain, anywhere, that the proposition now before the Convention, submitted by the gentleman from Lowell, operates with greater hardship upon the county which I represent, than it does upon any other county.

MR. MORTON. I meant to make no imputation upon the gentleman for Erving, because I have not a feeling in my heart unfavorable to him. He has disclaimed being influenced by improper considerations in any measure. That he thinks, that such is the case, I have no doubt; Because if he did feel any such influences he would discard them at once. But, Sir, there is no man in the community who is not influenced more or less by considerations of which he is wholly ignorant; and, all that I meant was, to say, that the facts as they occurred tend to lead to such a conclusion. I want to see the first man here, or anywhere else, who can truly say, that in no case does his interest or his desires, without his knowledge, bias or weigh upon his judgment. I doubt exceedingly whether such a one can be found.

Seeing that some question has been made about the application of the present system, I will attempt to go a little further than I intended, and see whether or not the county of Franklin is as well represented as the other counties. I am not certain that I understand the operation of the proposed system so well as the Report of the Committee; but I should like to state briefly the operation of both plans upon the different sections of the Commonwealth. Now, here is the county of Norfolk, with seventy-seven thousand inhabitants, is to have thirty representatives, while the county of Franklin, with thirty-one thousand inhabitants, is to have twenty-one representatives. Now, I ask the gentleman, whether there is any equality between these two counties in this respect?

Thirty-one thousand gives twenty-one representatives in one county, while seventy-seven thousand only gives thirty in another. The same thing applies to Bristol, which has in round numbers seventy-five thousand inhabitants and only twenty-nine representatives, which only gives a difference of eight, as compared with Franklin, although it has a population nearly three times as large. Whether this is equality is a matter of mathematics, which I suppose, every gentleman can determine for himself. Every voter in Franklin has, according to my arithmetic, more than double the representative power that a voter has in Bristol or Norfolk. Is this the hardship operating upon the county of Franklin of which the gentleman complains?

But what makes this system so much worse is a reference to its prospective operation. I suppose that our population is increasing all over the Commonwealth, but more rapidly in some sections than in others. And if the late learned secretary's tables are to be relied upon, we must have, at this time, in each of the counties of Bristol and Norfolk, a population three times as large as that of Franklin. I presume each of these counties now has a population of not less than ninety thousand, with only twenty-nine or thirty representatives, while Franklin, with thirty thousand, has twenty-one, and Berkshire, with fifty thousand, twenty-eight. With these facts staring us in the face, who can deny, or justify, this gross inequality of representation.

Then, again, there is another aspect of this question, to which I allude with reluctance, but it is one which it seems to me ought not to be excluded from our consideration. We have maintained, that taxation and representation should go together, by which I suppose, the least we can mean is, that all who are taxed should be equally represented, whether they are equally taxed or not. But, if you are going to depart from equality of representation, should those who pay the greatest or those who pay the least be the favored ones? I am opposed to any discrimination of any kind. I want a system of perfect equality; but, if we are to depart from equality of population, I can see no reason why the larger contribution should operate as a disqualification or degradation.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES. — MORTON.

Of the State tax of $300,000 lately imposed, the county of Franklin pays $6,000, while Bristol pays $20,000, and Norfolk still more. Again, it is well known that State taxes are of rare occurrence, and that our revenue is derived almost entirely from indirect taxation, of which our bank tax constitutes nearly the whole. Of this, Bristol pays annually $3,600, while Franklin pays only $600. I repeat, I would not depart from equality of population. But, I would suggest to those gentlemen who advocate a departure from this principle, and talk so much about compensation for inequality and injustice, whether the contributions to public expenses should not form one of the elements of their calculations?

Then, again, the inequality in the representation of towns is much more palpable and unjust than between counties and sections. The inhabitants of some towns have five, ten, or twelve times the weight that the same number have in some other towns. I should exhaust your patience did I attempt to mention one-half of the instances of gross inequality between towns. I will, therefore, refer only to a few. For instance, the town of Pawtucket is entitled to one representative, with a population of 3,876, while New Ashford, with a population of only 210, is entitled to six-tenths of a representative, giving any man in New Ashford eleven times the weight in the legislature which is possessed by my valuable and excellent friend from Pawtucket, (Mr. Tyler). I suppose that, in his generosity and benevolence, he may be willing to vote for this system, and concede that he is entitled to one-eleventh part as much weight as the gentleman from New Ashford. He may have a right to make this unjust concession for himself, but what power has he to agree that the vote of one farmer in New Ashford is of equal value to the votes of eleven of his constituents. He may undervalue himself, but he has no right to depreciate and degrade those who sent him here, and whom, on all other occasions, he has so ably and faithfully represented. If my friend will just step over into Seekonk, he will, the moment he is over the line, find that he is twice as much of a man as he was in his own town.

Take another illustration. The town of North Bridgewater has a population of 3,958, and is entitled to one representative, and yet, here is the town of Hull, with only 262 inhabitants, has six-tenths of a representative. There is a difference of nine to one; and, I would ask my friend from North Bridgewater, (Mr. Perkins,) whom we all respect, if he feels quite willing that he should have only one-ninth part of the influence of a fisherman at Hull? I do not mean to detract from these hardy, industrious men, nor from my friend from North Bridgewater; but, I want every man to have his just and equal share of political power.

I will refer to only one more illustration on this point. Nantucket, with 8,779 inhabitants, has three representatives, while Monroe, with only 242, has one representative six years in ten, which gives to a man in Monroe eight times as much representative weight as to a man in Nantucket. Will this satisfy the hardy, adventurous citizen of that island? Will the whaler, who, after an absence of four years, goes up to the polls to exercise this, to him, rare right, be content to be told that his vote for representative will weigh just one-eighth part as much as that of a man in some other town. Again, take those towns which are entitled to fractional representation, and do you find any equality among them? A town with two hundred and fifty inhabitants has just the same representation as a town of nine hundred and ninety. Is there any justice or principle of any kind in this?

Let my friend from Bernardston, the late lieutenant-governor, and my friend from Washington, (Mr. Eames,) answer this question. My friend from New Ashford, (Mr. Harmon,) has nearly four times the weight that either of them has, in the representative election. Does this meet their approbation, and do they wish to send out to the people for their adoption a system so fraught with inequality, and injustice, and mischief?

But, Sir, I will forbear from further details upon this point. I must, however, before leaving the subject, say a few words about the original Report.

This seemed to start with one principle, at least, which is indispensable to town representation, viz.: that every town should be represented. But the amendment having abandoned this has nothing to rest upon but an arbitrary rule. The absurd consequences to which this principle led, frightened its friends from its support; and, I am sorry to say, that they had not the courage to resort to the true principle, viz.: that of equal representation which is attainable only in districts.

But let us spend a few minutes in tracing the practical consequences of this principle of town representation. It not only renders necessary a multitudinous House, but surpasses in inequality and injustice even the rotten borough system of England. Let us compare a few towns. Quincy, with 4,958 inhabitants, had one representative, and New Ashford, with 210, one, which gave a man in New Ashford twenty-four times as much representative power as a man in Quincy.

Barnstable, with 4,805 inhabitants, had one representative, and Monroe, with 242 inhabitants, had the same, giving to a man in Monroe twenty times the weight of a man in Barnstable. A citizen of Barnstable who is a member of this Convention has avowed his support of the Report. Is he sure that he does full justice to his fellow-citizens, when he admits that it will require twenty of them to be equal to one citizen of Monroe?

Nantucket, with 8,779 inhabitants, had two representatives, while Hull, with 262 inhabitants, had one; giving to a man in Hull twenty times the weight that a man in Nantucket had. Yet a member of the Committee from Nantucket agreed to this Report. Will his constituents be satisfied with the estimate which he put upon them? Are they willing to put twenty of their citizens into the scale to balance one man in some other town,

I will refer to only one more town. Attleborough has 4,157 inhabitants, Monroe 242. They had just the same representation. This makes a man in Monroe weigh as much as nineteen men in Attleborough. Yet the representative of Attleborough was a member of the Committee, and agreed to the Report. In what scales did he weigh his fellow townsmen? I thought they were pure gold. But it would seem from this estimate of their representative, that they were nineteen-twentieths dross. Will they admit the baseness of their metal?

I will refer to no more single instances, although they are very numerous, but will present a few groups of towns. There are twelve towns having twelve representatives, and all of them but 4,808 inhabitants, while Barnstable, with 4,805, and Quincy, with 4,958, have but one each. There are ninety-six towns, with 74,312 inhabitants, which have ninety-six representatives, while Norfolk, Bristol, Barnstable, and Nantucket, with 195,000 inhabitants, have but eighty-nine representatives.

The inequality under the amendment should it be adopted, though not so great, will be monstrous. Its friends admit, that under it, less than one-third of the inhabitants of the State, may choose a majority of the House of Representatives. The House may have an important, perhaps, decisive agency in the election of governor, lieutenant-governor, attorney-general, treasurer, secretary and auditor. The representatives have especial care of the public purse. Under a House thus chosen, what security have we for our property, our liberty, or our personal rights?

Once more, Mr. President. I will refer to one more objection to the proposed system, and leave the subject. It seems to have reference to classes in the community, and to assume in the Convention, what in the legislature is called class legislation. The system operates with peculiar inequality upon different classes in the State. And, although the favored class may be called the most worthy, yet, the scheme of class legislation is not only wrong in principle, but peculiarly offensive and hateful to all the friends of equal rights.

A single glance at the statistical facts just named will show, that the system operates with great inequality and severity upon merchants, manufacturers, mechanics, fishermen and sea-faring men of all kinds. This class legislation may not have been intended. But it is the vice of the system. It is the necessary consequence of unequal representation. Those who reside in cities and large towns, including the above classes, and, perhaps, some others, fall victims to the system of town representation, while the rural districts gain the benefit of it. If we must have class legislation, I would prefer this to any other which has occurred to my mind. But, I detest the principle. I don't believe those who gain the unjust advantage desire it. The farmer loves justice too well to desire any partiality in his favor, over the merchant, the mechanic, or the sailor.

Mr. President, the whole system is full of inequality, iniquity and unrighteousness. It is arbitrary and unreasonable from beginning to end. It is founded on no principle. The basis of a wrong principle might be some recommendation. But it has not even that poor support. I cannot give my vote in its favor. If we cannot adopt some plan more equal, more just, and more in accordance with democratic principles, let us retain the old system, which we have now learnt is not the worst system that can be invented.

Sir, I have about done. I am sorry to have troubled the Convention so long, but the subject had impressed itself very strongly upon my mind. Upon a close examination of it, I am compelled to say, that the system now proposed is worse than the system under which we live. There are greater inequalities, greater injustice, and greater violations of principle than in the system which we came here to amend; and I am constrained to say, that with my present convictions, I cannot vote for it, either here or elsewhere.

I wish to make one single suggestion further, and then I will sit down; and that is, that I have a slight hope—it is but a slight one, I confess—that we may yet arrange some plan, so that, the people may settle it for themselves, and if there be any prospect of its being received with favor, I will propose such a plan at the proper time. I have done nothing, and will do nothing with the view of embarrassing the action of this body. I merely present such views as I have entertained, and feel thankful for the manner in which I have been heard.

To all systems that have yet been offered, I prefer the district system. It is said that the people will not receive it. It may be so; I will not discuss that point; but, I was about to say, that I think we can submit the matter to the people, without the violation of any principle, or the reconsideration of any vote that has been adopted. Having once had action on the amendment which I propose, I shall acquiesce in whatever is the decision of the Convention—but, I would inquire, whether there is not a mode in which we can submit the question which so much divides us, to the decision of the people? I think there is, and would suggest, that when the question of representation is presented to the people, it should be presented in the alternative. Let them say “yes” or “no” in reference to the amendment of the Constitution, and then let them express their preference between the district and the town system, and then should there be a majority in favor of making the amendment, let the system which shall receive the greatest number of votes, be the system adopted by the people. I again thank the Convention for the attention with which they have heard me.

Mr. SUMNER, for Marshfield. Mr. President, if the question under consideration were less important in its bearings, or less embarrassed by conflicting opinions, I should hesitate to break the silence which I have been inclined to preserve in this Convention. In taking the seat to which, while absent from the Commonwealth, in another sphere of duty, I had been unexpectedly chosen, I felt that it would be becoming in me—and that my associates here would recognize the propriety of my course—considering the little opportunities I had of late enjoyed to make myself acquainted with the sentiments of the people on proposed changes, especially in comparison with friends to whom this movement is mainly due—on these accounts, and also, on other accounts, I felt that it would be becoming in me to interfere as little as possible with these debates. To others, I have willingly left the part which I might have taken.

And now, when I think that since our labors began, weeks, even months, have passed, and that the term has been already reached, when, according to the just expectations and earnest desires of many, they should be closed, I feel that acts rather than words—that votes rather than speeches—at least such as I might hope to make—are needed here, to the end that the Convention, seasonably, and effectively completing its beneficial work, may itself be hailed as a Great Act in the history of the Commonwealth.

But the magnitude of this question justifies debate: and allow me to add, that the State, our common mother, may feel proud of the ability, the eloquence, and the good temper with which it has thus far been conducted. Gentlemen have addressed the Convention in a manner that would grace any assembly, which it has been my fortune to know, at home or abroad. Sir, the character of these proceedings gives us new assurance for the future. The alarmist, who starts at every suggestion of change, and the croaker, who augurs constant evil from the irresistible tendency of events, must confess, that there are men here, to whose intelligence and patriotism, under God, the interests of our beloved Commonwealth may be intrusted. Yes, Sir, Massachusetts is safe. Whatever may be the result even of the present important question—whichsoever scheme of representation may be adopted—Massachusetts will continue to prosper as in times past.

In the course of human history, two States, small in territory, have won enviable renown by their genius and devotion to freedom; so that their very names awaken echoes; I refer to Athens and Scotland. But Athens—even at Salamis, repelling the Persian host, or afterwards, in the golden days of Pericles—and Scotland, throughout her long struggles with England, down to the very act of Union at the beginning of the last century—were inferior, each of them, in population and in wealth, to Massachusetts at this moment. It belongs to us, according to our capacities, to see that this comparison does not end here. Others may believe that our duty will be best accomplished by standing still. I believe, that it can be completely done only by a constant incessant advance in all things—in knowledge, in science, in art, and lastly in government itself, destined to be the bright consummation, on earth, of all knowledge, all science, and all art.

And, now, Sir, in framing anew our Constitution, we encounter a difficulty which at its original formation in 1780, perplexed our fathers—which perplexed the Convention of 1820—which with its perplexities has haunted successive legislatures and the whole people down to this day—and which now perplexes us. This difficulty occurs in determining the representative system, and it arises mainly from the corporate claims of towns. From an early period, the towns in the State, both great and small, with slight exceptions, have sent one or more representatives to the legislature. In primitive days, when the towns were few and the whole population was scanty, this arrangement was convenient at least, if not equitable. But now, with the increased number of towns, and the unequal distribution of a large population, it has become inconvenient, if not inequitable. The existing system does not work well, and we are summoned to reform it.

And here, Sir, let me congratulate the Convention that, on this most important question, transcending every other, all of us, without distinction of party, are in favor of reform. We are all Reformers. The existing system finds no advocate on this floor. Nobody here will do it reverence. If the call of the Convention were not already amply vindicated—if there were doubt anywhere of its expediency, the remarkable concurrence of all sides in condemning the existing representative system shows that we have not come together without cause.

The Orders of the Day have been filled with the various plans offered to meet the exigency. Most of these aimed to preserve the corporate representation of towns; some of them, at least one from the venerable gentleman from Taunton, (Mr. Morton,) and another from the venerable gentleman from Boston, (Mr. Hale,) adopted an opposite system, hitherto untried among us, and proposed to divide the State into districts. And the question has been between these hostile propositions; and that is the question which I propose to consider, in the light of history and abstract principle, and also, with reference to present exigencies. I shall speak first of the origin and nature of the Representative System and its proper conditions under American institutions. And secondly, I shall endeavor to indicate the principles which may conduct us to a practical conclusion on the present occasion. In entering upon this service, at this late stage of the debate, I feel like a tardy gleaner in a well-traversed field; but I shall proceed.

I. And I begin with the origin and nature of the Representative System. This is an invention of modern times. In antiquity there were republics and democracies; but there was no Representative System. Rulers were chosen by the people, as in many Commonwealths; senators were designated by the king or by the censors, as in Rome; ambassadors or legates were sent to a federal council, as to the assembly of the Amphictyons; but, in no ancient State, was any body of men ever constituted by the people to represent them in the administration of their internal affairs. In Athens, the people met in public assembly, and directly acted for themselves in all questions, foreign or domestic. This was possible there, as the State was small, and the assembly at no time exceeded five thousand citizens,—a large town-meeting, or mass-meeting, we might call it,—not inaptly termed the “ferce democracy” of Athens.

But where the territory was extensive, and the population scattered and numerous, there could be no assembly of the whole body of citizens. To meet this precise difficulty, the Representative System was devised. By a machinery, so obvious that we are astonished it was not employed in the ancient commonwealths, the people, though scattered and numerous, are gathered, by their chosen representatives, into a small and deliberative assembly, where, without tumult or rashness, they may consider and determine all questions which concern them. In every representative body, properly constituted, the people are practically present.

Nothing is invented and perfected at the same time; and this system has been no exception to the rule. In England, where it reached its earliest vigor, it has been, and still is, anomalous in its character. The existing divisions of the country, composed of boroughs, cities, and counties, were summoned by the king's writ to send representatives, with little regard to equality of any kind, whether of population, of taxation, or of territory. Their existence as corporate units was the prevailing title. The irregular operation of the system, increasing with the lapse of time, provoked a cry for Parliamentary Reform, which, after a struggle of more than fifty years, ending in a debate which occupied the House of Commons more than fifty days, was finally carried; but, though many abuses and inequalities were removed, yet, the anomalous representation by counties, cities, and boroughs, was still continued. And this, Sir, is the English system.

Pass now, Sir, to the American system. I say American system, for to our country belongs the honor of first giving to the world the idea of a system, which, discarding corporate representation, founded itself absolutely on equality. Let us acknowledge with gratitude, that from England have come five great and ever memorable institutions, by which liberty is secured—I mean the Trial by Jury, the writ of Habeas Corpus, the Representative System, the Rules and Orders of debate; and lastly, that benign principle which pronounces that its air is too pure for a slave to breathe—perhaps the five most important political establishments of modern times. This glory cannot be taken from the mother country. But America has added to the Representative System another principle, without which it is incomplete, and which, in the course of events, is destined, I cannot doubt, to find acceptance wherever the Representative System is employed. I mean the principle of equality.

Here in Massachusetts, home of the ideas out of which sprung the Revolution, this principle had its earliest expression. And it is not a little curious that this very expression was suggested by the two evils of which we now complain—namely, a practical inequality of representation and a too numerous House. Let me furnish some details of its history.

In the earliest days of the Colony, while the number of freemen was small and gathered in one neighborhood, there was no occasion for any representative body. All could then meet as at ancient Athens, in public assembly; and in fact, they did so meet, and in this way discharged the duties of legislation. But as the freemen became scattered and numerous, it was found grievous to compel the personal attendance of the whole body, and, as a substitute therefor, the towns were directed, in 1634, to assemble in general court, by deputies. Here was the establishment of the Representative System in Massachusetts, which has continued, without interruption, down to our day. The size of the House and the relative representation of towns have varied at different times; but the great principle of representation—by which a substitute is provided for the whole body of the people—has been constantly preserved. Still a feeling has long prevailed, that the system had not yet received its final form, while, in more than vision, has been discerned that principle of equality which is essential to its completeness.

Among the acts of the first general court of the Revolution, was one passed in the summer of 1776, after the battle of Bunker Hill, "declaratory of the rights of the towns and districts to elect and depute a representative or representatives to serve for and represent them in the general court." By this act, all previous acts taking from towns and districts the right of sending a representative to the general court were repealed, and every town containing thirty qualified voters, was authorized to send a representative. The immediate consequence was the two evils to which I have already referred—namely, inequality of representation, and a too numerous House; but the whole number of representatives which aroused the complaints of that day, was two hundred and sixty.

These grievances were the occasion of a convention of delegates from the towns of Essex County, at Ipswich, April 25th, 1776, where a memorial to the legislature was adopted, which was afterwards presented and enforced at the bar of the House by John Lowell. In this remarkable document occurs the first development, if not the first proclamation, of the principle of equality in representation. Here, Sir, is the fountain and origin of an idea, full of strength, beauty and glory. Listen to the words of these Revolutionary fathers:—

"If representation is equal, it is perfect; as far as it deviates from this equality, so far it is imperfect, and approaches to the state of slavery; and the want of a just weight in representation is an evil nearly akin to being totally destitute of it. An inequality of representation has been justly esteemed the cause, which has, in a great degree, sapped the foundation of the once admired, but now tottering fabric of the British empire; and we fear that if a different mode of representation from the present is not adopted in this colony, our Constitution will not continue to the late period of time which the glowing heart of every true American now anticipates.

"We cannot realize that your honors, our wise political fathers, have adverted to the present inequality of representation in this colony, to the growth of the evil, or to the fatal consequences which will probably ensue from the continuance of it.

"Each town and district in the colony is, by some late regulations, permitted to send one representative to the General Court, if such town or district consists of thirty freeholders and other inhabitants qualified to elect; if of one hundred and twenty, to send two. No town is permitted to send more than two, except the town of Boston, which may send four. There are some towns and districts in the colony, in which there are between thirty and forty freeholders and other inhabitants qualified to elect only; there are others besides Boston, in which there are more than five hundred. The first of these may send one representative, the latter can send only two. If these towns as to property are to each other in the same respective proportion, is it not clear to a mathematical demonstration that the same number of inhabitants of equal property in the one town, have but an eighth part of the weight in representation with the other; and with what colorable pretext we would decently inquire."

Under the pressure of this powerful state paper the obnoxious law was repealed; but the evil was not remedied. Then followed the unsuccessful effort to make a Constitution in 1777, which failed partly through dissatisfaction with its disposition of this very question. The county of Essex was again heard in another document, now known as the "Essex Result," and, among the most able and instructive in our history, from which I take the following important words:—"The rights of representation should be so equally and impartially distributed, that the representatives should have the same views and interests with the people at large. They should think, feel, and act like them, and, in fine, should be an exact miniature of their constituents. They should be, if we may use the expression, the whole body politic, with all its property, rights and privileges, reduced to a smaller scale, every part being diminished in just proportion. To pursue the metaphor, if, in adjusting the representation of freemen, any ten are reduced into one, all the other tens should be alike reduced; or, if any hundred should be reduced to one, all the other hundreds should have just the same reduction." Mark well these words. Here is the Rule of Three, for the first time in history, applied to representation. This, Sir, is not the English system. I call it, with pride, the American system.

In another place the document proceeds as follows:—

"The rights of representation should also be held sacred and inviolable, and for this purpose, representation should be fixed upon known and easy principles; and the Constitution should make provision that recourse should constantly be had to those principles within a very small period of years, to rectify the errors that will creep in through lapse of time or alteration of situations."

It then distinctly proposes a system of districts, in words which I quote:—

"In forming the first body of legislators, let regard be had only to the representation of persons, not of property. This body we call the House of Representatives. Ascertain the number of representatives. It ought not to be so large as will induce an enormous expense to government, nor too unwieldy to deliberate with coolness and attention; nor so small as to be unacquainted with the situation and circumstances of the State. One hundred will be large enough, and perhaps it may be too large. We are persuaded that any number of men exceeding that, cannot do business with such expedition and propriety as a smaller number could. However, let that at present be considered as the number. Let us have the number of freemen in the several counties in the State; and let these representatives be apportioned among the respective counties, in proportion to their number of freemen.

"As we have the number of freemen in the county, and the number of county representatives, by dividing the greater by the less we have the number of freemen entitled to send one representative. Then add as many adjoining towns together as contain that number of freemen, or as near as may be, and let those towns form one district, and proceed in this manner through the country."

Mr. HALLETT, for Wilbraham, (interrupting). Will the gentleman state who was the author of that Essex paper.

Mr. SUMNER. Theophilus Parsons is the reputed author of the document known as the "Essex Result."

Mr. HALLETT. Yes, Sir, it was Theophilus Parsons who was the author of that, and John Lowell of the other, and good old Tory doctrines they are.

Mr. SUMNER. If these be Tory doctrines, I must think well of Toryism.

Mr. BIRD, of Walpole. The gentleman for Marshfield speaks of the basis of representation in one House. I should like to know what was the basis proposed at that time for the other branch?

Mr. SUMNER. Property, I believe. But, Sir, I put these inquiries aside. I do not concern myself with the authorship of these doctrines, or with the character of other doctrines with which they were associated in the minds of their authors. All this is irrelevant and unimportant. I refer to them in the history of the question and hasten on.

Sir, notwithstanding these appeals, sustained by unsurpassed ability, the American system failed to be adopted in the Constitution of 1780. The anomalous English system was still continued; but, as if to cover the departure from principle, it was twice declared that the representation of the people should be "founded on the principle of equality." This declaration still continues as our guide, while the irregular operation of the existing system, with its inequalities and large numbers, is a beacon of warning.

Following closely upon these efforts in Massachusetts, this principle found an illustrious advocate in Thomas Jefferson. In his Notes on Virginia, written in 1780, he sharply exposes the inequalities of representation, and, a short time afterwards, when the victory at Yorktown had rescued Virginia from invasion and secured the independence of the United Colonies, he prepared a draught of a Constitution for his native State, which, disowning the English System and recognizing the very principle that had failed in Massachusetts, expressly provided that, "the number of delegates which each county may send shall be in proportion to the number of its qualified electors; and the whole number of delegates for the State shall be so proportioned to the whole number of qualified electors in it, that they shall never exceed three hundred, nor be fewer than one hundred; and if any county be reduced in its qualified electors below the number authorized to send one delegate, let it be annexed to some adjoining county." This proposition, which is substantially The Rule of Three, was not adopted in Virginia. This State, like Massachusetts, was not yet prepared for such a charter of electoral equality; but it still stands as a monument at once of its author and of the true system of representation.

The American system, though first conceived in Massachusetts and recognized in Virginia, found its first practical exemplification only a few years later in the Constitution of the United States. By the Articles of Confederation each State was entitled to send to Congress not less than two, nor more than seven representatives, and in the determination of questions, each State had one vote only. This plan was rejected by the framers of the new Constitution; and, another, until then untried in the history of the world, was adopted. It was declared that "representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included in this Union, according to their respective numbers;" not according to property; not according to territory; not according to any corporate rights; but according to their respective numbers. And this system has continued down to our day, and will continue immortal as the Union itself. Here is the Rule of Three actually incorporated into the Representative System of the United States.

An attempt has been made to render this system odious, or at least questionable, by charging upon it something of the excesses of the great French Revolution. Even if this rule had prevailed at that time in France, it would be bold to attribute to it any such consequences. But it is a mistake to suppose that it was then adopted in that country. The republican Constitution of 1791 was not founded upon numbers only; but upon numbers, territory and taxation combined; a mixed system which excluded the true idea of personal equality. But at the peaceful—almost bloodless—revolution of 1848, under the lead of Lamartine, a National Assembly was convened on the simple basis of population, and one representative was allowed for every 40,000 inhabitants. Here again is the Rule of Three; but the idea originally came from our country.

Mr. HALLETT. Will the gentleman for Marshfield allow me to make one more inquiry?

Mr. SUMNER. Certainly.

Mr. HALLETT. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the Rule of Three was applied to representation in the United States?

Mr. SUMNER. I mean to say, that the representation in the lower House of Congress was apportioned according to numbers; and this is the Rule of Three. The gentleman has in mind, perhaps, the anomalous exception with reference to slavery.

Mr. HALLETT. No, Sir. I do not refer to that at all. The first apportionment of representation by congress, was made by applying the divisor of 30,000, which was the ratio of representation, to the whole population of the United States. That bill was vetoed by General Washington, upon the ground that the Constitution required that representation should be apportioned among the States according to their respective numbers, and that it did not allow of a numerical representation of all the people of the United States. I ask the gentleman if that rule was the Rule of Three?*

Mr. SUMNER. The learned gentleman is substantially right in his statement; but he will pardon me if I say, that it does not interfere with my proposition. The language of the Constitution is explicit; "representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers." This is the rule; I call it the Rule of Three. There are minor details in its operation, arising from slavery, and from the division into States, on which I do not dwell, as they do not interfere with its paramount principle, and I am admonished to proceed.

A practical question here arises, whether this rule should be applied to the whole body of population, including women, children and unnaturalized foreigners, or whether it should be applied to those only who exercise the electoral franchise; in other words, to voters. It is probable that the rule would generally produce nearly similar results, in both cases; as the voters, except in a few places, would bear a uniform proportion to the whole population. But it will be easy to determine what the principle of the Representative System requires. Since the object of the System is to provide a practical substitute for the meetings of the people, it should be founded in just proportion on the numbers of those who, according to our Constitution, can take part in those meetings; that is, upon the qualified voters. The representative body should be a miniature or abridgment of the electoral body; in other words, of those allowed to participate in public affairs. If this conclusion needs authority, it may be found in the words of Mr. Madison, in the Debates on the Federal Constitution. "It has been very properly observed," he says, "that representation was an expedient by which the meeting of the people themselves was rendered unnecessary, and that representatives ought, therefore, to bear a proportion to the votes which their constituents, if convened, would respectively have."—[Madison's Debates, vol. ii. p. 1103.]

* Mr. Hallett referred to Marshall's Life of Washington, vol. I. p. 217. "The Constitution of the United States declares that 'representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, not exceeding one for every thirty thousand.' The second, in 1792, passed an act which applied the number thirty thousand as a divisor to the total population of all the United States, and took the quotient, one hundred and twenty, as the whole number of representatives. President Washington vetoed the bill on the ground that the population of each State, and not the total population of the United States, must give the numbers, although, by the other process eight States were allotted more representatives than one for thirty thousand. This veto was sustained and a bill one for thirty thousand was passed. This was sustained and a bill one for every thirty-three thousand persons in each State."

The Rule of Three, then, applied to voters, seems to me sound; but whether applied to voters or population, it is the true rule of representation, and stands on adamant principles. In my view, it commends itself so obviously, so instinctively, to the natural reason, that I do not feel disposed to dwell upon it. But since it has been called in question, I shall be excused for saying a few words in its behalf. Its advantages present themselves in several aspects.

First. And I put in the front its constant and equal operation throughout the Commonwealth. Under it, every man will have a representative each year; and every man will have the same representative power as every other man. In this respect, it carries out a darling idea of our institutions, which cannot be disowned without weakening their foundations. It gives to the great principle of human equality a new expansion and application. It makes all men, in the enjoyment of the electoral franchise, whatever be their diversities of intelligence, of education, or of wealth, or wheresoever they may be within the borders of the Commonwealth, in small town or in populous city, absolutely equal at the ballot-box.

I know that there are persons, Sir, who do not hesitate to assail the whole doctrine of the equality of men, as enunciated in our Declaration of Independence, and in our Bill of Rights. In this work two eminent statesmen, of our own country, and of England, have led the way. But it seems to me, that if they had chosen to comprehend the meaning of the principle, much, if not all of their objection would have been removed. It is a palpable truth, that men are not born equal in physical strength or in mental capacities; in beauty of form or health of body. These mortal cloaks of flesh differ, as do these worldly garments. Diversity or inequality in these respects, is the law of creation. But as God is no respecter of persons, and as all are equal in his sight, whether rich or poor, whether dwellers in cities or in fields, so are all equal in natural rights; and it is a childish sophism—of which no gentleman in this Convention is guilty—to adduce in argument against them the physical or mental inequalities by which men are characterized. Now, I do not pretend to class the electoral franchise among those inherent, natural rights, which are common to the human family, without distinction of age, sex or residence; but I do say, that from the equality of men, which we so proudly proclaim, we may derive a just rule for its exercise. For myself, I accept this principle, and just so far and just so soon as possible, I would be guided by it in the system of representation. But there are other reasons still.

Secondly. The Rule of Three as applied to representation is commended by its simplicity. It supersedes all the painful calculations to which we have been driven, the long agony of mathematics as it was called by my friend over the way, (Mr. Giles,) and is as easy in its application as it seems to me to be just.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES. — SUMNER.

[July 7th.

Thirdly. This rule is founded in nature, and not in art; on natural bodies, and not on artificial bodies; on men, and not on corporations; on souls, and not on petty geographical lines. On this account it may be called a natural rule, and when once established, will become fixed and permanent, beyond all change or desire of change.

And, fourthly, this rule removes, to every possible extent, those opportunities of political partiality and calculation in the adjustment of the representation, which are naturally incident to any departure from precise rule. It was beautifully said of law by the greatest intellect of Antiquity, that it is mind without passion, and this very definition I would extend to a rule which, with little intervention from human will, applies absolutely to fixed numbers. The object of free institutions is, to withdraw all concerns of state, so far as practicable, from human discretion, and place them under the shield of determined principles, to the end, according to the words of our Constitution, that there may be a government of laws, and not of men. But, just in proportion as we depart from precise rule, it becomes a government of men, and not of laws.

Such considerations as these, thus briefly expressed, seem to vindicate this rule of representation. But let me not forget the arguments adduced against it. These have assumed two distinct forms; one is founded on the character of our towns and the importance of preserving their influence; the other is founded on the alleged necessity of counteracting the centralization of power in the cities. Now, of these in their order.

And, first, of the importance of preserving our towns. Sir, I yield to no man in appreciation of the good done by these free municipalities. The able member for Erving, (Mr. Griswold,) who began this debate, the eloquent member for Berlin, (Mr. Boutwell,) and my excellent friend of many years, the accomplished member for Manchester, (Mr. Dana,) in the masterly speeches which they have addressed to the Convention, have attributed no good influence to the towns which I do not recognize also. With them I agree, cordially, that the towns in Massachusetts, like the municipalities of Switzerland, have been schools and nurseries of freedom; and that in these small bodies, men were early disciplined in those primal duties of citizenship, which, on a grander scale, have been made the foundation of our whole political fabric. But, I cannot go so far as to attribute this remarkable influence to the assumed fact, that each town by itself was entitled to a representative in the legislative body. At the time of the Revolution, this was the prerogative of most towns, though not of all; but it cannot be regarded as the distinctive, essential, life-giving attribute. At most it was only an incident.

Sir, the true glory of the towns then was, that they were organized on the principles of self-government, at a time when these principles were not generally recognized; that each town by itself was a little republic, where the whole body of freemen were voters, with powers of local legislation, taxation, and administration, and, especially, with the power to choose their own head and all subordinate magistrates. Sir, the boroughs of England have possessed the power to send a member—often two members—to Parliament; but this has not saved them from corruption; nor has any person attributed to them, though in the enjoyment of this franchise, the influence which has proceeded from our municipalities. And the reason is obvious. They were organized under charters from the crown, by which the local government was vested—not in the whole body of freemen—but in small councils, or select classes, originally nominated by the crown, and ever afterwards renewing themselves. No such abuse prevailed in our municipalities; and this political health at home, Sir, and not the incident of exclusive representation in a distant legislature, has been the secret of their strength. This I would ever cherish.

And this brings me, in the next place, to the objection founded on centralization of power in the cities. It is said that wealth, business, population, and talent, in its multitudinous forms, all tend to the cities, and that the excessive influence of this concentrated mass, quickened by an active press, by facilities of concert, and by social appliances ought to be counterbalanced by an allotment to the towns of a representative weight beyond their proportion of numbers. Now, Sir, while confessing and regretting the present predominance of the cities, I must be permitted to question the propriety of the proposed remedy. And here, as I differ in some respects from friends on both sides, I make an appeal for a candid judgment of what I shall candidly say.

I would not be unjust to cities. But no student of history can fail to perceive that they have performed different parts at different stages of the world. In antiquity, they were the acknowledged centres of power, often of tyranny. But in the middle ages, they became the home of freedom, and the bridle to feudalism. For this service they should be gratefully remembered. And now there is another change. The armed feudalism is overthrown; but it is impossible not to see that it has yielded to a commercial feudalism, whose seat is in the cities, and which in its way, is hardly less selfish and exacting than the feudalism of the iron hand. My friend, the member for Manchester, (Mr. Dana,) was clearly right when he said, that the Boston of to-day was not the Boston of our fathers. But let me be understood. I make no impeachment of individuals; but simply indicate those combined influences proceeding from the potent Spirit of Trade—alas! how unlike that Spirit of the Lord, where is liberty!—which are not inconsistent with the most exalted individual worth. I think, while confessing the abounding charities of the rich men, whose eulogy we have heard more than once in this debate, it must be admitted that, those pure principles which are the breath of the republic, now find their truest atmosphere in calm retreats, away from the strife of gain, and the hot pavements of crowded streets. Sir, it is not only when we look upon the fields, hills and valleys, clad in verdure, and shining with silver lake or rivulet, that we may be ready to exclaim:—

“God made the country, and man made the town.”

But, Sir, while maintaining these opinions, I cannot admit the argument, that the centralized power of the cities may be counteracted by degrading them in the scale of representation. This cannot be purposely done without departing from fundamental principles, and without overthrowing the presiding doctrine of personal equality.

Cities are but congregations of men; and men exert influence in various ways; by the accident of position; by the accident of intelligence; by the accident of property; by the accident of birth; and, lastly, by the vote. It is the vote only which is not an accident; and it should be the boast of Massachusetts, that all men, whatever may be their accidents, are equal in their votes. [Here the hammer of the President fell, as the hour expired; but by unanimous consent, Mr. Sumner proceeded.] The idea of property as a check upon numbers, which, on a former occasion, found such favor in this hall, is now rejected in the adjustment of our Representative System. And, Sir, I venture to predict that the proposition, newly broached in this Commonwealth, to restrain the cities by a curtailment of their just representative power, will hereafter be as little regarded.

II. Mr. President, such is what I have to say on the history and principles of the Representative System, particularly in the light of American institutions, and this brings me to the practical question at this moment. I cannot doubt that the district system, as it is generally called, whereby the representative power will be distributed in just proportion, according to the Rule of Three, among the voters of the Commonwealth, is the true system, destined at no distant day to prevail. And, gladly, would I see this Convention hasten the day by presenting it to the people for adoption in the organic law. To this end I have striven by my votes. But, Sir, I am not blind to what has passed. The votes already taken show that the Convention is not prepared for this change, and I am assured by gentlemen more familiar with public sentiment than I can pretend to be, that the people are not yet prepared for it.

And thus, Sir, we are brought to the position occupied successively by the Conventions of 1780 and 1820, each of which, though containing warm partisans of the district system, shrank from its adoption; as in Virginia, the early recommendation of Jefferson, and his vehement support at a later day, have been powerless to produce this important amendment. John Lowell, who appeared at the bar of the Massachusetts legislature in 1776, to vindicate the principle of equality in representation, and Theophilus Parsons, the author of the powerful tract which proposed to found the Representative System on the Rule of Three, were both members of the first Convention; and, I know not if the district system has since had any abler defenders. To these I might add the great name of John Adams, who had early pleaded for equality of representation, and had declared in words adopted by the Essex Convention, that the Representative Assembly should be an exact portrait in miniature of the people at large.—(Works, Vol. iv., pp. 186, 195, 205.) In the Convention of 1820, the district system was cherished and openly extolled by a distinguished jurist, at that time a Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, Joseph Story, whose present fame gives additional importance to his opinions. And yet, the desire of these men failed. The corporate representation of towns was preserved, and the district system pronounced impracticable. In the address put forth by the Convention of 1780, and signed by its President, James Bowdoin, these words may be found:—

“You will observe that we have resolved that representatives ought to be founded on the principle of equality; but it cannot be understood thereby, that each town in the Commonwealth shall have weight and importance in a just proportion to its numbers and property. An exact representation would be unpracticable, even in a system of government arising from the state of nature, and much more so in a state already divided into nearly three hundred corporations."

The Convention seem to have recognized the theoretic fitness of an "exact representation;" but did not regard it as feasible in a State already divided into nearly three hundred corporations. In the Convention of 1820, Judge Story, who has been already quoted by my eloquent friend, (Mr. Choate,) used language which, though not so strong as that of the early address, yet has the same result:—

"In the select committee, I was in favor of a plan of representation in the House founded on population, as the most just and equal in its operation. I still retain that opinion. There were serious objections against this system, and it was believed by others that the towns could not be brought to consent to yield up the corporate privileges of representation which had been enjoyed so long, and were so intimately connected with their pride and their interests. I felt constrained, therefore, with great reluctance to yield up a favorite plan. I have lived long enough to know, that in any question of government, something is to be yielded up on all sides. Conciliation and compromise lie at the origin of every free government; and the question never was, and never can be, what is absolutely best, but what is relatively wise, just and expedient. I have not hesitated, therefore, to support the plan of the select committee as one that, on the whole, was the best that, under existing circumstances, could be obtained."

Sir, I am not insensible to these considerations, nor to the authority of these examples. A division of the State into districts would be a change, in conformity with abstract principles, which would interfere with the existing opinions, habits and prejudices of the towns, all of which must be respected. A change, so important in its character, cannot be advantageously made, unless supported by the permanent feelings and convictions of the people. Institutions are formed from within, and not from without. They spring from custom and popular faith, silently operating with internal power, and not from the imposed will of a law-giver. And our present duty here, at least on this question, may be, in some measure, satisfied, if we aid this growth.

Two great schools of jurisprudence, for a while, divided the learned mind of Germany; one known as the Historic, and the other as the Didactic. The question between them was similar to that now before the Convention. The first regarded all laws and institutions as the growth of custom, under the constant influences of history; the other insisted upon giving to them, by positive legislation, a form in conformity with abstract reason. It is clear that both were, in a measure, right. No law-giver or statesman can disregard either history or abstract reason. He must contemplate both. He will faithfully study the Past, and will recognize its treasures and traditions; but, with equal fidelity he will set his face towards the Future, where all institutions shall, at last, be in harmony with truth.

I have been encouraged to believe in the practicability of the district system, by its conformity with reason, and by seeing how naturally it went into operation under the Constitution of the United States. But there is a difference between that case and the present. A new government was then founded, with new powers, applicable to a broad expanse of country; the Constitution of Massachusetts was little more than a continuation of pre-existing usages and institutions, with all dependence upon royalty removed. This distinction may help us now. If the country were absolutely new, with no embarrassments from existing corporate rights—claims I would rather call them—it might easily be arranged, according to the most approved theory, as Philadelphia was originally laid out by its great founder, on the model of the German city which he had seen in his youth. But to bring our existing system into symmetry and to lay it out anew, would seem to be a task—at least I am reluctantly led to this conclusion by what I have heard here—not unlike that of rebuilding Boston, and of shaping its compact mass of crooked streets into the regular rectangular forms of the city of Penn. And yet this is not impossible. With each day, by demolishing ancient houses and widening ancient ways, changes are made, which tend to this result.

Sir, we must recognize the existing condition of things, remedy all practical grievances, so far as possible, and set our faces towards the true system. We must act in the Present; but be mindful also of the Future. There are proper occasions for compromise, as most certainly there are rights which are beyond compromise. But the Representative System is an expedient or device, for ascertaining the popular will, and though well satisfied that this can be best founded on numbers, I would not venture to say, in the present light of political science, that the right of each man to an equal representation, according to the Rule of Three and without regard to existing institutions or controlling usages, is of that inherent and lofty character—like the God-given right to life or liberty—which admits of no compromise.

Several grievances exist, which will be removed by the proposed amendments. There is one which I had hoped would disappear, but which is the necessary incident of corporate representation; I mean the unwieldy size of the House.

It is generally said, that a small body is more open to bribery and corruption than a large body; but, on the other hand, I have heard it stated, that the larger is more exposed than the smaller. I put this consideration aside. My objection to a large House is, that it is inconvenient for the despatch of public business. There is a famous saying of Cardinal de Retz, that every assembly of more than one hundred, is a mob; and Lord Chesterfield applied this same term to the British House of Commons. This body, at present, nominally has six hundred and fifty-five members. It is called, by Lord Brougham, "preposterously large;" but a quorum for business is forty only; and it is only on rare occasions of political importance, that its benches are completely occupied. The House of Lords, nominally, has four hundred and forty-seven members; but a quorum in this body consists of three only; and much of its business is transacted in a very thin attendance.

The experience of Congress, and also of other States, points to a reduction of our present number. Indeed, for many years, this was a general desire through the State. In the earliest colonial days, every town was allowed three deputies; but in five years the number, on reaching thirty-three, was reduced to two for each. At a later day, in 1694, a great contest in the House was decided by a vote of twenty-six against twenty-four. In the agitating period between 1762 and 1773, covering the controversies which heralded the Revolution, the House contained about 110; only on one occasion, the magnitude of the interest is said by Governor Hutchinson to have drawn together 130. At the last session of the provincial legislature, in May, 1774, when the revolutionary conflict was at hand, the complete returns of the journals show 140; and in 1776, there was a House of 260. But this "enormous and very unwieldy size," as it was then called, was assigned as a reason for a new Constitution. I regret that we cannot profit by this experience. A House of 250, or, since we are accustomed to large congregations, of 300 at most, would be an improvement on the present system.

But, there are two proposed improvements which I hail with satisfaction; one relates to the small towns, and the other to the cities. The small towns will have a more constant representation, and this of itself is an approach to the true principle of representation, which should be constant as well as equal. The cities will be divided into districts, and this I regard of two-fold importance—first, as the beginning of a true system; and secondly, as reducing the power, which the cities, by the large number of their representatives, chosen by general ticket, now exercise.

A respected gentleman, now in my eye, has reminded me that in his boyhood, his attention was arrested in this House by what was called the Boston seat, reserved exclusively for the Boston members, who sat together, on cushions, while other members were left to such accommodations as they could find on bare benches. This discrimination ceased long ago. But it seems to me that this reserved and cushioned seat is typical of another discrimination, which Boston, in common with the cities, still enjoys. Sir, in voting for forty-four representatives, the elector in Boston exercises a representative power transcending far that of electors in the country; and the majority which rules Boston and determines the whole delegation, exercises a representative power transcending far that of any similar number in the Commonwealth. This is apparent on the bare statement, as forty-four sticks are stronger in one compact bundle, than when apart or in small parcels. Thus, while other counties are divided, the delegation from Boston is united. In all political contests, it is like the well-knit Macedonian phalanx, or the iron front of the Roman legion, in comparison with the disconnected, individual warriors, against whom they were matched. But this abuse is to be removed; and here is the beginning—I had almost said the inauguration—of a true electoral equality in our Commonwealth.

And now, in conclusion, while thanking gentlemen for the kind attention with which they have honored me, let me express briefly the result to which I have come. I have openly declared my convictions with regard to the district system, and in accordance with these, have recorded my votes in this Convention. These votes, which reveal my inmost desires on this matter, I would not change. But the question is not now between the district system, which I covet so much for Massachusetts, and the proposed amendments; but between these amendments and the existing system. On this issue I decide without hesitation. I shall vote, Sir, for the propositions of amendment now before the Convention, should they come to a question on their final passage; not because they are all that I desire; not because they seem to satisfy the requirements of principles which I cannot deny; not because they constitute a permanent adjustment of this difficult question; but, because, they are the best which I can now obtain; because they reform grievances of the existing system; and, because, they begin a change, which can end only in the establishment of a Representative System, founded in reality, as in name, on equality. Their adoption will be a triumph of conciliation and harmony, and will furnish new testimony to the well-tempered spirit of our institutions,

"Where jarring interests, reconciled, create
The according music of a well mixed State."

On motion, the Convention adjourned until three o'clock.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The Convention reassembled at 3 o'clock, and resumed the consideration of the unfinished business of the morning, viz.: the resolves on the subject of

The Basis of Representation,

The question being on the final passage.

Mr. BOUTWELL, for Berlin. I expressed the intention this morning to speak upon this question; but, I have all along felt some doubt whether I ought again to ask the attention of the Convention to the subject of representation. The position of affairs has been somewhat changed within the last week. The subject has assumed a more definite character, and the Convention, if I understand the nature of the votes which have been taken, has declared that it is in favor of town representation as against the district system. I suppose that there still exists, however, in the minds of many gentlemen here, some doubt as to the expediency of continuing the principle of the existing system; and that doubt arises from two sources, so far as I can understand. One is the alleged, and to some extent, admitted, inequality of municipal representation; and the other is the size of the House, which is a necessary result of a continuance of that system. Now, then, as it regards the first point, that of inequality, I believe that every proposition which has here been submitted, that can in any sense be considered a practical proposition, for a division of the State into districts, has also admitted this inequality, not precisely the same in degree, but the same in kind, that exists in the municipal system; because it will appear, whenever we make the subject of districting the State for the election of representatives a practical matter, that it is to be done by steps. We shall be compelled to recognize the principle and the doctrine which I asserted the other day, that it is the part of wisdom to accept existing institutions as the basis of new ones. In districting the State, therefore, we shall have to abandon, in some degree, the doctrine or theory of the equality of men, politically speaking. We shall take the step suggested by the gentleman from Taunton, (Mr. Morton,) in the first place, and recognize the counties as the lines and grounds of a division of the State, for the purpose of establishing within those lines the minor representative districts; and thus it has happened in all the other States whose Constitutions are at all analogous to our own. I instanced the State of Louisiana the other day as an example, where they took the existing county lines, and within those county lines divided the State into districts for the election of representatives. The very first proposition avowed by the friends of the district system is, that town lines are not to be disturbed—I mean small towns, those of which two or more are formed into one representative district. It will then happen that there will be inequality in the district system, as we confess that there is and must be in the municipal system of representation. Of course it is understood, that as a principle, I am in favor of municipal representation; but I have a word to say to the friends of the district system by way of ascertaining the extent of the inequality which the proposed measure will work out. For a moment, then, I stand and discuss this subject just as I would discuss it were I a district man, with a view to the inequality of the measure before us, as regards different sections in the Commonwealth, considered with reference to their political rights and political power. I thank the gentleman who represents Marshfield, (Mr. Sumner,) for what he uttered this morning, corresponding with an observation made the other day by the gentleman from Taunton, together establishing the proposition that legal voters stand in the same place now that freemen did in colonial and provincial times, as the proper basis of representation. They are the electors of the representative body, which should be an epitome or miniature of the electoral body. Now this proposition, to which I assent, speaking as a district man, argues necessarily the exclusion of political power from three classes of persons, generally considered, viz.: children, women and unnaturalized foreigners. I do not know that it is necessary for me to state the reasons in detail with regard to one or the other of these classes, why they should be excluded; but, I have this observation to make. The law does not create principles nor often institutions; it recognizes those which exist, and when it has done that, it has done all that it is usually in the power of law to do. Therefore, I take it to be in accordance with the well settled principles of natural right that these three classes are excluded from a direct participation in government. In regard to the first class, children,—I need say but one thing; the law only determines the time when minority shall cease—the fact of minority comes from nature, and the fact that an individual shall attain to majority, also comes from nature. All that legislation can do is, to step in and determine, arbitrarily, when that moment shall arrive. Nature, not law, excludes children from a participation in government; the law determines when they shall take part, from which, by nature rather than law, they are for a period excluded. This class, then, is to be regarded as not of the people, in a political sense.

I come now to the next class, and it may be that in speaking of them—I do not see my friend from Brookfield, (Mr. Greene,) here—I am approaching dangerous ground, when I say that women are to be excluded from a direct participation in political affairs. And why? Is this a mere ordination of law? No, Sir! Their exclusion is founded upon a principle recognized in nature. You may make whatever laws you please; but you cannot escape from the ordination of nature, any more than this planet on which we are can move from the orbit in which the Creator of the universe has placed it. The family relation is a relation established by nature. Neither history nor tradition informs us of a time when that relation did not exist. And what is the character of the family government? It is a government established by nature, and one from which no community, partaking in any degree of the principles of civilization, can escape. It is a government, neither more nor less; and like every other government it has a head. Having a head, it can have but one will; and the man, who, by nature, is placed at the head of that government, is the only authorized exponent of that will. I say that in theory and as a matter of fact, a family has but one will, and, therefore, neither any moral or political power is gained by the expression of individual opinion, either by children or women. If it were possible for women to participate directly in the affairs of government, it would be a violation of the general rule, that the will of the whole family is represented by the man, who is the head of the family. Politically speaking, therefore, woman has no right to be directly consulted in public affairs. I say this, and I take to myself credit for courage in saying it. [Laughter.] I am, however, past political fortunes of any sort.

Now, with regard to the third class, or unnaturalized foreigners, I will say that the law determines the nature and the extent of their exclusion from public affairs, but it does not create it; because the first idea of government which we have, is that somebody owes allegiance to it. The very existence of a government presupposes individuals owing allegiance to that government. This follows as a matter of course, from the nature of civilized society. Every-body owes allegiance to some government, and nobody can pay his allegiance to more than one government at the same time. Now, the object of the law is, to ascertain when the allegiance of an individual, who was born in one country, ceases to the government of that country, and when it commences with regard to the government of another country. The law comes in here—I am not going to say whether it comes in exactly at the right time or not—whether too soon or too late—but the law determines that at a certain time, and under a certain condition of things, the allegiance of a person born in another country ceases to that country, and commences in this. Therefore, until the moment shall arrive that the allegiance of a person born in a foreign country ceases to that country, and commences here, he has no right, politically speaking, to be consulted in the administration of public affairs.

Therefore, then, standing as a district man, for this moment, I agree entirely in the doctrine that the principles of nature, the principles of reason, and the general usage of civilized countries, make an exclusion of all from a participation in government, except free men and legal voters.

Now we have a representative system in Massachusetts, composed of two parts,—the Senate

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.—BOUTWELL.

[July 7th.

ities of a war, in horrors unequalled in the history of this country. A war brought on, not by the policy of Massachusetts, but by the policy of the colony of New Plymouth. I speak this here, because, I do not agree to the remark of the gentleman from Taunton, (Mr. Morton,) that there is doubt whether Plymouth is a part of the State. The "Old Colony" loses seven, and the loss is in Plymouth County. But the five western counties—Worcester, Hampden, Hampshire, Franklin, and Berkshire, gain nearly eleven representatives. This, Mr. President, is the result, and, I believe, the accurate result.

Mr. LORD, of Salem. If I understand the gentleman, his calculations are based upon the fact, that one senator is equal to ten representatives, in political power, and therefore, in comparing Franklin with Suffolk, he says, that inasmuch as Suffolk is to have six senators, and Franklin only two, the difference being four, in order to effect his theory of equality, Franklin must have forty representatives to match them.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Certainly not.

Mr. SCHOUER, of Boston. The gentleman says that the political power in the Senate is ten times stronger than in the House. That is, that one senator is, in political power, equal to ten representatives.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Yes.

Mr. SCHOUER. Then I ask if, in the election of a United States senator, there should be one majority in the Senate in favor of one man, and nine majority in the House for another man, whether the Senate's favorite would be elected? He certainly would if one Senator is equal in point of political power to ten representatives.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I take it, if a candidate for the United States Senate fail by one majority in the Senate, he would be just as badly off as if he failed by nine in the House.

Mr. SCHOUER. Well, I should say so, too.

Mr. BOUTWELL. The action of the two branches of the legislature must be concurrent. Each has a negative upon the other, and I mean to say that, considered in this point of view, one senator will be equal in power to ten representatives. I take it, that this is a plain proposition in politics, mathematics or ethics. But, I am considering, not the power of the senators or representatives individually, but, I am considering the power of the people of this Commonwealth in their election of senators and representatives. And, therefore, I say, that when you give to the county of Suffolk, in consequence of the Senate being based upon population, one more senator than she would have been entitled to upon the basis of legal voters, that there should be some compensation for that excess somewhere; that is what I say. There can be no equal representative system, if the House is to be based upon voters, unless there be this compensation. This is the ground on which I stand. If, in consequence of the basis of the Senate, there are particular localities which have more power in that body than they are entitled to upon a basis of voters, then the other portions of the Commonwealth, should be compensated for their loss by a corresponding excess of power in the House of Representatives. That is the only correct principle upon which you can act under the existing circumstances. If you want the House of Representatives apportioned in exact and equal parts among the different counties of the Commonwealth, then you must go back and base your Senate also upon voters, and not put the Senate upon population, and the House upon electors.

But, passing by the considerations which I have suggested in regard to the constitution of the Senate, and the House, I have to ask those gentlemen who favor the district system, if, after all, this is not a reasonably equal system as regards the voters of the Commonwealth? We acknowledge that it is not mathematically equal in all the sections and localities of the State; how unequal we cannot say; but, I submit, that between the respective counties—upon the doctrine of compensation, which we maintain is the only just doctrine you can adopt—this system is, on the whole, reasonably equal. We are not to consider the House of Representatives alone, nor are we to consider the Senate alone, but in connection with each other. The Senate is equal in power with the House. It seems to me, that running through the entire discussion upon this subject, in Committee of the Whole and in Convention, gentlemen have thought and spoken in relation to the House of Representatives, as though, it, of itself, is the government.

We do not deny that this is a perplexing question. I am very well aware, that as the population of the State increases, and as it collects round a given point more and more, the difficulty of its settlement will also increase. How the problem is finally to be solved, I cannot foresee. We are not here to-day to settle this question for all-coming time. The system of representation has been changed in Massachusetts in the past, and doubtless, it will be changed in the future. But so far as the district system is concerned, I will not invite it. If it comes I will yield to it, and that is the most I will do. But there is nothing new in this matter. We see it in the proceedings of the Essex Result of 1778, alluded to by the honorable gentleman for Marshfield, this morning. We see it brought up again in the Convention which framed the Constitution of 1780, and it again appeared in the Convention of 1820. But on none of these occasions did it meet the concurrence of a majority of either of those bodies; and why? Because our fathers who framed the Constitution of 1780, and the men who framed the amendments of 1820 acted upon the principle, that it was better to accept existing institutions when they were founded in justice, than to seek for new ones. Therefore, in 1780, although they declared the principle of equality they accepted corporate representation.

I had occasion, a few days ago, to say, that I thought our municipal institutions were the life of the State—and that their right of representation was to them a vital element. Now, Sir, I am aware, that it is not possible either for me, or anybody else, to say, that this proposition is absolutely true, and I am, therefore, willing thus far, to qualify the assertion. But then, I think our history all along shows that through these municipal institutions our people were educated to meet, and successfully meet, the exigencies to which they were called. If there are doctrines of patriotism and liberty asserted in the Declaration of Independence, or in the Constitution of this government, that are immortal and destined to live when the names even of their authors shall be forgotten, so upon the pages of our town histories are sentiments and principles equally worthy of immortality. It is there that you find the doctrines contained in the Declaration of Independence; and it shall be to their name and fame forever, that, when the continental congress on the 4th day of July, 1776, sent forth to the world the Declaration of Independence, that document was placed upon the records of these little municipalities, and the people all pledged themselves to maintain the cause of the country. And, Sir, it is—I will venture to repeat what I have said elsewhere—it is upon the records of one of these little towns that you will find the first distinct declaration in favor of an American republic. Twenty days before the Declaration of Independence, while even Maryland hesitated whether she would endorse the doctrines of that Declaration, one of the towns of Massachusetts declared that they should be unjust to themselves and to posterity, if they did not seek to establish an American republic; a proposition which at that moment had no other abiding place on this continent. And all along in the history of our municipalities, we find that they have taken the lead in the assertion of free principles.

Now, Sir, it may be that a system of representation which has existed here for two hundred years, has had nothing to do with this; but, I have read history all wrong, and the records of the country all wrong, if it has not had something to do with the existence and development of these principles.

Sir, my friend from Boston, (Mr. Crowninshield,) whom I do not now see in his seat, asked the other day what he should say to his constituents with regard to this basis of representation. I say, Sir, that even if the system is unjust as regards the city of Boston—and we hold, that it is not—they put the political power just where it was in 1775 and 1776, when the proceedings of a town-meeting in Boston were law to the State.

My friend from Charlestown, (Mr. Frothingham,) will agree, that had the town governments not existed, the siege of Boston, would not have been raised on the eleventh of March, if that was the day, in the year 1776. Sir, men who look with indifference on the domestic questions which agitate us, have been attracted by the character of our municipal institutions, and it may be, that they are better able than we to judge them. It has often happened in constitutional history, in general history, and in fine, in every department of life and literature, that men who, at the first view, would appear unable to judge the institutions, of which they wrote, have, after all, sent forth the wisest observations and come to the best results. I may refer to the history of the American Revolution, by Botta, to D' Lohme's Treatise on the British Constitution, to D' Tocqueville's Observations on America.

It was in my mind, the other day, to read an extract from a letter written by Bonaparte, upon the Swiss municipal institutions, in which he presents, with much clearness, their character and value. If I mistake not, his words will convey a right idea to the minds of those who may be willing to attend to them. And Bonaparte, from the first, until he found the Swiss mercenaries in the armies of his enemies, was a friend and admirer of Switzerland. Upon a proposition to abolish the system of cantons, he says:—

"These little democracies have been the cradle of your liberty; it is they that distinguish Switzerland from the rest of the world, and render you

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES. — BOUTWELL.

[July 7th.]

country so very interesting in the eyes of Europe. Without them, you would be like the rest of the continent, you would bear no characteristic sign: mark well the importance of this, it is the peculiar features of your ancient democracies which make you appear unlike any of the modern States, and which, thereby, preclude the idea of confounding and incorporating you with the neighboring countries. I know that the system of those little republics has its inconveniences, that it does not, perhaps, stand the test of reason; but, after all, it has been established for centuries; it has originated in the nature of the country, the climate, the wants, the primitive habits of the people: it suits the peculiarities of the soil, and we must not pretend to be right in spite of necessity.

"The institutions of the little cantons may be unreasonable, but they are established by long and still popular customs."

That is, what I submit here, to the friends of the district system. They still "pretend to be right in spite of necessity."

I will venture, too, to read an extract from a work upon the Constitution of Holland, by Davies, which, I suppose, is good authority. He says:—

"The Constitution of Holland is particularly worthy of observation, as carrying out to an extent greater than that of any other nation, the system of municipal government: a system, which, whatever its defects, contributes, perhaps, more than any modification of civil polity with which we are hitherto acquainted, to promote the civilization, happiness and freedom of society; and which, although it may be better adapted to the wants of a rising, than to the habits of a long established community, has yet been found so beneficial to mankind in every variety of climate and situation, and to accommodate itself so admirably to people of totally opposite religions, laws, morals and manners, that the rulers of every country would do well to pause long, and consider carefully, before they abandon it."

He further says:—

"The municipal system of government, which for so many centuries prevailed in the United Provinces, has been remarked upon as tending to disunion, since attaching its subjects primarily to their own town or province, it caused them sometimes to overlook, in their anxiety for its interest, the interest of the whole. But in circumstances where all were bound together by one strong tie, where the same powerful impulse directed the movement of all in unison, it went far towards rendering them invincible. Accustomed to self-government, the burghers depended in nothing upon the direction or influence of a central power, but adopted upon their own authority and their own responsibility such measures as the exigencies of the case required."

Another advantage of the proposed system, in contradistinction to the district system, is that it distributes the political power of the State among all classes and interests of society. The question before us to-day is not, to be sure, between the district system and the system which has been reported to us from the Committee of the Whole, for the Convention has already decided by a large vote that it will not adopt the former. But the question is between the system reported to us from the Committee of the Whole and that now in existence. This is the only practical question. Now, Sir, by the system in existence, in 1870 more than two hundred towns of this Commonwealth will have only a fractional representation. I do not pretend that by the system we propose, each part of the country will have an exact distribution of political power in proportion to its population; and the country may even have a larger representation than the cities; but I will suggest whether it may not be well to temper the vivacity and energy of the cities with the slowness or dullness, even, if you will, of country life?

Something has been said, by way of refutation of the statement, that there is a tendency to a centralization or aggregation of power in particular localities. Some gentlemen have imagined that the comparative increase of the cities from 1850 to 1860 would not be so great as from 1840 to 1850. Hence, they infer that there is less reason to preserve municipal representation, and assert at the same time that the attachment of the people to it is diminished.

I feel, that this doctrine of municipal representation is not weaker than it was twenty-five years since; and even, that the time is not far distant when some of the new States may adopt it, for it is in the very nature of American society and civilization that municipal institutions should spring up. Of course, in the new States, which have a large extent of territory and only a very scanty population, it was not possible to establish municipal institutions and base representation upon them, and hence we have, in some of them, representation by single counties, and in others representation by an aggregation of counties. After all, an analysis of every system of representation in this country will exhibit great inequalities, whether you regard population or voters, and while I have showed by the process which I have taken, and which, I believe, to be a just one, that there is a variation of but little more than two per centum with us, it will happen that in many of the States of this Union which are looked to for a precedent which we are to follow, the inequality is much greater. I venture to instance the State of Tennessee, to whose constitution I have given some attention. But to come back to the idea I had in my mind, that there is a tendency to aggregation and population in the cities which is likely to continue for a considerable period of time. The city of Worcester is before me at this moment, and her population since 1850 has gone up from a little less than 16,000 to 21,000, showing that there is to be an increase of population there quite equal to any which has taken place in this Commonwealth. Nor do I despair even of the city of Boston. Some gentlemen thought the other day, that Boston was about full with her population of 138,000. I have a word to say in reference to the capacity of Boston. She has three square miles and four hundred and eighty acres, not including certain public lands of which gentlemen who have had seats in the legislature may know something. She has upon one square mile 99,000 inhabitants. The city of London has about 140,000 to the square mile. Gentlemen who are good in mathematics—and I commend the problem to my friends who have been engaged in calculations upon the district system—will find that Boston has capacity enough to accommodate over half a million of people. Massachusetts has about 125 inhabitants to the square mile. The fact whether Massachusetts is to increase rapidly or not, depends upon certain influences. One of these is the demand for her manufactured articles. Political economy is not with me a favorite science, but I understand that where there is a demand for an article existing in one part of the world, and the ability to supply it in another, manufactures and commerce follow as a matter in course. Now, in the last five years, or eight, at the farthest, we have had opened to the view of the commercial and political world the Eastern hemisphere, with its four or five hundred millions of people. They have just now been invited to accept the products of the manufacturing industry of this country. They accept those products, and no man can estimate the demand which will be thus created; and, I venture to say, that the capacity of the machinery of this country is not equal to it; and even the slave-labor of the south may be inadequate to produce the necessary supply of cotton. Where is this demand so likely to be met as in Massachusetts? Industry, commerce and wealth revolve around a centre, and that centre is intelligence, because intelligence is necessary to the production of machinery, and machinery is necessary for the production of manufactured goods. At this moment not one-tenth part of the labor of the world is manual labor. It is the intellect producing machinery that enables this age of the world to meet the wants and the demand of civilization. Such is the demand that exists for the products of industry, that human hands, without the intellect which produces machinery, would be totally inadequate for the supply. Massachusetts, then, we take to be the central point, intellectually, around which the manufacturing industry, the commercial power and wealth of the world are soon to revolve, and, therefore, there will be a demand for labor in Massachusetts in the next decennial period such as has not been experienced here or anywhere else.

Here the hammer fell. (Cries of "Go on! go on!")

THE CHAIRMAN. If there is no objection, the gentleman for Berlin will be allowed to proceed.

MR. BOUTWELL, (resuming). From whence can come the supply of labor to meet this demand? Although this is something of a deviation from the strict line of argument which I had intended to pursue, I think it bears upon the point. One cause that operated to force laborers from Ireland to this country has ceased to exist; but the social influence which is so strong in that race, is yet a powerful inducement with them to come to this comparatively sterile land. Germany at this moment takes the lead of Ireland in sending her industrious population here. But it is not to Ireland and Germany that we must look for the industrial population that will supply this demand; but, to a part of the world with which we have had but little intercourse in the past. I refer to China; and shall ask the indulgence of the Convention while I read a letter which I have received from a representative of that country, who has been in America six or seven years, and is now a resident at New Haven. I read it because I think it is calculated to throw some light upon the question of the population of Massachusetts, which is, after all, an element in the consideration of this subject.

"YALE COLLEGE, NEW HAVEN, }
June 30th, 1853.

"Your first inquiry is: 'The probable emigration from China to this country.' For my part I consider Chinese emigration to the western part of this great continent to be not only a probable thing, but also a moral certainty. In the first place the increase of commerce and the rapidity of commercial intercourse between this government and China are alone sufficient, (if there are no other causes at work,) to draw the Chinese out of their everlasting confinement, and plant them on American soil. What commerce has done in other places, respecting Chinese emigration, commerce will (and has already) accomplished in relation to Chinese emigration to this country. There are thousands of Chinese in India, resident merchants in the principal cities of that country. In the East Indian Archipelago the inhabitants are nearly half Chinese. Even in the Island of St. Helena, there are about twenty-five Chinese residents. The Chinese in California numbered 22,000 four months ago. The whole of this number may not be permanent residents, but that there are many who have adopted California as their country cannot be denied, for I am personally acquainted with a few. We see, then, that emigration from China to this country is an unavoidable thing—a legitimate result of commerce.

Thursday,]

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.—BOUTWELL.

[July 7th.

"In the next place, Chinese emigration will increase in proportion as the Chinese become acquainted with the American people, with the free institutions of this country, and with the nature and extent of the vast territory that is waiting to be peopled and possessed. I do not believe that one out of a thousand has any idea where America is, much less of the extent and nature of its territory. Let them hear of America, let them know that there is a land of promise across the Pacific, and they will flock over here by thousands and millions.

"In the third place, emigration into this country is a matter of absolute necessity, for China proper is too narrow a space to hold and support 370,000,000 of inhabitants. There are in China proper 800,829,100 English acres. The quantity in cultivation is about 141,119,347 acres, which gives us nearly three persons to an acre. How long can one acre support three persons is another point, which it is not difficult to decide. In addition to this fact, an oppressive government, and the troubles of the time will drive millions of the Chinese to this side of the Pacific.

"Your second inquiry, viz.: 'The value of labor as compared with its value here,' naturally furnishes me a fourth reason why I believe that Chinese emigration into this country is a moral certainty. The wages of labor of the lowest description in Canton and in other provinces, are as follows: sixty cash per day and food. Even forty in the north, during bad times. (Twelve cash is equal to a cent.) In other cases, eighty to ninety, even as far as four hundred cash, which is considered very high, and given to men who are well versed in their profession. Earnings of weavers of cotton or silk, in Canton and in the northern provinces, are, on an average, two to three dollars per month, one person. Wages of artisans, such as carpenters, blacksmiths, &c., in Canton and other provinces, average five dollars per month. Cost of maintaining a laborer, his wife and three children, in accordance with his wages—lowest, three dollars per month. Now, when we compare the value of labor there with the value of labor here, what great inducement can there be to make the most enterprising laborers remain at home, and not migrate to this country? Let the value of wages be made known to them, and in the course of ten years your Pacific shore will be crowded with those industrious and patient orientals, and nothing but brute force will keep them from landing.

"As to the character of the laborers, which is the third point of your inquiry, I need not say much. But I am confident that they are inferior to no people in industry and patience, and are ready to compete with any class of laborers, from the lowest to the highest. We have farmers who cultivate the most barren soil, and may be seen perched on rocks that would not, apparently, yield a blade of grass, yet from those mountains and rocks, by labor and attention, they extract three crops annually. We have scholars who could boast of greater application than any student in Germany or in England. I do not wish to extol, or exaggerate matters. I speak straight on, and say what I do know. No one, who is at all acquainted with China, would say anything less than what I have written to you. I trust I have given you what you in some measure expected, and I sincerely hope that with these scanty facts and information you will contribute to bring the American public to a closer association with near four hundred millions of the human family.

YUNG WING."

Let me say, that these people have already touched the eastern shore of the American continent, and are destined to work out a greater revolution, social, industrial, and I do not know but political, on this continent, than has ever yet taken place. And it may be the providence of God, that by and through this exodus of the Chinese, the institution of slavery will cease to exist upon the American continent. Beyond this matter of the probable population of Massachusetts, I care not to go. If gentlemen may, to some extent, upon these facts come to the conclusion, that we ought to adopt the district system, they bring me to no such result. I state, however, what I believe to be facts, without regard to the inferences which others may draw from them.

There is another consideration which will operate more and more to stimulate emigration from other countries to this, and especially to Massachusetts. It is the spirit of revolution, all over Europe, and in China, the necessary result of which is, to give to men a taste for freedom, at the same time, that it places them in such a position that it is difficult to remain at home. And it is in America that

"The free spirit of mankind at length Throws its last fetters off."

I have also an economical suggestion to make to the members of the Convention in regard to this question. To set aside the doctrine of equality, for a moment, a reduction of the House of Representatives to three hundred, as some gentlemen would have it, or three hundred and sixty as others suggest, would be, in my judgment, a totally insignificant result, when compared with the sacrifices we make to attain it. What is the difference in the expense between having four hundred men upon the floor of the House of Representatives, or three hundred and sixty? Unless the legislature of 1854—as I trust they will not—give themselves and their successors more than two dollars a day, the pay of forty members would not be over sixteen thousand dollars a year. Would any gentleman sacrifice the municipal institutions of Massachusetts, and change entirely the character of its government, in consideration of saving fifteen or twenty thousand dollars per annum? And must not every man be satisfied in his own mind, when he shall vote for the proposition for a House of three hundred, or three hundred and twenty men under the district system, that they will appropriate, one way or the other, more money from the public treasury, than it would cost to pay eighty additional members? I have another argument to suggest upon this question of reducing the House of Representatives. It is this: under the influence of a strong moral sentiment that exists in this country and the world, aided by commercial and political considerations, the system of indirect taxation must finally break down. No institution can resist the operation of commercial law. I do not mean such law as you put upon your statute book, but that law which induces the merchant to venture his property upon the deep. There seems to be an increasing feeling, not only in this country, but all over the world, to abolish the system of indirect taxation, and that is the complexion to which things will come at last. The system of indirect taxation is to be abolished, because there is a moral sentiment in the country, that demands it, and the principles and spirit of free trade in this Commonwealth, and the world will demand the reduction or abolition of duties on the importation of goods. It may be strange in me to venture such a prediction, and I care not about having the reputation of a prophet in these days—but, I predict, that Boston itself, will be a free trade city within the next decennial period. And why? Because her merchants will see if custom-houses and tariffs do not actually prohibit commerce, they at least, check its expansion. And coöperating with them will be found in this movement the men who are called fanatics. And why? Because they will see, that by the abolition of indirect taxation, the despotisms of the world will be broken down. Whenever despots are obliged to demand directly of the people payment for the expenses they have incurred, they will also find themselves unable to meet the demands, and the consequence will be, that bankers and men having money, will lose faith in their governments.

That would be a happy result, as regards some nations and people. The influence of this idea may, and it is likely to, affect the policy of the State. Then, when your system of direct taxation comes, you want an economical element in the government. I do not mean to say, that a body of three hundred men would not be as economical as one of four hundred, but I have my doubts about it; because men in the rural districts, the laboring population of the State, will have somewhat different ideas of expenditures from those of the men who reside in the city. I make no complaint of it, but that is the fact, and it is within the knowledge and observation of every-body.

I said I would make a remark, in regard to the sentiment quoted by the honorable member for Marshfield, as the language of some cardinal, who asserted that any assembly of more than one hundred men was a mob. The gentleman did not say that he assented to that doctrine, but I suppose he would not have quoted it unless he thought it to be of some value. I cannot agree to that proposition; for if so, then the British House of Commons, consisting of six hundred and fifty-five men, must be a mob. The British House of Commons has had, and now has more power, in reference to political and commercial affairs, than any other assembly which ever met. The House of Commons is the only representative body in the British realm. The Lords is an estate existing in their own right, and the members thereof may vote by proxy, which, of course, contains the idea that they are not responsible to the people. The crown is comparatively weak. The House of Commons is then the only representative of the morals, the intelligence and the political power of England. It has charge of the home policy, the resources of the island—its manufactures—its commerce. It has the control, and to some extent the destiny of colonies, on which the rays of the sun forever linger. Its sphere of legislation embraces every clime. Its laws, are adapted to its North American possessions—its islands of the West, and its islands and continental conquests of the East Indies. It establishes principles of government, and systems of jurisprudence for the various nations which acknowledge the power of Great Britain.

Now, if any inference is to be drawn as to the capacity of a large or a small House, I think the inference is irresistible, that there is nothing in a large House which disqualifies it for the performance of the most important public duties. Therefore, I have come to an entirely different conclusion from my friend's friend, the cardinal, that all assemblies composed of more than one hundred members are mobs.

I have wandered, it may be, from the subject too far, and I have spoken too long. It is not in my mind to make any further suggestions to the Convention upon this matter. I think the district system is dead here, and in the State. It has had, for seventy years, about as much life as it has now; that is, from the day of the Essex Result to the present moment. The people of Massachusetts have not adopted it, nor at any period of their history have they demanded it. For my part, I am not inclined to thrust it upon them.

Now, the issue is between the existing system of representation and that which has in its general principles and in its details, I trust, received the approbation of this Convention. That is the issue; and to the small towns, containing less than 1560 inhabitants, those which are represented now only in fractions, I ask why they should hesitate to endorse this system. Sir, they cannot hesitate. And why should the towns containing less than 3300 inhabitants, none of which will be entitled under the present system, to more than a fractional representation in 1870, hesitate to vote for a measure which will preserve their municipal rights?

For as these small towns sink, one by one, beneath the political horizon, they rise not again. And to the friends of an equality of political power, wherever they are, what objection have you to a plan which works no serious injustice to any section of the Commonwealth, is substantially equal as to city and country, and above all, preserves, to so great an extent, our ancient and valued system of town representation?

If this measure shall be adopted by the Convention, and the people, I trust that our friends, nay, our enemies, even, in this city, will at least accord to us the credit of not having sought to destroy or unjustly diminish their political power in the government of Massachusetts.

And to the cities, where men of one party and another have labored long and well to throw off the pernicious general ticket system, which of you will refuse a measure fraught with the highest political benefits and blessings? And to all of us, why should we abandon our system of government, when the history of the world, and the reason of the age are full of testimonials in favor of municipal institutions? It may—I cannot say—it may turn out as gentlemen predict—that the right of representation is not an element of political health; but it may turn out otherwise. If we are to fall into error, the guilt shall not be great, when tradition, history, usage, and reason, are on our side.

Mr. President, I feel, that, having spoken an hour on a former occasion, and something beyond that time on this, I ought to apologize to the Convention. But it only remains for me to do, in conclusion, what I feel is altogether inadequate—thank gentlemen for the attention which they have given me, and assure them that I will not, except by way of detail, trouble them again.

Mr. HALE, of Boston. I do not rise for the purpose of entering into any discussion upon this question. I should not attempt to do it at this time, if I felt more competent to do it than I do. It is a sufficient objection to my attempting to address this House, that it is impossible for me to make my voice heard by a great part of the members. It is for that reason, that I have forborne to attempt to present some reasons, which I have been desirous to present to the House. But, I rise at this time for the purpose of moving a proposition, which has been very much discussed in this House, but, upon which, no question has been taken—a proposition of districting the State in a form, in which, I believe, it would receive the general support of those who are in favor of such a system. There has been a question taken upon one or two propositions, which were called propositions for districting the State, but they were not defined in their character, and they did not accomplish the purpose, and do not propose to accomplish the main purposes which are designed by the friends of that system. I allude more particularly to the insufficiency of the propositions, which have been made in attempting a reduction of the number of the members of the House. The inconvenient size of the House of Representatives in this Commonwealth has been for many years a serious evil, of which, the people of the Commonwealth are fully sensible, and at this time, I believe, they are prepared to take measures for reducing it; and they are disposed, I believe, to do it by a system of equality, and not by curtailing the rights of a portion of the Commonwealth, for the purpose of giving a representation to every part by municipal elections.

I wish to present the proposition, which I had the honor of submitting here at the commencement of this debate, at the request of a large minority of this select Committee. That proposition was discussed in Committee of the Whole, but has not been submitted in Convention. I will ask, that the proposition, which I now submit, may be read by the Clerk. I wish to remark, that there is a blank in it which I do not propose to fill up at the present time, and I merely submit the proposition to show the form, in which, I propose to carry out that, which was submitted, in general terms, in Committee of the Whole.

The resolution was read by the Clerk, as follows:—

Resolved, That it is expedient so to alter and amend the Constitution, as to provide for a periodical division of the Commonwealth into equal districts on the basis of population, with a view to the establishment of a House of Representatives on the principle of equality, and consisting of such a number of members as may be best entitled to the confidence of the people, and best adapted to the convenient disposition of the legislative business. In order thereto, a census of the inhabitants of each city and town, on the first day of May, in 18—, and on the first day of May in every tenth year thereafter, shall be taken and returned to the office of the secretary of the Commonwealth, on or before the last day of June next ensuing the dates aforesaid. And it shall be the duty of the general court, which shall be next chosen after the taking of each decennial census, to divide the towns and cities of the Commonwealth into eighty districts, in such manner, that each shall contain, as nearly as may be, an equal number of inhabitants; and they shall, in all cases where the same shall be practicable, be formed by the union of towns and cities adjoining one another; and, in the formation of such districts, no town shall be divided. But the cities, when containing a greater number of inhabitants than the average of the districts throughout the Commonwealth, shall be so divided, that each district shall, as nearly as may be, contain that number, and any part of the inhabitants exceeding the number required for the entire districts therein, shall be set off to form a part of such adjoining district as the general court shall direct. The division of cities into districts shall be formed, and the inhabitants, who may be set off to an adjoining district shall be organized for the purpose of conducting the elections therein, by the municipal authorities of the respective cities, in the same manner as the wards for city purposes are constituted therein. And the inhabitants of each district shall elect three representatives constituting a house of two hundred and forty members.

Mr. HALE. When I drew up that proposition, my intention was to fill the blank with the year 1855, with a view of submitting a specific plan of districting the Commonwealth; but, not having succeeded in obtaining an opportunity to present this at an earlier date, I conceive it too late to present that proposition at this time, and, therefore, I withdraw the second part of the proposition and fill the blank with the year 1854, so that the proposed census may be taken in May next.

The reason, Mr. President, why I wish to have a particular vote taken on this proposition, is, to prevent it from being misunderstood by the people of the Commonwealth, who have desired that the House should be diminished. I do not conceive that a reduction of the House to three hundred and twenty, or three hundred and sixty members, as has been proposed here, would be in any degree meeting the objects which those who wish the House reduced, desire to attain. A reduction to two hundred and forty members, I conceive to be the highest number for the House that any friend of the district system would sustain, and a proposition for a larger number than that, I think, would not be likely to be satisfactory to the people of the Commonwealth, as one, which should reduce the House to such dimensions as would admit of convenient debate in the House.

I do not wish to forestall debate upon this subject, but, I will allude to one fact, which, as I conceive, affords conclusive proof of the unsuitableness of a House of Representatives consisting of four hundred members, for the purpose of ordinary debate, and the transaction of public business. It must be apparent to every member of this House, that a very large portion of what has been said here, during the session of this Convention, has been totally inaudible to a great part of the members of this body. It is not possible to arrange an assembly of four hundred members within a legislative hall, giving tolerably comfortable accommodations to all the members, in such a manner, that they shall all be within the reach of a single voice; and, it appears to me to be unworthy of this Commonwealth, to continue to sustain a House of so large dimensions as the House of Representatives has been, for the mere reason, that they are unwilling to resort to a system of equal districts, for the purpose of making a reduction. I am unwilling, therefore, that this Convention should adjourn without its being distinctly proposed to the members, to record their votes upon a proposition such as the friends of the district system would be prepared to sustain, without having it supposed that the friends of this measure were in favor of so large a House. I do not conceive, that the strongest argument in favor of the district system, is based upon that fact. I consider that very important, but there are others which are even more conclusive, and which have been so fully stated by members of the Convention, that I have no disposition, at the present time, to recapitulate those arguments. I will now merely move, that when the question is taken upon this proposition, it may be taken by yeas and nays.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.—SCHOULER.

[July 7th.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SCHOULER. If the Convention had not voted, that no question should be taken upon this subject, until to-morrow at eleven o'clock, and, therefore, precluded the probability of taking the question to-night, I should not again have intruded upon them with any remarks on this matter. After my proposition was voted down so very unanimously, I did make a vow that I would not speak upon this subject again; I thought it was too bad, but, at the same time, I knew that I was right; and, Sir, I believe, that the people of this Commonwealth, if they shall have an opportunity to express their sentiments upon this proposition, will also, say, that it was right. I was very glad this morning, when the honorable gentleman from Taunton, (Mr. Morton,) made a proposition, which was somewhat discussed in our Committee that reported the original resolution, and which, I believe, was assented to by nearly every one of them—if there was any way by which we could put the alternative proposition to the people, whether they would have town representation, such as is contemplated by the resolution now before us, or a district system such as some of us advocate, that would be satisfactory. I think there is a way, Mr. President; I think there is no difficulty about it. I think there is a way, by which we can present the two propositions to the people, and if they vote down the district system, I shall say "amen" to it for the present. I shall think that they were wrong, notwithstanding; but, I shall submit to it. If, on the other hand, they shall adopt the district system, then I presume, that the gentleman who represents Berlin, and all the rest of our friends who are now in favor of town representation, will become advocates of the district system. Sir, the gentleman for Berlin said that the district system was dead. I felt grieved to think, that that old and favorite proposition of mine should be dead; and, I suppose it is incumbent upon me, at least, to say a word, either in the way of eulogy or obituary, as we should write a notice of a departed friend for the newspapers. But, I am very much inclined to doubt whether it is dead, after all. I believe that there is vitality in it yet. It may show no signs of life here, but it can never cease to live, because it is just and proper.

Now, Mr. President, I was very much delighted this morning, with the speech which was made by the gentleman who represents Marshfield, (Mr. Sumner,) and particularly was I delighted with that part of it which was made just before the hammer came down. The rest of it was beautiful and eloquent; I liked to sit and listen to it; but, Sir, it made me, from that moment, advocate the one-hour rule. [Laughter.] My opinion is, that a man can say all the good things that are necessary to be said, in one hour. [Renewed laughter.] I had heard it intimated how my friend for Marshfield might come out; but, when I sat listening to his speech, I could not see how he would come out. He did it, however, and did it well. I had considered that gentleman to be one who advocated principle—principle without compromise, and without any regard to the consequences. I like that kind of men. Sometimes I have found it not to be quite expedient to come up to that standard; but still the principle is good, and I like it, and I did feel somewhat disappointed, after hearing my friend lay down those beautiful premises, and quote from those old and glorious records which the gentleman for Wilbraham had not seen,—or at any rate, if he had seen them, he did not quote them, and they were better than all that he did quote. I must say, that I never knew that they were in existence until they were read here this morning, and when I found that I did have some revolutionary ground to stand upon, I felt fortified, and said to myself, "I will speak again"! [Laughter.] Now, Sir, those grounds are true; and, as I happened at the time, to be sitting very near the gentleman for Wilbraham, I heard what he said in a whisper, and I would not now repeat what was said in that way, but that I understand it was heard across the house, and, therefore, cannot be very secret. When he asked who was the author of that document, the honorable gentleman for Marshfield replied, "Theophilus Parsons;" and the gentleman for Wilbraham said "Yes! John Lowell and Theophilus Parsons, those old Tories, and that is regular tory doctrine"! Then, I said to myself, if that is tory doctrine, I am a tory; if acknowledging the complete and perfect equality of man is tory doctrine, then, Sir, I am a tory. But, Mr. President, I never knew before that it was tory doctrine to advocate a principle of that kind. I have heard it said, and I have found it in the course of my reading, that those who advocated, that people in the country and corporate communities were to have power in the House of Commons, merely, because they were in the country, and merely, because they were corporations, throwing aside the people—these were Tories, and that was tory doctrine; while those who advocated the representation of the people—such men, for instance, as Joseph Hume, Cobden and Bright, were fine Whigs—they were destructives. But, I never in my life heard it said, until this day, and in this Convention of Massachusetts freemen, that those who advocate the complete equality of man, advocate tory doctrine. Recommend to me such tory doctrine as long as I live, say I. But passing from that, for I did not wish, if indeed I had been able, to break the spell of that eloquent and learned speech which we heard this morning, although I do not agree with the latter part of it, still I do thank the gentleman for the first part of it, and I am happy to have it go upon the records of our Convention, and to have it stand there as a beautiful commentary upon the institutions of Massachusetts.

The gentleman for Berlin has got a theory which deserves some notice; but when we begin to base our popular branch of the government upon close calculations, I begin to doubt. The starting point of his theory, is, that one senator is worth ten representatives—that there is just as much political power in my hand if I sit in one of those cushioned seats in the other end of this capitol, as there is in the hands of ten men who sit upon these green cushions in this fine and beautiful hall. Now, Sir, this may be so, but I confess, that I cannot understand it. I never knew a measure that was carried in the Senate by one majority, but was just carried and that was all. I never knew a measure that was carried in the House by one majority, but that it was just the same. There may be some foundation for his theory, but I must say, that I do not know where it is. I recollect that after a great many hard struggles we did elect a senator to congress in this House by one majority, while they had elected him in the Senate by a dozen majority, two months before; but that dozen majority in the Senate, was not enough to send him to congress, and so we kept voting and voting until we had got one majority in the House of Representatives. Now, my judgment is, and I say it with all due respect to the honorable gentleman for Berlin, that he has founded his argument upon a fallacy. Three men cannot be rolled into one, to say nothing of ten. There is no man who has or can have ten votes; and little did I think when I was advocating that proposition brought forward by the gentleman from Natick, whereby we base the Senate upon population, that I was thereby robbing my constituents of the right to a fair representation in the House of Representatives. I venture to say that the gentleman from Natick never supposed any such thing; for if such a proposition had been broached, I doubt whether it would have passed. I am willing to make a further proposition to the gentleman for Berlin; and that is, that if he will agree to give Boston ten representatives we will give up one of our senators. We will give up all claim to more than five senators for the county of Suffolk, if he will give us ten additional representatives. I think, according to his theory, he cannot say, that this is not a fair proposition. I cannot say, that we would give up the whole six senators, if he will give us sixty representatives; but, I would agree to it for one, and I should think that I was making a very good bargain for this city by so doing. That would be centralization carried to a little farther extent than anybody here has proposed to go. I consider this a fallacy, and, therefore, I think it is not entitled to so much consideration as the general propositions are which come from that source. The gentleman throughout his argument, as I understood him, took the ground, that these little municipalities were going to be destroyed by the introduction of this system. This point has been argued over and over again in this House, to show, that it will have no such effect—that these little municipalities will stand exactly where they always have stood. A constable will go around fourteen days before the town meeting to warn the people, and all the usual regulations will be gone through; they will elect their moderators, town clerks, selectmen, school committees and all their town officers, just the same as they do now. They would choose their representatives in just the same way that they vote for a senator who does not live in their town. As I once said before, the gentleman who represents Berlin does not live in that town; and a representative could be elected in just the same way that a gentleman who lives in Groton was elected to represent the town of Berlin. They knew that they were electing a man who did not live in their own municipality, but they did not suppose that they were cutting off that municipality from any of the rights which they claim, or to which they supposed themselves entitled. I, therefore, am of the opinion, that this argument is not entitled to any great weight in our minds. Now, I think, that if we adopt the principle, that no new town shall be incorporated hereafter unless it has fifteen hundred inhabitants, we restrict their right to form themselves into municipalities. It seems to me, that when we come to look at the improvements which are going forward every year, in the building of our railroads and the formation of new villages throughout the various sections of this Commonwealth, we ought to allow those villages which have diverse interests from the main body of the town, and which are, perhaps, separated to a great distance from the other portions, to assert their right to an individual corporate capacity, in the management of their own affairs. In the legislature for the last three or four years, there have been two standing committees on towns, in order to attend to all these applications from new towns that desired to be incorporated; and in a great number of cases, these applications have grown out of the extent of railroads, which have formed new villages. Now, in such cases, which will continue to present themselves, I think they should be allowed to form a new municipality, whether they have fifteen hundred inhabitants in them or not.

Mr. FRENCH. I have listened to the speeches in this Convention, on this question of representation, with a good deal of pleasure, and at a certain time should have been glad if I had had an opportunity of answering some of the matters presented, particularly the remarks of the gentleman from Boston on the other side, who made a long speech.

In the course of this debate, there has been a comparison made between the country and the city in relation to their morality. I ask gentlemen where all the great moral reforms have sprung from, and I hope they will let history answer. Have they sprung from the towns or the cities—the little municipalities or the large manufacturing and commercial districts?

I believe it to be right and proper that these little municipalities should be represented in the legislature, for to my thinking they are the real conservative power of the State. It has been said, that these little republics were inimical to the city of Boston. Is that so? Far from it. When the tocsin of war has been sounded and the far-famed city of Boston has been threatened with invasion, who came to the rescue? Was it not those sturdy fellows who live in our valleys and on the sides of our green hills. I ask gentlemen who are in this Convention, to answer me that. The interests of Boston and the interests of the country are one and inseparable, and when I have been far from these hills I have felt a thrill of pride in being able to say, not that I was a citizen of Rome, but a citizen of Massachusetts, and that the ancient city of Boston was the metropolis of the State.

The gentleman who has recently taken his seat has told us that if we had free trade and manufacturing carried on, there would be no danger to the State. I am in favor of free trade and of direct taxation, so that the people may know what they have to pay.

If we had direct, instead of indirect, taxation, three-fifths of us would have to pay some taxes for privileges which we do not now pay a cent for. But, Sir, there is a vast tax paid indirectly and out of sight, which, if the people could see it put upon the articles they purchased, would astonish them, and yet they pay it indirectly, and without finding any fault at all.

The gentleman across the way discoursed long and musically upon old women and school-house bells, and said that Boston did not have her share of representation. He talked of liberty and equality. Now, there is not a word in the English language that admits of more definitions than the word liberty. An inebriate, when he is prevented from getting intoxicated, thinks he is deprived of all the liberty he ever possessed. The Russian peasantry, when the Czar Peter ordered their beards to be cut off, thought they had lost all the liberty they ever had—for they considered liberty as consisting in the privilege of wearing long beards. So we might go on enumerating a thousand things in which some people think liberty consists. So these small towns think liberty consists, in some degree, in being represented. Though I do not think the bill before us, will give these small towns that representation which they merit and ought to have, still, it is the best that we can get at present, and which the Convention seems willing to let us have, and, therefore, I shall vote for the proposition.

Mr. HALLETT, for Wilbraham. I propose to amend the second paragraph. There was, as I understand, an amendment introduced this morning by the gentleman from Middleborough, (Mr. Wood,) respecting the second paragraph, and which so materially changed it, that I think it must have escaped the attention of the Convention.

The amendment offered by the gentleman from Middleborough, (Mr. Wood,) and which was adopted this morning, reads as follows:—

Any two of such towns may, by a vote of a major part of the legal voters of each, at legal meetings thereof, and held at some time preceding the first election which shall take place under this amendment to the Constitution, and, thereafter, at legal meetings held at some time preceding the first election, which shall take place next after such decennial State census, unite together in a district, which shall be entitled to a representative each year, and which shall continue until the next decennial census, excepting the year in which the valuation of estates is settled.

The amendment which I propose, if adopted, will make it read as follows:—

Any two of such towns may, by a vote of a major part of the legal voters of each, at legal meetings thereof, called for that purpose, unite together in a district, which shall be entitled to a representative each year, and which shall continue at least for two years, excepting the year in which the valuation of estates is settled.

The PRESIDENT, pro tem. The Chair understands that the amendment to which the gentleman refers, has been adopted, and, that being the case, no amendment can now be made to that amendment, without first reconsidering the vote by which it was adopted.

Mr. HALLETT. I supposed that a motion to reconsider, was not in order at this stage of the proceedings, because, there is an amendment pending.

The PRESIDENT, pro tem. The Chair apprehends that it would be in order. The motion of the gentleman from Boston, (Mr. Hale,) which is now pending, is offered as a substitute for the resolve under consideration, and is an entire new resolve. The Chair is of opinion, that a motion to reconsider may be made.

Mr. HALLETT. Then I move to reconsider the vote by which the proposition of the gentleman from Middleborough, (Mr. Wood,) was adopted.

Mr. BRIGGS, of Pittsfield. Can a motion to reconsider be in order pending a discussion upon another amendment to the bill. It seems to me it cannot be made at this stage, though it may be at some other.

The PRESIDENT, pro tem. The amendment of the gentleman from Boston is a substitute for the resolves now before the Convention, and has passed to a second reading. The Chair believes it to be in order to amend and perfect the resolves before the Convention, before action shall be taken upon the substitute. An amendment to the resolves has been adopted, and a motion is now made to reconsider the vote by which that amendment was adopted.

Mr. HALLETT. This very question has been decided before, that where a substitute has been offered, and it is moved to amend the subject matter under consideration, it was then in order, first to perfect the bill before the Convention. That is what we have now in hand. The proposition made by the gentleman from Boston is the seventh proposition upon the subject of the district system. It has been voted down six times, and probably will be again. The question is, whether we are to be permitted to perfect our own bill, or whether any gentleman who happens to get the floor can, by offering a proposition, prevent us from doing it.

Mr. KINSMAN, of Newburyport. I desire to understand the precise nature of the question. I supposed that, by the rules adopted by this Convention, while an amendment was pending, no proposition could be offered except to amend that amendment. The gentleman representing Wilbraham first proposed an amendment to an amendment, but being told that it was not in order, he moves to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was adopted, for the purpose of introducing his amendment. I should like to know whether, in the opinion of the Chair, under these circumstances, such a motion is in order?

Mr. EARLE. If I understand the matter, the rule is a little broader than was stated by the gentleman from Newburyport, (Mr. Kinsman). It has been the practice in the legislature, I am certain,—and I think cases have occurred in the Convention, though I cannot refer to them at this time—that where an amendment is offered which is substantially a substitute for the whole proposition under consideration, an amendment is in order, to either the original proposition, or to the amendment, on the ground that, you have the right to perfect a bill before you shall be obliged to choose between the two.

The PRESIDENT, pro tem. The question before the Convention is the motion of the gentleman from Wilbraham, to reconsider the vote by which the amendment of the gentleman from Middleborough was adopted, for the purpose of introducing an amendment. The Chair believes, that it is in order to perfect the resolves, before the Convention can be called to act upon the substitute, and, that the motion to reconsider, is in order at this time.

Mr. HALLETT. I desire that the Convention should understand what my purpose is in moving a reconsideration. The original report provided, that any two of such towns, (that is, towns of less than one thousand inhabitants,) may, by a vote of the major part of the legal voters of each, at legal meetings thereof, unite together in a district which shall be entitled to a representative each year, and which shall continue for a period of not less than five years. I have tried to get the floor to give notice, that I should move to strike out the word "five" and insert as a substitute the word "two," in order to enable towns that are in this condition, that is, having less than one thousand inhabitants, to act together at any time, in forming a district which shall be entitled to a representative every year. I considered that a very important matter to be brought about if we could do it. The proposition, as it stood in the original report, if amended by substituting "two" for "five" years would present inducements and facilities to the small towns, that might result in bringing many of them together into districts, and that would tend to relieve us of the embarrassment, which grows out of the existence of so large a number of small towns.

A decided practical objection to the existing Constitution, in regard to the union of small towns, which has prevented its being adopted, is, that the towns must take steps to carry it into effect, at the beginning of the decennial period, and, if they do not do it then, they cannot do it again until the expiration of another ten years. The result has been that the small towns have not united at all. The original proposition from the Committee authorized it to be done within five years. That is one-half better, but it would be still better to allow it to be done every two years.

But, the proposition of the gentleman from Middleborough, (Mr. Wood,) entirely changes the whole character of that provision and turns the small towns all out of doors, and in fact renders it impossible for them to unite in districts, and, I am sorry to see that the small towns allowed it to pass, to their disadvantage, as they did the amendment to the Constitution in 1835-6. Allow me to say, in this connection, that if the small towns will not stand by themselves, I do not know how we can stand by them. I mean to stand by them as long as I can, and there are abler men than myself, here, who, like Moses of old, are ready to hold up their hands in their behalf; but, if they will not sustain them, they will become powerless, and their hands will fall.

The amendment as it has been adopted provides, that there must be a preceding meeting of the inhabitants of two towns before they choose a representative—and if they do not unite at that time, they are deprived of the opportunity of doing it for the next ten years. The result will be that, they cannot unite at all.

My proposition so far amends the other, as to say, that the towns may unite at any legal meeting called for that purpose. All that is necessary, is, that the warrant shall set forth that the meeting is called for the purpose of saying, whether the towns will unite together and form one representative district. I think they should have the opportunity of doing that every two years. I would have it every year if we could, but two years is as often as we can do it, for the reason that, if two towns unite for one year to choose a representative, and then separate, the representative being an inhabitant of one of the towns, the operation would be unequal, because you could not tell which town had lost the representative. But if the connection should continue for two years, then the representative will be chosen from one town one year, and from the other the next, and if the towns do not like the arrangement they will separate and neither have anything to complain of.

Allow me further to say a word in relation to one suggestion of the gentleman for Berlin, (Mr. Boutwell,) which was, as to the operation of the gain or loss upon two or three counties, by this proposed system of representation. I do not want the idea of any disparity to a county to go out, unless it is a correct one, and as I understand it, it is not. If I understood the gentleman correctly, his comparison was with the present basis of representation, and I understood him to say that he was under the apprehension that Essex was losing, that Barnstable was losing, and that Plymouth was losing. Do I understand the gentleman as making that statement as compared with the present system.

Mr. BOUTWELL, for Berlin. Perhaps I did not make myself correctly understood. I mean with a line of equality which would proceed from a basis of voters. That is to say, certain counties are not so well off as they would be if the basis were voters instead of towns; but, I believe with perhaps one exception, they are all better off than they would be under the present system of representation.

Mr. HALLETT. I concur entirely with the gentleman, that there is a compensating gain to Suffolk, and other counties, by putting the basis of the Senate on population, in making these comparisons, and thus Suffolk will gain one senator, under the new system. But, after all, there is very little to be ascertained by making these calculations between towns and a voting basis, because the basis of voting is to be changed by this Constitution. Instead of requiring a property qualification or the payment of a tax, no qualification except that of residence is to be required for the voter, and this will very much change the relative number of voters in the different sections of the Commonwealth, from what it is now, and will make the proportion of voters and of population nearly alike, although it will necessarily tend to the advantage of the cities, and I agree with the gentleman, that under this new arrangement, the large towns and the cities will gain in this respect, much more than the small ones. But, I maintain that every county gains on its present representation, and especially in its future ratio of increase, and there is no inequality that should disturb any of the counties. Thus the gentleman supposed that Essex was losing and that Middlesex was gaining. But, let us test this under the present ratio of representation compared with the new.

Essex has now 447 representatives in ten years. By the new ratio she will have 465; a gain of 18.

Middlesex has now 584, and will have 602, a gain of 18. So that Middlesex and Essex gain precisely alike, although the former has the most population.

Barnstable now has 133 representatives in ten years, and by the new ratio will have 145, a gain of 12.

Plymouth now has 214, and will secure 230, a gain of 16, and there are her Bridgewater within 32, and Hingham within 38 of another representative, each.

Now, Sir, what is Plymouth complaining of? Why should Plymouth and Barnstable come here complaining that they have not got enough? What is the reason they have not got more? Solely, because they have got no more towns, and you must preserve this town basis, unless you mean to reduce the House solely at the expense of the small towns, and thus take from the small towns, and give the gain to the cities of Boston and Lowell. If Plymouth or Barnstable desire to gain nothing themselves, but to take representation from the rural towns by throwing their representation into Boston, and the cities surrounding it, instead of giving it to Franklin and Berkshire, and the agricultural counties where there are no large towns and cities, they might do it; but, what possible benefit, directly or indirectly, could it be to them? But, Sir, I have no sympathy with that view of the question at all. I would sooner see an entire district system at once.

Let Plymouth compare herself with the whole Commonwealth, and small towns, as a class, with small towns, all having the same interest. She gains now. And so of Bristol. She gains now, and has a gain in anticipation. The county of Bristol has two towns upon which she will gain one each in the next apportionment. Plymouth has but two towns, that will, under any possible ratio, ever exceed one representative, and therefore she could gain nothing by any increase of ratio, which must necessarily cut off the small towns.

This I have said, as far as I may, to do away any local, unfounded jealousies between counties, and to induce the great body of towns having one representative, and which can never have any more, to give their aid to this amendment and to the whole proposition to fix the basis substantially as we now have it.

The result would be that every other year, if my amendment is adopted, the towns can, by coming together, try the experiment, if they should think fit, and when they shall once have tried it, my opinion is, that they will be satisfied with it. At least, they will be very likely to try the experiment if they can have the privilege of divorcing themselves at the end of two years, if they do not like the union; but, if it is to be a ten years' marriage, the probability is, that they will be very cautious how they enter into it.

This is the position we now propose to place the towns in, as to representation. To give to the sixty-four towns, with a population of less than one thousand the right to unite and send, annually, one representative, or to send from each, biennially, if they prefer to act separately; that all over one thousand and up to four thousand shall have the right to choose, each, one representative, annually, and when you go above four thousand inhabitants, you have a progressive ratio of four thousand for an additional representative. That is the principle we stand upon, and that brings us in conformity with all the rules of representation in this Commonwealth, that have ever been laid down since the formation of the government, and which have ever met with any favor with the people. That, I say, always has been the rule, without exception, and when the gentleman for Marshfield, (Mr. Sumner,) who spoke this morning, said, that the Constitution of 1778 was rejected, because its basis of representation was not founded upon population, I was entirely surprised, because I do not know where he can find any authority for any such assertion. The Constitution of 1778 was rejected because it came from the legislature and not the people, and because it had no bill of rights, and for some other reasons; but, certainly, not because it provided for corporate representation, because, without such representation for every town, no Constitution ever could or would have been made.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.—HALLETT—SCHOULER—GRISWOLD.

Mr. SUMNER, for Marshfield. I certainly had no intention of saying, that the Constitution of 1778 was rejected solely on account of its basis of representation. I said, it was rejected on that account among others. I said, that was one element of objection.

Mr. HALLETT, for Wilbraham. Can the gentleman find any authority in history, in any newspaper, or by tradition, for any such conclusion? Can he find any authority in all the musty volumes which he has examined to bring out what I call the tory doctrines of the old school of federalists, that will go to show, that the recognition of the principle of town and corporate representation was one of the causes of the rejection of the Constitution of 1778?

Mr. SUMNER. The Essex Result.

Mr. HALLETT. The Essex Result, and that is all. But it is very evident that this was not made a ground of the rejection of that Constitution by the people of the Commonwealth. The Essex Result produced no result upon the people, whatever. If it had, the Constitution of 1780 would have been rejected upon the same ground, for it was liable to the same objection. No, Sir. The views of Lowell and Parsons were utterly repudiated; and the peoples' Constitution of 1780 recognized the right of every town, and was adopted by over two-thirds of the people. I refer the gentleman to Shattuck's History of Concord, to show what was the true cause of the rejection of the proposed Constitution of 1778. It was because it emanated from the legislature of the State, and not from a convention of delegates chosen for that purpose. It emanated from an authority which had no power to frame a Constitution. That is the reason the Constitution of 1778 was rejected. The records of town-meetings of that day, all over the State, will prove this.

The gentleman from Boston, (Mr. Schouler,) seems, also, to be in the dark, as to the original government notions of the old federal party, who feared the people so greatly; and, when he speaks of the "Essex Junto" as having nothing of the tory stamp of politics, he has certainly not derived his information from the right source. He is not old enough to understand it, (laughter); but he will be, one of these days, if he reads history enough, or even newspapers enough, of the olden time. He seems to have read history concerning that Essex Junto backwards, as he did the history of town representation, when he affirmed that, it was not the uniform and universal rule of Massachusetts representation from the foundation of our representative government.

Mr. SCHOULER. A short time ago the gentleman represented himself as Moses, and as Moses was the lawgiver of the Jews, I suppose he is the lawgiver of the Convention, and as such, of course ought to be pretty well posted up in history. Now, Sir, I have read the speeches of the gentleman for Wilbraham, and nearly all of them contain something about the Essex Junto; so that I think I ought to understand it pretty well. But, Sir, I alluded to the fact, that the gentleman for Wilbraham had said, Theophilus Parsons and John Lowell were tories. I said nothing about the Essex Junto.

Mr. HALLETT. The gentleman rose for explanation, but has explained nothing. I did not say, that Judge Parsons and John Lowell were tories, but that the doctrines of government they inculcated were tory doctrines, and so has said the voice of the people of this country, which repudiated those tory doctrines. The gentleman says, he has read my speeches. No, Sir, he has not read my speeches, or he could not have shown himself so ignorant upon this subject of the Essex Junto, and the doctrines of the old federal school of politics in Massachusetts. I spoke historically and truly in reference to this matter, when I said that the documents which the gentleman for Marshfield quoted against town representation as revolutionary authority, were not the doctrines of the Revolution, but tory doctrines; and I use the word "tory" in the sense in which Thomas Jefferson used it, when he said, that at the commencement of the Revolution there were two classes of men in the country, one who believed that there was no safety in trusting the people with the reins of government—men who had derived their notions from the monarchical governments of the old world. On the other hand, he said there was another class of persons who believed that government had been long enough in the hands of kings and aristocracy; that it was time to put it into the hands of the people; and, when that class of persons who feared the people, said, that the people were not fit to govern themselves, the people might well reply: "If the people are not fit to govern themselves, have we then found angels, in the form of kings, to govern us? Let history answer." And we may well point to a good many kings who were and are far from being angels.

I desire to quote in part the precise language of Jefferson, it is so significant concerning the old parties:—

"I know too well," he said, "the weakness and uncertainty of human reason to wonder at its different results. Both of our political parties, at least the honest portion of them, agree conscientiously in the same object—the public good, but they differ essentially in what they deem the means of promoting that good. One side believes it best done by one composition of the governing powers, the other by a different one. One fears most the ignorance of the people. The other, the selfishness of rulers independent of them. Which is right, time and experience will prove. We think one side of this experiment has been long enough tried, and proved not to promote the good of the many, and that the other has not been fairly and sufficiently tried. Our opponents think the reverse. With whichever opinion the body of the nation concurs, that must prevail."

Now, that is the history of toryism and republicanism as it has come down to us, and been developed in the formation of governments, from Hamilton and Jefferson to the present day.

Such men as Theophilus Parsons and John Lowell—I mean the men taught in their school of politics—declared that Great Britain had the right to search our ships before the war of 1812, and justified the attack of the Leopard on the Chesapeake. The same class of men, at an earlier day in the Revolution, contended that the British government had the right to tax the colonies in North America without their consent. That is the result of toryism as distinguished from republicanism, and, therefore, I have no respect for these "Essex Results" which are brought in here; and when the gentleman for Marshfield (Mr. Sumner,) quoted such authorities, I said, and I must repeat it, that the authorities he quoted from were anti-republican, and ought to have no influence upon this Convention. They were not revolutionary doctrines, but the reverse, and if the gentleman had read one sentence farther, he would have found—

The PRESIDENT, pro tem. The Chair must remind the gentleman for Wilbraham that the question is upon the motion to reconsider an amendment which does not open the whole subject for debate.

Mr. HALLETT. Well, Sir, I suppose I am out of order. But I was alluding to this matter as important in this aspect, that it affected the rights of the small towns, and I wanted to show the material of the speech of the gentleman for Marshfield this morning, who very generously gave his argument to his opponents, and very kindly proffered his vote to his friends. I hope, however, they may be neutralized in their effect, and that the argument may have the same fate with the district system, for which it was given.

I will only add, that this amendment is not a mere question of expediency, but that it is a practical question. And there again I want to say—and it is all on that point, I shall say—that I congratulate the delegate for Marshfield, that notwithstanding his own argument, he has come out precisely upon the ground where so many others have come, and where all will have to stand, with reference to this very proposition under consideration. He finds that expediency, established usage, old rights, must govern in this as in many other cases instead of what he regards as exact right; and that, while upon most questions it is a correct theory that principle must never yield to expediency, yet there are cases affecting towns in a State, and States in an united state, where abstract principle must yield to a safe and necessary expediency; and thus he now comes to the wise conclusion to preserve the government of Massachusetts by preserving the representative rights of the towns of the Commonwealth, just as I and others have come to the wise conclusion to preserve the union of these States by preserving the right of every State to manage its own domestic concerns.

Mr. GRISWOLD, for Erving. When this subject was up this morning, my attention was called to another matter in conversation with a friend who sat by my side, and I did not discover what the question was until after the vote had been taken. If I had known what the question was, a little sooner, I should have made some remarks in opposition to the amendment which was then adopted. I hope, however, that the motion of the gentleman for Wilbraham, (Mr.

Friday,]

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, &c. — GRISWOLD — KEYES.

[July 8th.

Hallett,) will prevail, that the vote by which the amendment was adopted will be reconsidered, and that the proposition will be put in the shape proposed by the gentleman for Wilbraham.

But the gentleman makes complaint that somebody did not rise in defence of the small towns. I will remark to the gentleman for Wilbraham, that there are two sides to this question, even among the advocates of the rights of the small towns. The proposition now adopted, is similar to the one in the present Constitution, the object of which was to prevent two small towns from uniting, except at the beginning of each decennial period. Now, Sir, as a matter of fact, the small towns have not united, and as a matter of fact, I presume, with this provision, they will not unite in future. Many of the strongest advocates of town representation, are willing that this trammel shall go into the Constitution, for the express purpose of preventing these towns from uniting; and, as I said before, the tendency will be to prevent them from uniting, because, unless they unite at the beginning of some decennial period, it is not in their power to unite again in ten years, and, therefore, although it operates as a trammel to prevent the full representation of those towns, it also will have the effect to preserve the town representation.

For this reason, I have no doubt, some gentlemen who are friendly to the rights of the small towns, will be willing to have this provision go into the Constitution. For myself, however, I am in favor of the proposition of the gentleman for Wilbraham. I am in favor of giving those small towns an opportunity of uniting oftener than once in ten years. I should prefer fixing a period of two or three years, as proposed by the gentleman, because there may be circumstances that would prevent towns from uniting at the beginning of some decennial period, when they after all, are in favor of such a union. There may be cases where one town may be willing to unite with another, but where no other town adjoining would consent at that particular period, and yet they would be glad to unite a year or two afterwards. This system avoids the evils of the district system, and preserves town representation, and if two towns prefer to unite and send a representative every year, instead of each sending six representatives in ten years, I think they should have the opportunity.

At any rate, Sir, whatever may be the opinions of individuals as to the town system, or the district system, I am in favor of a reconsideration of the vote which was taken this morning, on the proposition of the gentleman from Middleborough; and then, I hope, we shall adopt the proposition of the gentleman for Wilbraham, and thus put it within the power of towns to unite if they please. I think it is safe to lodge the matter within the power of the towns. If they are willing to do it—if two or three of the small towns see an exigency, as they may see one which requires it, and if they are willing to take the district system—for we do not wish to force it upon them—if they are willing to take a constant representation during the whole time under the district system, and to unite together for that purpose, I certainly, for one, shall be willing to put it within their power to do it. I hope, therefore, that the motion to reconsider will prevail, and that the amendment proposed by the gentleman for Wilbraham, will be adopted. I should have made these remarks this morning, if my attention had been called to the subject a moment sooner.

Mr. BRIGGS. I do not profess to understand this subject, and have not got my mind made up either one way or the other. When the remarks were made this morning, by the gentleman from Middleborough, on the occasion of offering his amendment, I supposed that I saw a good reason to induce me to vote for his proposition. As that gentleman is now absent, I will suggest, that it would perhaps be as well to give him an opportunity to express his reasons upon the subject before we act upon it; and, as we have reached the usual hour of adjournment, I will move that we now adjourn.

Mr. GRISWOLD. If the gentleman will withdraw that motion and move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table, that, I suppose, will leave the debate open.

Mr. BRIGGS. That might answer the same purpose; but, as I suppose the Convention are now ready to adjourn, I prefer to adhere to the original motion, that we now adjourn, and let the subject come up in the morning in the same position in which it now stands.

The question being taken, the motion was agreed to, and accordingly, the Convention adjourned.

Oaths, Subscriptions, &c.

[The following remarks of Mr. Keyes, were accidentally omitted from their proper place, in the debate on the above subject, Wednesday, July 6th.]

Mr. KEYES, for Abington. It has seemed to me, since the discussion has been going on in relation to the last paragraphs, that have been before us, that the Committee who reported these resolves were in some doubt whether they could find subjects enough to bring before the Convention to make it interesting, or whether we should be able to show to the people that we have had subjects enough on hand to make it worth while to have called the Convention.

I very much regretted that they should have seen fit to have recommended any changes in these subjects. It seems to me that there is something grand and imposing in the enacting style provided in the present Constitution. It appears to me to be exceedingly absurd to substitute simply the name of the General Court. It is a name which never gained respectability. It was never used—at least I never heard it used—except as a term of derision. I recollect when I first came to Boston, the chief jokes of the young men were made upon the "General Court." And the term has been used in that light so long that I do not believe we can restore it to dignity. The name which we have substituted for it, the Legislature—so difficult to pronounce—I do not think is an improvement; but, I doubt whether a change in that name would answer any good purpose.

Now, Sir, the gentleman from Natick seems to have great difficulty about these "straggling councillors," who come in here, one at a time, and occupy so much of the valuable time of the legislature. Well, Sir, I do not believe that the sessions of the legislature are very much prolonged by anything of this sort. Everybody knows that the legislature have nothing to do for a week or ten days after they meet, but to qualify officers; and, I submit, that if you remove all the formalities of organization, it will not alter the case. Members of the House, when they come here, want to see the senators, and by bringing them in here they will have an opportunity.

Then, Sir, these councillors, who have been held up as a kind of inquisition, who sit in darkness and do deeds of evil, will also be brought in here, where they can be seen. I think, if they are really what they are represented to be, it would be well to have them brought in where their faces can be seen, and if there is anything so dark or awful in their appearance, they may be watched the more closely.

But another difficulty is, that these councillors come straggling in, one by one, and the two Houses are obliged to go into convention to swear them in, one by one, as they come. Well, Sir, as far as my experience and observation goes, they generally get wind of what is going on, and are on hand before they are elected. Indeed, I am not sure but that is almost always the case. But it has happened, and will happen again, that some of them, coming from the more remote parts of the State, will not arrive until the next day. Well, Sir, I never saw any of the useful time of the legislature taken up in that way, that would have been turned to any better advantage. I do not think it is a matter of any great consequence whether the legislature is called upon to go into convention once or twice in the course of the session or not. But, I really hope that we shall not go so far as to change phraseology which is better than that we propose to substitute for it. Whatever was framed by our fathers, I have always believed was well done. They did understand the English language, and I think our Revolutionary state papers, our own Constitution, and the public documents of that day are couched in language much preferable to that used in the documents of more modern times. I do not know whether this is the subject for which the Convention was especially called or not; most of them were, in the opinions of the various gentlemen who have spoken upon them. But, Sir, these changes proposed are not important in the advantages claimed for them, and if I could have my way, I would get out of these resolves both of these subjects. I certainly concur with the gentleman for Wilbraham, that the Constitution in this respect had better remain as it is.

FRIDAY, July 8, 1853.

The Convention assembled pursuant to adjournment, and was called to order by the President, at 9 o'clock.

Prayer by the Chaplain.

The Journal of yesterday was read.

Orders of the Day.

Upon motion by Mr. JAMES, of South Scituate, the Convention proceeded to the consideration of the Orders of the Day.

The first subject in the Orders of the Day was the unfinished business of yesterday, which was the special assignment for that day, viz., the resolves on the subject of the House of Representatives,

The pending question being the motion of Mr. Hallett, member for Wilbraham, to reconsider the vote by which the amendment offered by Mr. Wood, of Middleborough, was adopted.

Mr. BARTLETT, of Boston. As I have a vote to give upon this question, I am unwilling to do it in silence. I desire, in a very brief manner, to place before the Convention the reasons which govern my action. Since the Report of the minority was disposed of some three or four weeks since in rather a thin house, I have examined with some care and scrutiny each of the projects not involving the district system, which has been placed before the Convention. I have listened to the remarks by which these projects have been sustained, and have endeavored to do it with as fair a mind as my political associations would permit. I have looked through all of them to find some approximation to a principle, upon which my conduct and action might rest. I regret to say, that I have been unable to find it. Indeed, how could it be otherwise? All of the projects that are not for a district system, are attempts to combine two elements, each of which, is entirely antagonistic to the other. One of them consists in the supposed right of corporate or town representation. The other consists in the rights of men or population. Now, what mind or hand is cunning enough to indicate the point where those two elements can blend in harmony? What gentleman among those, who have offered these projects, has been able to point out to us how much is due to the one element, and how much to the other; what is due to the town element in the distribution of representation, and what to the rights of population? It has not been done, and in my judgment, it cannot be done; and, lacking thus, it has come, and it must come, with no principle to guide in the matter, to a mere struggle for political power. Every man who takes up a project which is made to the Convention, asks, how will that affect my constituency? In default of a principle to guide him, he will be governed by that consideration; and, as it affects the political power of his town favorably or unfavorably, so will his vote be given. I state, and I submit to the Convention, that I state it fairly, that all schemes of that character having nothing of principle to guide, must needs result, as I stated before, in a mere struggle of the various constituencies in the distribution of political power. In that struggle I can take no part. I have no argument to offer to this Convention, why one part of the Commonwealth should be afforded a larger or a less representation than another. Indeed, that whole matter is beyond the reach of argument. It descends to the arena of traffic. I have no wish or capacity to deal on that arena. My first difficulty, then, with regard to the scheme now before the Convention, and all kindred schemes, is, that they are arbitrary and lack principle, that they are conventional and depend for their success, here, entirely upon how much can be gained and how much will be lost by negotiation, and upon the question, which of the projects, by a tender of political power, is best adapted to obtain the majority of suffrages of gentlemen representing constituencies in this Convention. It has been said, and fairly said, that the compromise is as applicable in dealing with facts that belong to political science, as it is in all human affairs, and I acknowledge the justness of the remark. But, will any gentleman tell me, if that can be called compromise in which all is taken, and nothing is given in return. I put it to gentlemen who favor schemes of that character, to answer me this question. I ask the able gentlemen representing Berlin, (Mr. Boutwell,) whose masterly speech has done more, in my judgment, to influence this assembly than the combined debate together, to tell me, if this be called a compromise, what has been given to the large towns of this Commonwealth in exchange for what is wrong from them. Will any gentleman who has proposed a scheme of that character tell me what the large towns get under his proposed system, which can be retained by them, by way of compromise, for what is taken from them?

Mr. HALLETT, for Wilbraham. I rise to a question of order. At the adjournment of the Convention yesterday evening, the subject under consideration was the reconsideration of the amendment offered by the gentlemen from Middleborough, (Mr. Wood,) and which was adopted. I have no wish to interrupt the gentleman from Boston, (Mr. Bartlett,) in his remarks, and I am perfectly willing that he should have the floor for the purpose of commenting upon the subject at large. It was ruled, while that subject was under consideration yesterday, that it was not in order to discuss the subject generally. My only apprehension in regard to the matter is, that the opportunity may be lost for taking the question upon the motion I made, before the hour arrives for the special assignment for taking the question upon this subject, unless there is a vote taken upon it now. I believe there is no discussion likely to arise upon it, and, if the gentleman from Boston will allow the vote to be taken upon the motion, I should be quite willing that he should occupy the floor.

Mr. BARTLETT. I rose to address the Convention, because, I supposed the topic I was discussing was the first and leading topic.

The PRESIDENT. The question of order is well taken. The question is upon the motion made by the gentleman for Wilbraham, (Mr. Hallett,) to reconsider the amendment offered on yesterday evening by the gentleman from Middleborough, (Mr. Wood,) to the third paragraph of the first resolve, and which was adopted by the Convention. That amendment reads as follows:

Any two towns may, by a vote of a major part of the legal voters of each, at legal meetings thereof, and held at some time preceding the first election which shall take place under this amendment to the Constitution, and, thereafter, at legal meetings held at some time preceding the first election which shall take place next after each decennial State census, unite together in a district, which shall be entitled to a representative each year, and which, shall continue until the next decennial census, excepting the year in which the valuation of estates is settled.

The question was then taken on the motion of Mr. Hallett, and it was decided in the affirmative.

So the vote adopting Mr. Wood's amendment was reconsidered.

Mr. HALLETT, for Wilbraham. I now move the following substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Middleborough, (Mr. Wood):—

Any two of such towns may, by a vote of a major part of the legal voters present at a legal meeting, in each of said towns respectively, called for that purpose, unite together in a district, which shall be entitled to a representative each year; and which shall continue not less than two years, excepting the year in which the valuation is settled.

Mr. DAWES, of Adams. I should like to make an inquiry of the gentleman as to the meaning of this amendment. Does the gentleman intend to provide, that two small towns, however remote from each other, may join together for the purpose of sending a representative to the general assembly, as for instance, that Hull and New Ashford might unite and form a district?

Mr. HALLETT. Any two towns may have the right which they now have under the present system, of forming one district, wherever they may please to form a district.

Mr. DAWES. The original proposition, as well as the amendment, was silent upon that subject. I thought, myself, that it was open to that construction, but it seems to be rather an unusual proceeding. I do not know that such a case as I have suggested might occur, but there would be propriety in having some limit. If it is the understanding of the friends of the measure, that any two of these towns, however remote from each other, may unite, that is all I desire to know.

The question was then taken upon the amendment to the amendment, and it was agreed to.

The question then recurring upon the amendment as amended, it was taken, and decided in the affirmative.

Mr. BARTLETT, (resuming). In regard to this matter of compromise, there are classes of compromise as in everything else. There are cases where the principle is plain and unambiguous, and the facts are obscure or in dispute. There are cases when the facts are so confused and multifarious, that no principle can be found which shall exhaust them, or be completely applicable to all of them. Those, as I understand it, come within the range of what are known as cases of compromise, but, wherever the great principle is plain, that should regulate conduct, and, wherever the facts are beyond reasonable dispute, compromise is but another name for something wrong by power from weakness, by obstinacy from timidity, and in my judgment, is a misapplication of the term. I put it to the good sense and fairness of the Convention, whether that term is applicable in any sense to the present proposition. If it be so, if it can be shown to be so, I do not mean to stand here isolated and alone, and say, if a fair compromise can be found, based upon principle, that I will not accede to it. Looking at the project before us, my difficulty from the outset, has been, that it lacks, throughout, the element of principle. That it has nothing but what is merely arbitrary to govern the judgment in accepting or rejecting it. But I think, Sir, it is a little lower than that, and that it offers temptation to negotiation and traffic for political power. But, Mr. President, my objection to the scheme as it now stands, is not limited to that difficulty. If I estimate it right, Sir, and I shall put it to the sense of the Convention, it fails to accomplish every one of the great leading aims which this Convention has in view upon this subject, and for which it was principally convened. I repeat it, Sir, because I wish it to be carefully noted if I am or not correct in the statement. I say its next main difficulty is, that it fails to accomplish, justly, each one of the leading objects, which it was the purpose of this Convention to accomplish in dealing with this matter. What are, then, those leading objects? I understand them to be three-fold. I understand the desire of the Convention to be, to permanently reduce the House of Representatives. I say permanently, for this I have supposed its leading purpose. I understand its second aim to be, so to provide that every man in this Commonwealth, at every annual election, shall have his voice and vote felt in constituting the body that occupies the hall in which we are now sitting. I understand its third great aim to be, Sir, to provide for the security and development of the rights of minorities, by districting the large towns and cities of the Commonwealth. Those are the three great purposes desired, as I believe, to be accomplished by this Convention. I have heard none other from any quarter. I have found nobody in the course of this debate, who has suggested any other. I have found no one, Sir, who denies that these are desirable ends to be attained. Now, Sir, I propose briefly, I hope intelligibly, to examine each of these propositions, and to ask the Convention, does the scheme lying upon your table accomplish any one of these objects?

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.—BARTLETT.

Let us look at the first. That first is, the permanent reduction of the House of Representatives. Well, Sir, what does this scheme propose? It proposes that at your next census, nominally, your House shall be limited to three hundred and seventy-five members, and that at each decennial period after that, the increase shall not exceed ten. But how does it propose to accomplish that? It proposes to accomplish it, Sir, by the application of this extraordinary principle, that the future growth of this Commonwealth shall be, so far as political rights are concerned, at the entire expense of the leading towns and cities in it. That is, substantially, the mode by which it hopes to accomplish it. For instance, take the calculations of the gentleman for Berlin, in regard to the condition of this Commonwealth in 1860. Take his view of what the large cities will attain by way of population at that time, and apply to it the theory upon which the House is to be limited or reduced, and I ask, if that scheme will be tolerated for an hour? Sir, while its disparities and injustice are trifling, or not glaring and oppressive, perhaps they may be borne. But when it comes to pass, as it is sure to come to pass, that in the application of the principle of this project to the apportionment of representation, five men in the city of Boston, or in the city of Worcester, shall be equal in political weight, to one man only in the town of Erving, the thing cannot stand. Its permanency is lost. The people would resort, if necessary, to revolution, to destroy it. But I take it, that it would be extinguished by a peaceful revolution, through the action of the legislature, or that of another Convention.

My argument upon that first point, then, is, that this project contains, within itself, the seeds of its own dissolution, that the idea of permanency cannot be attached to it; it is impossible that it can long subsist. It is, after all, but a piece of patch-work. It is tampering, for the time being, with an acknowledged evil, for the purpose of accomplishing a temporary end, and it provides no present or ultimate means of establishing what we need, and must, sooner or later, have, a permanent system of reducing and limiting the House of Representatives.

I pass to the second object which it is desired that we should attain, namely, that there be, throughout the Commonwealth, the voice of every legal voter in it, heard in selecting the representation in this hall. Does the proposed scheme effect this end? The statement of the purpose, and applying it to this project, furnishes the answer. There will be sixty-four towns in this Commonwealth, which it has left wholly incapable of annually exercising that great right. In the transition state, foreshadowed by the gentleman for Berlin, (Mr. Boutwell,) the number will increase, and the evil will increase with it. In other words, instead of reducing the evil which we have deprecated, namely, that there are towns which have only a fractional representation in the House of Representatives, we have left the difficulty precisely where we found it, with the single exception of the melioration suggested by the gentleman who represents Marshfield, (Mr. Sumner). If it was one of the designs which this Convention have in view, to provide for the perpetual right of representation of every town in the Commonwealth, we leave it precisely where we found it in point of principle. Numerically, we reduce the disparity a trifle, and that is all.

Mr. President, the third end to be attained, is to district the cities. And I understand the reason is—and it is a reason which commends itself to my mind, and, indeed, the wonder is, that the evil should have been tolerated so long—to give the minorities among large masses of people, a chance to have their voice more equally heard.

Mr. President, does this scheme accomplish that, in any just manner? Does it accomplish it with the least semblance of right and fairness? What does it do? It takes the cities of the Commonwealth, and deals with them first as a unit, for the purpose of reducing, as a whole, the amount of their representation; and, having done that, it says to them, "After all you are too big, we will make you equal to the medium sized towns in the Commonwealth, and when we have thus divided and reduced you, you shall not have the benefit of representation to the same extent which the other towns in the Commonwealth, of a similar size, have." That is the result precisely. It says to Boston, with her population of 138,000, "you shall be divided into districts. But, first, we will treat you as a town, and your representation shall be reduced as a whole, by the increasing ratio of representation; and, having done that, it is fit that you shall be divided into bodies capable of deliberation, into bodies within some reasonable limits as to size;" and, therefore, by the scheme now before the Convention, it is provided, that no district shall be entitled to elect more than three representatives. Three representatives are, upon the proposed system, given to all towns of eight thousand, and less than sixteen thousand inhabitants.

Let us look at that practically. I have stated the principle; I have stated what this theory purports to effect. I am not very clever at figures, but, I have made a calculation which I believe to be correct, and it shows the practical effect to be this. I suppose, of course, that nobody will say, that the cities will be divided into districts containing a smaller number of inhabitants than such, as, if they constituted towns, would entitle each district to three representatives, namely, eight thousand; because nothing can be gained by it.

Now, I wish to contrast the justness and the fairness of this scheme. Let us assume, that Boston, with its population of 138,000, according to the last census, is to be divided up into districts or towns of eight thousand inhabitants, and, suppose the Convention should be willing, as it should, to concede to Boston, thus divided, the right, as to each district, that would belong to every town of the size of such district, what would be the result? The result would be, according to the last census, that Boston would be divided into seventeen districts of eight thousand inhabitants each; and these seventeen districts would be entitled, upon this scheme, if they were towns having the same number of inhabitants, to fifty-one representatives.

Apply now to it the scheme, of treating it as an aggregate mass, and thus reducing its representation, and then subdivide it into districts, as suggested, and see how this notable project works. There will be a reduction in the whole, so that it will leave Boston thirty-five representatives only, while, upon a system which applies to every other town, they would be entitled to fifty-one. The result is, that the scheme which purports to work out the rights of minorities, does a double work, and one that can commend itself to no just mind.

Now, my purpose is, simply to array the condition of the argument, as it lies in my mind, in regard to the present scheme, of the member from Lowell, and, at the risk of being tedious, permit me to recapitulate. In the first place, it lacks any principle to guide the judgment in determining the justice of its details, or in coming to a conclusion as to its composition. No man can tell how much he shall assign to the supposed corporate or town principle; no man can tell how much he shall assign to the rights of numbers or population; and, in that state of things, it must all be a mere matter of negotiation or traffic, governed by no great guide, by which the judgment should be shaped and controlled. I think the next difficulty is, that it fails to accomplish, effectually or justly, each and every one of the objects which the Convention has in view.

Mr. President: There is a very considerable temptation, except that the House is weary of the debate, which has been conducted by abler minds than mine, to go further into details, in regard to this present scheme. But, I forbear to do it; because, after all I have stated, what, as they strike my mind, are the great inherent difficulties in it; and, if they can be avoided, the other calculations which show its injustice will be duly regarded or become unimportant; and, now, as the immediate question before the Convention, is the fairness and wisdom of the project on your table, perhaps I should pause here. I have stated, or endeavored to state, plainly, the reasons which have brought my mind to the conclusion, that I cannot support that project. Whether there be any which I could support, perhaps, becomes very immaterial. And yet, at the risk of wearying the patience of the Convention, I desire to say a word or two upon the principle, and not upon the details of another proposed method of disposing of this great question, which has been presented here, and elaborately argued. Of course, I refer to the district scheme, in some form. I have no desire to inquire, whether such district scheme should be based upon population, or upon ratable polls, or upon legal voters. That is a matter of detail. I desire, simply, to present to the Convention, very briefly,

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES. — BARTLETT.

[July 8th.

how the argument lies in my mind, upon the general question of the district system.

I take it to be conceded, by every man in this Hall, that a district system in the abstract, is one that commends itself to every mind and every judgment. It is based upon the great and eternal principle of equality and justice. And, I think it has a feature, which ought not to be lost sight of, and that is, that it not merely effects, but completely effects every one of the objects which we desire to attain. For instance, you may, by the district system, keep your House at precisely the size you desire, and your population and districts may be adjusted to that. The element with which you have to deal, is population merely. Again, it enables every man to have his voice felt and known, at all times, in the election of representatives. Of course it districts the cities, not upon the curious scheme which is now upon the table, but upon the principle that every man is entitled to equal rights. I think, then, that it has the advantage of being a permanent and just settlement of the whole subject.

The concluding remarks of the gentleman for Berlin showed that there lies in his mind, as there does in the mind of every man who has looked at the subject, the fear that we are hereafter, again, to struggle with this great difficulty. We must concede, as I think, from the course of this argument, that he anticipates its future recurrence, but that, his desire is to hold fast to a system of corporate representation for as long a period as possible, and such, I think, is the implied concession on the part of most of those who advocate the proposed system. If so, if we have got to settle this vexed question at some not distant period, will the advantages derived by retaining for a short season the element of corporate representation compensate for the sense of being wronged, which part of the community must feel, and for the ultimate expense which the renewed agitation and final adjustment of the subject must occasion?

But to return to the question of the district system. Its inherent justice and the completeness with which it effects what is desired being shown, it remains to consider the objections to which it is alleged to be exposed. I understand the argument to be in the first place, that there exists in the towns or quasi corporations of this Commonwealth, an absolute right of annual representation in the House of Representatives; this requires to be carefully scrutinized. If that right exists, I think we are met by an obstacle which cannot be overcome. I do not agree with the gentleman for Berlin, that the burden is upon those who propose it to show, that the district principle should be adopted. How do the facts stand? We are here with an acknowledged difficulty in the existing system, and it is confessed by all that the system is to be changed. A principle which it is agreed is right in the abstract, is proposed for adoption, and that principle when applied, works out precisely the end which is desired. Now, when we have advanced as far in the argument as that, when we have succeeded in showing that the principle is a perfect one, and it will work out its perfect end, I think the burden is upon those who reject it to show that it should not be adopted. I think, then, that the gentleman for Berlin is in error in endeavoring to throw the burden of argument upon the advocates of the district system; I think the burden has shifted and is on the other side, to show why it should not prevail. But to return to the precise question.

Do the towns in this Commonwealth possess the right of representation? I think we are carefully to distinguish between an absolute inherent right and a usage growing out of convenience to the State, which has been accustomed to work out many of its objects through the instrumentality of town governments, incidental to which, while its population was not redundant, the right of town representation has, to a greater or less extent, been exercised, and thus, although such usage may have been continued for a long series of years—we ought to distinguish between this and the absolute right to representation. If towns have the right to representation, upon what foundation does it rest? It is no where found in any frame of government in this Commonwealth set forth as a fundamental right. If it exist, it must be because it is necessarily inherent in the institutions; it must be an essential ingredient in town organization, and there ought to be added in proof of this, that it should be shown to be supported by an unbroken line of history. I will agree, Mr. President, that if the right of towns in this Commonwealth to a corporate representation could be supported by finding, in addition to a judgment that it is a necessary element to their useful existence, an unbroken historical support, looking back through the colonial, provincial and state history of Massachusetts, it ought to be sustained, unless there be some vital difficulty in working it out, which would justify us in throwing it aside. Let us look first at the matter of principle. Is it an essential ingredient in the existence, safety and prosperity of the towns, to have them represented as corporations? That of course, leads us to inquire in the next place what there is in the towns to represent. What laws are there which are to be passed in the course of legislation in this Commonwealth, that peculiarly affect the different towns in their corporate capacity? I am unable to discover anything of this kind, which would make it necessary that there should be this right of town representation. I admit that there may be occasional attempts to form new towns, or to set off here and there a farm from one town to another—there may be controversies with regard to such subjects, but this is merely incidental. I am looking at the great features of legislation; and I repeat the inquiry, has anybody ever known, or can anybody point out to this Convention, what there is in the towns as corporations that requires representation on this floor? The answer suggested is, that this is too narrow a view of the term "town"; that town means nothing more than the aggregate of the individuals who live in it, and that the right to representation is the right of the body of people that the town contains within its limits; but does that advance the argument? I would ask any gentleman if there is any greater right existing in the inhabitants of a town as such inhabitants to representation, than exists in any other class of individuals; what have they peculiar which requires distinct representation? What separate interests have people from the fact that they live in towns? Then, I say, that it does not advance the argument one hair to say, that it is not the representation of an inanimate thing, but the representation of a body of men inhabiting that inanimate thing, since their interests are identical with those of the people of other towns in other parts of the Commonwealth. It does not advance the argument a step to say, that it is the representation of men and not of an abstract idea.

But, although there are no corporate rights to be represented, and although I can discover no distinct and peculiar rights or interests attaching to men from the fact that, they inhabit towns which can be the foundation of a right to separate representation—yet it is said that the right has been conceded throughout the history of the Commonwealth, and so must be accepted—and cannot rightfully be changed. Take its colonial, provincial and State history; is it true, that the right of town representation has been uniformly recognized in this Commonwealth? Now, Sir, this subject has been very ably examined and discussed, and I think the result should be deemed conclusive. Without going over it chronologically, let me ask the attention of this Convention to the earliest and to the latest history of the Colony and State. Is it not true—do not the records of the Colony which have been produced and read to us by the learned gentleman from Cambridge, show conclusively, that in the earlier history of the government, towns containing less than a prescribed number of freemen were not by law allowed to participate in the government by electing a representative? If this be so, then this corporate right of representation has not an unbroken historical support. I will not stop to discuss the question raised by the gentleman from Dedham, (Mr. Wilkinson,) whether, at any time except for a period under the Charter of William and Mary, and still later under the Constitution of 1780, this supposed corporate right has been recognized and enjoyed, because that is somewhat debatable ground, and I do not choose to enter into it; but let us come down to a later period, and see how this right of towns to be represented has been dealt with. I speak of it as a right; and if it be a right, it is of course a right of annual representation. What have we been doing with that right for the last twenty years? Whence the authority—under what principle have towns, varying in number from sixty-four to one hundred, been deprived of this inherent right, alleged to be so vital to their existence? How did you dare to make your alteration in the Constitution in 1836, and say that a large body of the towns of this Commonwealth should, for the future, have a fractional representation only in the House of Representatives?

I submit, then, that this alleged right has no just foundation in necessity as connected with our town organizations, and that it is not inherent or a vital element, as it has been called, in the existence of the towns; and that the claim of its unbroken exercise cannot be supported historically. It had its origin in convenience, and not right or necessity, and has been so treated from the beginning. But by far the most important suggestion in favor of retaining the supposed right of towns to representation, is founded on an alleged principle of public policy, which, if violated, will lead to results deeply affecting our political system, and which cannot be compensated by any basis of representation, however equal and just.

Mr. President, I have listened with great delight to what has constituted this leading and almost engrossing topic of argument, the praises of those model institutions of government called towns, established here and throughout the New England States. Sir, there is not one word of that well-deserved tribute which I would abate or alter. I would yield to no man in my love, or admiration, or veneration; for a system that has produced such striking consequences; and having said that, I may be allowed to inquire, whether the next step in the argument is a solid step. Is it true?—and I think the whole argument turns upon this single consideration—is it true, as the gentleman for Berlin says, that the right of representation is a vital element in the healthy existence of towns? Is it true, as the gentleman for Erving has said, that this is an essential attribute in the existence of towns? Sir, let us see how that argument stands, for a moment. It is conceded upon all sides, that the great functions of town government will continue to be discharged as before, whether the right of representation be allowed to the towns or not. Every town will continue to administer its system of schools, almshouses, roads, taxes, and all else that pertains to its municipal character; and it will do this as heretofore—wisely and well; because whether we regard the benefits they confer, or the burdens they impose, they are too deeply interesting to be neglected. Now, Sir, upon this controverted question, how far the right of annual representation must be superadded, to give vitality to this town organization, we have a test in our own history. Will gentlemen from the smaller towns tell us whether they can see that the ceasing to exercise this function since the amendment to the Constitution, in 1836, has caused them to be dwarfed and lose any of their vitality? Since that amendment, a large number of towns in this Commonwealth that have been deprived of an annual representation, and some of them have been allowed to exercise the right very infrequently in each decennial period, have those towns gone to decay or become dilapidated? I put the question to those gentlemen who are conversant with this matter, if these valuable town organizations have dropped behind, or become enfeebled since 1836. Does any man see in them any symptoms of decay? And if this be not visible, not perceptible, if they still remain in vigor unimpaired, how can it be maintained that annual representation is an essential element, either for the existence, or for the full and entire usefulness of town organizations? Allow me to add, that my admiration for the system is so strong, that if it could be made even probable that, deprived of annual representation, the towns of this Commonwealth would cease to exhibit any of the great characteristics which have made them what they are, I should not hesitate to relinquish my attachment to the district or any other system, though based upon the principles of absolute equality and justice.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES. — BARTLETT.

[July 8th.

Mr. President: There is, connected with this subject of town representation, as matter of public policy, another consideration of great practical influence, namely, that towns are our schools for political education, and that the reward for diligence and success is political preferment. Perhaps this is a delicate topic to discuss in this place, and yet the true extent of its value must be determined in settling the policy of a district system. Now, it must be admitted that the political training resulting from the discussion and administration of municipal interests, is of great importance, and it has been effectively stated in this discussion. By the few, but not by the mass of solid men of the country, referred to by the gentleman for Berlin, it is sought as a source of political advancement. The chance of success in such pursuit is diminished by a change from a town to a district system. But the question still remains whether, if that incentive be diminished, the real benefits of town organization will be lost. In my judgment, so long as the important interests confided to the administration of the towns shall be unabridged, so long will they command the thought and attention of those whose interests are at stake, and the fact that political aspirants are thrown upon a wider field by the district, than by the town system, is entitled to no considerable weight in the determination of the question under discussion. Let me add, Mr. President, a word or two in regard to another idea, somewhat in the same line of argument, in relation to what has been called—and I think not happily called—a tendency to centralization. I think the language misapplied, because the term centralization, has been used heretofore to designate that system of government where even the smallest emanation of administrative power comes from one common centre, and nothing is left to be acted upon, independently, by the various remote members of the body politic. That was true of the French system, but of course nobody anticipates the peril, that at any time hereafter, the municipal affairs of the towns will be regulated or administered from the metropolis. The true idea intended to be conveyed by the term, is, a predominant influence in the cities, which will affect the political weight of the smaller towns. And what are these influences? The gentleman for Berlin, classes them thus. He says, first, there is a centralization of population, next, that of wealth, next, of talent, and last, that of the press; and, upon these assumed or admitted condition of the facts, he justifies the gross inequality in the distribution of political power, which the pending scheme proposes. Now, Mr. President, my difficulty is, that if the supposed facts furnish a proper principle to be acted upon in determining political rights, it is not carried out thoroughly, and in detail. Take, for instance, the element of wealth, as one of the grounds on which political power should be abridged. Sir, we have undergone a very strange revolution in that respect. Property was at one time deemed an essentially conservative element, fit, of itself, for a basis of representation in one branch of your legislature. In the present view, it is to be a ground for diminishing the political weight of the communities, where it is held, as compared with other communities. Now the difficulty with this, as a principle, is, that those who use it would hesitate to work it out and reduce it to its true results. Why apply the principle to wealth as it is aggregated in the cities, and not to the wealth of the towns of the Commonwealth? Why not graduate political power by a scale framed upon your decennial valuation, or descending still lower, why not distribute political rights so that the wealthy man shall have at the ballot-box, a fractional part only, of the power that is enjoyed by the poor man? The principle leads to a result which no statesman would dare to adopt. There does not exist, and never has existed, a government which has attempted to make a distinction of that sort, abridging the political rights and weight of communities or men, in consequence of their possession of property. If it were worthy of any regard as a basis, it should be applied equally and throughout. An arbitrary application of it to cities, and that too without determining its precise value, or weight, would be a tyrannical exercise of the power of numbers, without principle. A further justification is asserted to exist in the necessity of having the government constituted with checks and balances. The member for Berlin says, as we have got a Senate founded upon a popular basis, why put the House upon the same basis? He desires a check of one branch upon the other. Who ever heard of carrying out a system of checks and balances by arraying one portion of a house against another portion of the same house? Who ever heard in a political organization of checking community against community, wealth against poverty, talent against inanity? Can any government based upon principles to be justified only by a supposed necessity of setting class against class, wealth against poverty, intelligence against a want of it, really have any standing or endurance?

Mr. President: I have about concluded all I have to say. I desire to add but a few words in relation to an ingenious argument advanced by my friend for Manchester, (Mr. Dana). His justification for depriving the cities of their equal political weight, is, if I understand it, this. He says that the cities have voluntarily consented to become such, and thus parted with the power of deliberative bodies, incident to town organization. He says, let us take them at their word. Having consented to become organized as a representative government, having no longer the power of deliberating, treat them as a whole, for the purpose of finding out their maximum of representation, and this done, district them into towns of convenient size—but without the relative political weight of such towns. Now I thought I saw in that, the struggle of an ingenious mind to support a foregone conclusion. I thought I saw, when the argument was made, that my friend for Manchester desired to be convinced that some principle could be found upon which the taking from the cities their otherwise just political rights, could be justified, and that without this he could hardly be induced to adopt the proposition which he was attempting to enforce. Now, has his assumed ground any real foundation? What is the origin of our cities? Why are city governments formed? Are they formed by a voluntary act, from choice or caprice? Or is it not a controlling necessity that drives the people to a form of city government? The history of the formation of cities in this Commonwealth, I take to be this. When the population of a town becomes so large that the masses of men who come together in primary assemblies, cannot deliberate, when the orderly conducting of business becomes impossible, something must be done. And from this condition of things, has sprung the cities of this Commonwealth, and that is their true origin. Now, Sir, I ask, when compelled by necessity, because they are too populous to meet in a body and deliberate, to place themselves under the form of a city organization, and divide themselves into wards, to carry on their government, whether it is quite fair to say that they have parted with their power to deliberate by their own act, and may be justly disfranchised in the mode proposed? If that argument can commend itself to my friend for Manchester, and if he finds in it a sufficient reason for adopting the proposed scheme, it must be, I think, that he is content to accept, in political affairs, a basis of action less satisfactory, than under almost any other circumstances, he would be willing to submit to.

Mr. President: It is said by the gentleman for Berlin, (Mr. Boutwell,) that nobody lauds the existing system, or vindicates it. The reason is, that by the common consent of all, it is defective, and is growing more so with advancing years. I do not think, however, the gentleman is quite fair, when he says that the argument in favor of the district system, should be distrusted at the outset, from the fact that it comes from those who were opposed to the calling of this Convention. It has been explained, again and again, that for several years the existing system has been unsatisfactory to all parties, and efforts have been made in the legislature, without distinction of party, to amend it. Gentlemen may well be restless under the operation of the present system, and yet prefer to remedy the difficulty in the way pointed out by the present Constitution. I think the argument not worthy the general merits of that able speech of the member for Berlin.

But to return. We must adopt some system. We may patch up the present one, for such, in effect, is the proposed scheme of the member from Lowell, and we may struggle on with it a little longer, and that is all that can be hoped from it. The argument against this proposition is, that it lacks every element of principle by which the mind can be governed in adopting it, and it wholly fails to justly accomplish any of the great ends which all agree to be desirable. In contrast with this we have a plan which is admitted to be sound in principle, and founded in the loftiest political, as well as moral, justice. I speak of its great features, and not of the question, whether it should rest on a basis of population or legal voters. It is a plan that works out every end we have in view, and that justly and completely. And we are met only by the suggestion, that existing institutions forbid its adoption—that there are corporate rights which are violated by it, and therefore, it is wiser to fold our hands and wait until we are obliged again to face the difficulty. When that time comes, all will admit, that the only system which can be adopted, is a district system, and the advantages, if any, of postponement, can be obtained only at the expense of a sense of wrong and injury.

I know, that in regard to the district system, I am speaking to weary and unwilling ears, and I feel that I speak in vain. In regard to the system of town representation, I feel, and I say it with regret, that that may be said of it which Locke said of eloquence: "It has too prevailing beauties in it to suffer itself ever to be spoken against, and it is vain to find fault with those arts of deceiving wherein men find pleasure to be deceived."

Mr. ABBOTT, of Lowell. I desire to offer an amendment to the third resolve, by striking out, after the word "published," the following:—

And in all apportionments after the first, the numbers which shall entitle any city or town to two, three, four, or more representatives, shall be so adjusted, in proportion, as herein before provided, that the whole number of representatives, exclusive of those which may be returned by towns of less than one thousand inhabitants, shall not exceed three hundred and seventy-five in one thousand eight hundred and sixty, or be increased more than ten in any one decennial period thereafter.

And inserting, in lieu thereof, the following:—

And in all apportionments after the first, the number which shall entitle any city or town to two, three, four, or more representatives, shall be increased or decreased in the same proportion as the population of the whole Commonwealth shall have increased or diminished since the last apportionment.

I desire simply to state to the Convention the reason for offering this amendment. In looking at this resolve I think it must have suggested itself to the Convention, that there would be serious trouble after the first apportionment after the adoption of this amendment in working out and getting the ratio by which to divide the representatives among the larger towns. If the thing can be done practically, I am free to say I have not been able, from the attention I have given to it, to obtain precisely the modus operandi by which it can be worked out. At any rate, it is not so plain, certain, and apparent, as a provision in reference to this important subject ought to be, nor so plain that the rule can be appreciated and understood by every person in the Commonwealth.

There is another objection to the proposition, as it now stands, which is, that by the provision limiting the House to three hundred and seventy-five, with the increase of ten from 1860 to 1870, and every ten years after, you, in fact, are absolutely punishing the larger cities and towns for an increase of their population. In the first place, you have the towns with under one thousand inhabitants, which have half a representative, that is, one every other year; and then all the remainder of the towns and cities, two hundred and sixty-eight in number, which, without regard to their population, have one representative each year. Now, the result of the working of this system will be, that in 1860, taking the tables given in the report of the Secretary of State to the legislature in 1852, you will have one hundred and seven representatives to divide among the large towns and cities which may be entitled to more than one. If the increase of population goes on as it has, mainly in the larger towns, the result of fixing a number, beyond which the House shall not increase, is, that the increase in the larger towns is a positive injury to each one of them. Having but a certain number of representatives to divide among the whole number of towns and cities entitled to more than one, by increasing the number of such corporations, the less each one will have, and by increasing their population the larger will be the number required for each additional representative. As, for example, if the number of towns and cities entitled to more than one representative is increased by ten, the number to be divided among such towns and cities remaining fixed, you, of course, must decrease the number apportioned to each town, as you have to divide the same fixed numbers among a larger number of such towns and cities; and if the population in the same municipal corporations is doubled in amount in any ten years, then, where before four or five thousand was the number required to obtain one additional representative, it would require eight or ten thousand for the same purpose. Thus, very apparently, by the resolve as it stands, an increase of population in the large towns would work a decrease of political power to each individual inhabitant.

I apprehend that the advantages in the amendment I propose, are these: in the first place, it states something that is clear and appreciable, something that can be understood by every one who reads the resolves. We know, at any rate, what we are voting for; we know that the number of four thousand, which is established in the first resolves, will be increased for the third and succeeding representative just in proportion to the increase of the population of the Commonwealth. The proposition has, at least, the benefit of being intelligible, the benefit of being so plain that he who can read it can understand it. In the next place, it obviates the objection to the proposition as it stands, that an increase of population in the large towns will positively work to each inhabitant a decrease of political power.

It may be said, in answer, that it will provide for too large a House. That may be brought as an objection to bear against its adoption; but by going into the calculation, gentlemen will find that it does not provide for a House unreasonably large.

I desire to say, before I sit down, that this is substantially the proposition of the gentleman from Quincy. I believe we have everything else in this amendment which was contained in his proposition, and it is, therefore, substantially his. By looking at the tables which that gentleman has prepared, you will find that with my proposition, in 1860, if all the towns elect, you will have a House of four hundred and nineteen. By the system now in existence, as near as anybody has been able to work it out, in 1860, you would have a House of four hundred and five. In 1870, by my amendment, you will have a House of four hundred and thirty-nine, while by the proposition reported by the Committee of the Whole, as it now stands, you would have one of four hundred and twenty-five. If the Convention will consider my amendment, I think they will have no difficulty in adopting it. By the plan, as it now stands, how your apportionment is to be made, is a matter that nobody can tell us. It is a hole in which we are asked to put our foot, without knowing where the bottom is. But by my plan, we do know, at least, where the bottom is. And, in relation to the size of the House, the difference between the proposition as it now stands, and as it will stand if the amendment is adopted, will be just this: in 1860, one will be four hundred and fifteen, and the other four hundred and nineteen; in 1870, one will be four hundred and twenty-five, and the other four hundred and thirty-nine; that is, if all the towns elect which are entitled to a representative.

Now, Sir, I do not desire to take up the time of the Convention any further in this explanation. I think it is a proposition which every-body can understand, and I hope it will be adopted.

Mr. LORD, of Salem. I desire to have the amendment again read.

The amendment was read by the Secretary.

Mr. LORD. I supposed, when I first heard the amendment read, before the gentleman made his comments upon it, that it was his design to keep the House of uniform size; because if you require the number to entitle a town to an additional representative to increase in the same ratio that the population of the Commonwealth increases, I do not see how you will get any additional representatives. You use up the entire increase of the population in the number necessary to elect an additional representative, and I do not perceive how it will have the effect to increase the size of the House.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES. — LORD — ABBOTT.

A MEMBER. You will get the additional ones from the small towns.

Mr. LORD. I presume that to be so, that they will all come from the small towns. I take that for granted. But I ask, how, by an increase of population, you are to get any additional representatives by this proposition? Because, I suppose, if the population of the Commonwealth increases 500,000 in the next ten years, the population necessary to give an additional representative must be increased in that proportion. I do not understand how it will necessarily increase the size of the House.

Mr. ABBOTT. The ratio of increase provided for the large towns, in respect to representation, is the ratio of increase in the population of the State, of both the large and small towns. I apprehend that it will continue in future, as it has up to this time, that the ratio of increase in the large towns will be much greater than in the small ones, or much larger than it is in the entire Commonwealth. You will find, by looking at the census returns, that the ratio of increase in the towns of 4,000 inhabitants and upwards, is much larger than it is in the whole State. I apprehend, therefore, that it will be apparent that the House may increase, for that reason, to some extent, because this increased ratio is intended to apply only to the towns of 4,000 inhabitants and over. Indeed, if gentlemen will make the calculation, they will find that it will increase to the extent that I have already named.

Mr. LORD. Well, Sir, I must confess that I cannot understand the proposition, but the reason probably is, that like many others, I have had no opportunity to examine it. It seems to me, and I cannot possibly see how it can be otherwise, that if you increase the number necessary to give an additional representative just in proportion as the population of the State increases, that you will keep the number of representatives precisely the same. Although one town may increase in population faster than another, so long as you increase your number for giving an additional representative in proportion to the whole aggregate increase, I do not see, at first glance, why the number gained by those towns that increase very rapidly—more so than the whole State—will not be lost by those towns which increase much less than the State, and which therefore do not have sufficient increase to enable them to hold their representation under the increased ratio, and therefore cannot see that it will affect, of necessity, the number of the House. I confess that it is a matter that I cannot understand from simply hearing it read at the clerk's table, but I suppose the proposition has been examined, and that it is to become a part of the Constitution.

Mr. ABBOTT. If the gentleman will give way, I will try once more to make myself clear. I supposed that I had made the reason of the matter apparent. At any rate, it is apparent to my own mind, and I am only sorry that I cannot make it equally so to others. However, I will restate the proposition.

By the proposition as it now stands, without amendment, we have a certain number of towns—211, I think, is the number at the present time—which are each entitled to one representative. All the towns in the Commonwealth, with more than 1,000 and less than 4,000 inhabitants, have each one representative. To this extent the size of the House will remain permanent. Every town with as many as 1,000 inhabitants is to have one representative, and that provision is not subject to change. Here, then, you have a certain number of towns which are not affected in their representation by any general increase or decrease in the population of the State. Then there is a certain number of other towns which are entitled to more than one representative, and their representation, when it comes to be apportioned, is to be divided by the increase of the population of the whole State, and not by the increase of these large towns alone. Now, if you will go back to the history of the population of the Commonwealth, you will find that these large towns have increased in a greater ratio than has the population of the whole State. If you calculate the increase from 1850 to 1860 by that of the period from 1840 to 1850, you will find that the principal increase in the population of the State is in the large towns. The effect of my amendment will be, that these large towns shall not increase their number of representatives in proportion to their own increase, but that the ratio shall be fixed in proportion to the ratio of increase of the whole population in the State. If they increase faster than the general ratio of increase, that will give them an additional representative. In that way, it must be, that these large towns will be entitled to an additional number of representatives, because their ratio of increase is greater than it is for the whole Commonwealth. For this reason, I think it must be apparent that the size of the House must be increased in future.

Mr. LORD. I believe, Mr. President, that I understand the gentleman's plan, in general terms, though I know nothing of its details. I differ, however, with him as to the certainty of the result, and I think he will concur with me, that it is not in the power of any man to find out how many representatives a city or town is entitled to, without algebra. I defy any man, taking the Constitution as the basis; taking it that the first 1,000 gives one representative; that 4,000 gives two; that 8,000 gives three; that 12,000 gives four; and so on, to cipher out the proposition which he now makes, and ascertain correctly the proper number of representatives to which the several cities and towns of the Commonwealth will be entitled, without algebra. He cannot do it; and if it is expedient to put into the Constitution a form giving out a system of representation which requires an algebraic problem to solve them, I have misunderstood entirely what the rule of representation, as established by fundamental law, ought to be. And I cannot see how, as the gentleman suggests, it will increase the number of representatives, except it may be by the addition of new towns, which may become entitled to a single representative. But precisely how it will operate in increasing or in diminishing the number from the towns that are entitled to a larger number of representatives than one, I cannot at all imagine; presented as it is, just as the vote is ordered to be taken, and with no time or opportunity for examination or thought upon the subject. But as I said before, I suppose that this is probably to become a part of the resolve to be adopted, and all I have to say is, that I hope the Convention will adopt it more intelligently than I shall vote against it.

And, Sir, I have no idea of entering upon a set speech upon the basis of representation. I have never, from the time the discussion of the subject commenced, up to this time, entertained the remotest idea of entering into any general argument upon the question. But, Sir, there have been certain principles advanced in support of these propositions, which seem now likely to be recommended to form a part of the Constitution, which I have desired, if nobody else did so, simply to protest against. I should like to have the course, suggested by the honorable gentleman from Taunton, (Mr. Morton,) carried out. I should like to have the system of representation which the Convention has once adopted, and which, I presume, it will adopt again, presented to the people, and called the "mixed" system, because, I believe, it is claimed to be a system made up of town and district representation. And I should like to have the system presented by the gentleman from Boston, (Mr. Hale,)—except that I should prefer the basis of legal voters to that of population—also presented to the people, and called the "district" system. And I should like, if it is understood that this revised Constitution is to be presented for the approval of the people, as a whole, that this matter of representation should be left out of it, and the two propositions, respectively presented for the judgment of the people. I believe in their intelligence and capacity to decide this matter correctly. I am willing to abide by their judgment. Let these two propositions be submitted to them, and let those who are in favor of the proposition which a majority of the Convention now favor, deposit their ballots with the word "mixed" written upon it; let those who prefer the district system, deposit their ballots with the word "district" upon them; and let those who prefer no change at all, vote a general negative. I should like to see the judgment of the people upon the two plans; and I am perfectly willing to acquiesce in the result, whatever it may be; and if such a proposition as that is presented to the Convention, I will give it my hearty support.

The PRESIDENT, (interrupting). Inasmuch as the time is fixed for closing the debate upon this question, the Chair must request the gentleman to confine his remarks to the immediate subject under consideration. The Chair has hitherto not interrupted any gentleman, but in consideration of the fact that the debate is limited to so short a time, he feels it his duty to confine gentlemen, in their remarks, to the immediate subject under consideration.

Mr. LORD. I had supposed I was speaking to the subject before the Convention. I supposed that to suggest an improvement to the proposition under consideration was a proper argument to be used; and I have yet to learn that it is not properly discussing the question before the Convention to suggest how that proposition may be improved.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair begs pardon of the gentleman from Salem. His understanding was, that the gentleman was speaking of alternate propositions to be submitted to the people. If such was not the case, then the Chair was in error.

Mr. LORD. I was speaking of what I thought would improve the proposition before us. As an alternative proposition, I am willing to go for it. I am willing to go for a proposition if you will put something else with it. If you will submit this, with another proposition, which I named, to the people, and allow them to judge between them, I am willing to acquiesce in that judgment, whatever it is.

Now, Sir, I do not know but we are really acting upon the doctrine which I heard advanced sometime since, that after all, the legislature was a body of not much consequence; that it was really no very essential part of republican institutions. I shall begin to think there is something in that doctrine, and that free discussion is no part or province of a deliberative assembly.

Although it has repeatedly been said that this question has been argued as if the House of Representatives was the entire government of Massachusetts, I think it is proper to argue it, not as if it was the entire government, but yet as one of the chief essentials to republican government. But, I have heard it said that really a legislature is not a necessity to republican government—that the people may adopt some other mode of accomplishing their object. Now, Sir, without standing upon a necessity for any particular organization of a legislature as essential to republican government, I protest against the doctrine that it can be dispensed with altogether. I hold that a representative assembly of the people, elected to take part in the enactment of laws for the people, is an essential part of republican institutions. When you do not have such representation you have not republican institutions. You may devise new modes, but when you have devised a mode which does not require that the representatives of the people shall take part in the enactment of laws, you have not republican institutions. If this proposition shall be adopted, and there is no protest against such doctrines, it may be understood hereafter that it is adopted upon the basis upon which it has been argued. I have heard it suggested, as I said before, that there was no necessity for a House, and I have heard the argument enforced by the conduct of this Convention in limiting the length of sessions of the legislature, and I felt the force of the argument; it seemed to me unwise to make the limit, even though there were some evil to be corrected. I desire to say that while I listened yesterday with a great deal of pleasure to the speech of the gentleman representing Marshfield, (Mr. Sumner,) yet I desire for one to protest against what I call its leading idea. When I saw, with a great deal of satisfaction, that that distinguished gentleman had been elected to a seat in this Convention, from a locality politically different from that in which he resided, I was rejoiced at it, because I supposed that the people who elected him elected him on account of his wisdom, and that we might have the benefit of that wisdom, that political experience, and those varied attainments which we all know him to possess. I did not suppose that they elected him to vote upon the judgment of other men, but upon his own judgment, because in that they confided more than in that of any of their townsmen. I thought we had a right to the judgment of that gentleman. I do not think he was treating us quite fairly,—if he will excuse me for using this language, and by using it I do not intend any disrespect to him personally,—while we were expecting to be enlightened by his wisdom that he would tell us that he should vote as somebody else thought was right. I agree that he thought it expedient to vote so. I agree, if I can be said to agree to anything which the gentleman said, that he KNEW it was not right but thought it was expedient to vote for the proposition before the Convention. I so understood the gentleman, but I thought we had a right to his vote. I think now we have a right to it, and the vote of every gentleman of this Convention who really believes that this district system is a proper system. In my judgment that is the proper mode in which to discharge the duties devolving upon us as members of this assembly; for each gentleman to vote not as he thinks this or that person may desire, not as he thinks this or that community may desire, but according to the dictates of his own judgment. I believe if the gentleman from Natick, (Mr. Wilson,) upon one side of the House, and the gentleman who represents Marshfield, (Mr. Sumner,) upon the other, who have both declared upon their own consciences that they believe the district system is right, had brought their great powers into this debate and had endeavored to convince this assembly that it was best to adopt the district system, that it would have been done. I believe further than that. I believe now, if every gentleman in this Convention will vote precisely for the basis which in his own judgment he thinks should be established irrespective of questions of expediency, that there would be a very large majority of this Convention to-day in favor of the district system; and I believe, too, that the people of this Commonwealth, by just as large a proportionate majority, would also be in favor of the district system. I do not recognize the force of the argument that this town representation has existed for two hundred years; for have not county lines existed just as long, and will any gentleman here undertake to oppose a change in the basis of the Senate because of attachment to county lines? Not one, and yet the system has lasted as long as the system of town representation. What are town lines now? There are probably very few gentlemen here who, even during the brief period of their lives, have preserved allegiance to the same town lines always. Take, for example, the little peninsula of Nahant, and I want to know how much of old associations will be there broken up if the inhabitants should again be required to vote for representatives with the city of Lynn. Take the towns of Swampscot on the one side and Nahant upon the other, which within two years have been set off from Lynn, and I desire to know what great violation of the feelings of gentlemen has been committed by such division, or what great violence would be done to them to be put back into the same district. So there have been seven or eight towns in Essex County cut up and divided. We do not regard town lines. It seems to me, that it is not worth while to approve the system of representation because it has so long been adhered to, and upon the ground that it disturbs an arrangement which has so long existed. When we come upon the next subject proposed in the calendar upon the manner of the appointment of judges, and upon their tenure of office, can not every thing be said in favor of the existing state of things which has already been said in favor of town representation? Have they not had a life tenure by executive appointment ever since the government had existence? Has not all that lasted just as long, and yet I will venture to say that we shall not hear from one of these gentlemen that the habits of the people have become fixed in this matter, and that it is not expedient to break in upon the system because the people have been accustomed to a judiciary with a life tenure, deriving their appointment from the executive.

Mr. DAVIS, of Plymouth. I rise to a question of order, and it is, that the gentleman from Salem, (Mr. Lord,) is not in order in discussing the general merits of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Lowell, (Mr. Abbott,) at this time.

The PRESIDENT. It is the opinion of the Chair that the gentleman from Salem is not speaking to the immediate question before the Convention.

Mr. ALLEN, of Worcester. May I be allowed to make a suggestion, and request the gentleman from Lowell, (Mr. Abbott,) to withdraw his amendment, or else that the Convention, by general consent, shall allow the gentleman from Salem to proceed, for I think it is unfortunate that the debate should be restricted in this manner. I move that, by general consent, the gentleman be allowed to proceed.

The PRESIDENT. There being no objection the gentleman will be allowed to proceed with his remarks.

Mr. DAVIS, of Plymouth. I understood the gentleman from Salem to say that he is in favor of an alternate proposition, and that he will advocate it. By a vote of the Convention the question is to be taken upon this subject by special assignment, at half-past eleven o'clock, and I understand that there are several members present who have propositions concerning an alternate district system which they are ready to propose, but this cannot be done if the gentleman from Salem takes up a great portion of the time in speaking upon the amendment. I suppose the gentleman, in the suggestion he makes in reference to the alternate proposition, to be sincere, and, therefore, I hope he will allow the vote to be taken in time upon that amendment.

The PRESIDENT. By the general consent of the Convention the gentleman from Salem is at liberty to proceed with his remarks.

Mr. LORD. I never heard of any ruling, in any assembly, where the question upon the amendment did not leave the whole subject open.

The PRESIDENT. Does the gentleman appeal from the decision of the Chair?

Mr. LORD. It is not my habit to appeal from decisions of the Chair.

The PRESIDENT. Inasmuch as the Chair has expressed an opinion upon the question of order raised by the gentleman from Plymouth, the Chair would repeat that, according to parliamentary usage, and the practice of all deliberative bodies, that the remarks of the gentleman must be confined to the immediate subject embraced in the amendment, but the Convention has, by general consent, allowed the gentleman to proceed.

Mr. LORD. I desire to make this suggestion to the Chair. I wish to know, in the first place, if there is a proposition before the House, and the gentleman from Boston moves a substitute, if it is in the power of gentlemen to move to amend the original proposition and cut off all debate upon that subject.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.—MORTON—HALE.

[July 8th.

The PRESIDENT. It is in the power of any member of the Convention to offer an amendment. But it is the right of any member to have the remarks of any member confined to the question. It is universal parliamentary law that one thing is to be done at a time. It is not in order for the gentleman to debate the proposition before the Convention, except by general consent. That has been given, and the gentleman from Salem has the privilege of proceeding.

Mr. LORD. I do not propose to proceed upon that basis at all, and, therefore, inasmuch as it is suggested that several gentlemen had propositions such as I said I should favor, although I cannot conceive how they can be in order, still, as they desire to present them, I will yield the floor and take my chance for an opportunity to speak upon this amendment.

Mr. MORTON, of Taunton. In the close of my imperfect remarks, yesterday, I stated to the Convention, that I had in contemplation an alternative proposition to offer. Since that time, a great number of the members of the Convention have desired me to present it, and without supposing I can now offer it, I wish to have it distinctly understood that I exceedingly desire to have some opportunity of laying my proposition before the Convention without saying one word upon it, at some stage of the proceedings, before the debate is closed by the order passed for the special assignment.

The PRESIDENT. Unless objection is made, the gentleman will have the liberty of stating his amendment.

Mr. MORTON. If the Secretary will be so good as to read it, it is the only explanation which I have to make.

The amendment was read as follows:—

Resolved, That the Committee "appointed to reduce such amendments as have been or may be agreed upon, to the form in which it will be proper to submit the same to the people for ratification," be instructed so to prepare the amendments in relation to the House of Representatives, as to submit to the people the following questions:—

First. Shall the twelfth amendment in the present Constitution be abrogated?

Second. Shall the system of representation by towns, in the form accepted by the Convention, be ratified and adopted as a substitute for the said twelfth amendment?

Or, Shall the system of representation by districts, in the form hereto subjoined, be ratified and adopted as a substitute for the twelfth amendment aforesaid?

And if a majority of the legal voters voting thereon, shall be in favor of abrogating the said twelfth amendment, then the one of the two proposed systems of representation which shall receive the greatest number of votes, shall be deemed and taken to be ratified, and shall become a part of the Constitution, in lieu of the twelfth amendment of the present Constitution: provided, that if the two proposed systems shall receive an equal number of votes, then the system agreed upon by the Convention shall be deemed and taken to be ratified, and shall become a part of the Constitution as above stated.

[Proposed system of Representation by Districts, before referred to.]

The House of Representatives shall consist of two hundred and sixty-one members. Said members shall be apportioned among the several counties as nearly as possible according to the number of legal voters in each.

The Senate, at its first session after the ratification of this amendment, and at its first session after each decennial census, shall divide each county into such representative districts, composed of contiguous territory, as they may deem expedient, so that the basis of each representative shall be the same number of legal voters, as nearly as possible, without the division of towns or the wards of cities: provided, that no district shall be so large as to entitle it to more than three representatives; and provided, that Nantucket and Dukes County, shall each form one district and be entitled to at least one representative.

Mr. MORTON, of Taunton. I suppose that amendment is not now in order, and I merely offer it, and give notice that if an opportunity may be found, I desire very much to submit it, with an explanation of it, to the Convention.

The PRESIDENT. It is not now in order; but, it will be in order after the time assigned for taking the question.

Mr. ALLEN, of Worcester. Whenever that proposition shall be in order, it may be impossible to debate it, as the rules of the Convention may prevent. I wish to say a word or two in reference to it. I think there is an insuperable objection—

The PRESIDENT. The Chair will suggest that the gentleman from Worcester can proceed by general consent.

[The remarks of Mr. Allen, not being in the possession of the Reporter, will be found, out of place, in some subsequent part of the record.]

Mr. MORTON. I rise, not to discuss the subject, but it has been suggested by some members of the Convention that my proposition seems to take the Convention somewhat by surprise, and they desire to have an opportunity to discuss it, and certainly nothing can be further from my wish, than to call upon anybody to vote upon the subject without a full opportunity to discuss it. I beg leave, therefore, to say that I will withdraw it, and will offer it when an opportunity can be given to investigate it.

Eleven o'clock, the hour assigned for taking the vote, having arrived,

On motion by Mr. EARLE, of Worcester, some verbal alterations were made in the resolves.

The question then being upon the proposition offered yesterday by the gentleman from Boston, Mr. Hale, to strike out all after the word "Resolved" and insert the following:—

That it is expedient so to alter and amend the Constitution as to provide for a periodical division of the Commonwealth into equal districts, on the basis of population, with a view to the establishment of a House of Representatives on the principle of equality, and consisting of such a number of members as may be best entitled to the confidence of the people, and best adapted to the convenient dispatch of the legislative business. In order thereto, a census of the inhabitants of each city and town, on the first day of May, in the year one thousand eight hundred and fifty-five, and on the first day of May in every tenth year thereafter, shall be taken and returned into the office of the Secretary of the Commonwealth on or before the last day of June next ensuing the dates aforesaid. And it shall be the duty of the general court, which shall be next chosen after the taking of each decennial census, to divide the towns and cities of the Commonwealth into eighty districts, in such manner that each shall contain, as nearly as may be, an equal number of inhabitants, and they shall, in all cases when the same shall be practicable, be formed by the union of towns and cities, or parts of cities, adjoining one another; and in the formation of such districts no town shall be divided. But the cities, when containing a greater number of inhabitants than the average of the districts throughout the Commonwealth, shall be so divided that each district shall, as nearly as may be, contain that number, and any part of the inhabitants exceeding the number required for the entire district therein, shall be set off to form a part of such adjoining district, as the general court shall direct. The division of cities into districts shall be formed, and the inhabitants who may be set off to an adjoining district shall be organized for the purpose of conducting the elections therein, by the municipal authorities of the respective cities, in the same manner as the wards, for city purposes, are constituted therein. And the inhabitants of each district shall elect three representatives, constituting a House of two hundred and forty members.

Mr. HALE. If it be in order, I wish to explain, in very few words, the reasons which have influenced me in offering this amendment.

The PRESIDENT. By general consent, the gentleman can be permitted to proceed.

Mr. HALE, permission being accorded, proceeded to say, that the proposition which he had had the honor to submit, had, at least, the merit of providing for an equal basis of representation. It proposes (continued Mr. Hale) a basis which allows a representation of all classes of the people, and of every locality; a representation as nearly equal in its character as is attainable by any mode of representation that has been adopted in any of the States of the Union.

Besides being in this respect based upon principles of entire equality, it possesses the advantage of a uniform application to all the cities and large towns, as well as to the small towns. It requires a universal districting, not only by uniting the small towns for the purpose of forming districts, but by dividing the cities into districts of the same dimensions. This is so literally true, that there is not a town or city in the Commonwealth which, under the census of 1850, would not, under this resolution, be subjected to the principle applied to all the rest. There is not a town that comes near enough in the number of its inhabitants to the average on which the districts are based, to entitle it to form a district of itself, without being either divided because it is too large, or united with some other town, or some part of a city, because it is too small. The system, therefore, will be uniform in its application to all cities and towns. It calls for no relinquishment of the privilege of corporate representation by a part of the towns for the benefit of the rest, but for a relinquishment by all for the common benefit of the whole. This is one advantage which this system possesses over all others that have been proposed. It places the people of every part of the State on a precise equality, in all respects.

Another advantage of this system is, that it allows three representatives to each district. In that respect, I conceive it has a decided advantage over districts for a smaller number—either for a single representative, or for two representatives. It has an advantage of admitting a much greater degree of equality in the apportionment. If you were to attempt to divide the State into districts to elect a single member, it would be necessary either to divide a great proportion of the towns, or to make the districts extremely unequal; but, I am satisfied on examination, that, in dividing the Commonwealth into eighty districts, which shall have as nearly as possible the average number of inhabitants, (which average, I believe, will be exactly 12,171,) the districts can be so formed that not one of them will differ more than six per cent. from that precise average. This, I conceive, to be a great advantage over districts formed for the election of a single member, or even for two members.

There is one other circumstance in relation to this proposition, which I will briefly allude to before I close. I refer to the question of the basis of representation. It proposes to establish the basis upon population. If I were persuaded that a basis upon legal voters would be more satisfactory, I should have no objection to adopt it; but, I conceive the more suitable basis, and one which has been very generally adopted and preferred throughout the United States, to be the entire population of each district, and not any particular class or portion of that population. Believing that to be the true basis, I was disposed, as one of the Committee having this subject in charge, to recommend it, and my friends of the Committee who signed the Minority Report, recommending, in substance, the amendment which I now offer, concurred with me in the proposition, in preference to a basis upon legal voters, which has been urged by a number of gentlemen in the course of the debate.

There is a reason why, in my opinion, very little weight should be given to the supposed difference between the two bases. It is this. We have printed in our documents, a statement of the number of legal voters in the different counties in the year 1850; and, gentlemen have supposed that that statement affords a correct indication of what will be hereafter the comparative proportion of the legal voters, and the inhabitants, throughout the Commonwealth. I believe that that idea is founded in a mistake. It is well known that the number of voters on the voting lists varies very materially in different years, according to the care taken to obtain the names of all the persons entitled to vote. In 1850, there was more attention given to this subject in some parts of the Commonwealth than in others. In Suffolk County, for example, there was no great effort made to obtain an accurate result, while in other counties a deeper interest was felt in the election then ensuing. I am satisfied that the number of voters returned, in proportion to the population, is smaller than it will be found to be when it becomes a matter of importance, in the public estimation, that the voters should all be enrolled. There is another reason why the proportion of voters, in cities and towns where there is a large changeable population, would be increased, provided this basis should be adopted. It is, that no tax being required as a condition of the proposed qualification for the right of voting, a great many persons entitled to be voters will hereafter take care that their names are put on the list, who, at present, do not do so. I conceive, therefore, that it will make very little difference, whether the basis of legal voters or of population be adopted. Mr. President, I thank the members of the Convention for their kind indulgence in permitting me to offer these few remarks, and will take up their time no longer.

Mr. HOOPER, of Fall River. I rise to make a motion to amend the gentleman's proposition. I believe it contemplates the taking of the census in 1854. The Convention, the other day, decided that the census shall be taken in 1855. Unless, therefore, the proposition be made to conform to that decision, it will require an additional census to be taken.

Mr. Hale accepted the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Fall River, and the proposition was modified accordingly.

The question recurred on the adoption of the amendment offered by Mr. Hale, of Boston, as amended.

Mr. HOOPER. I should like, Mr. President, to give my reasons for the vote that I shall give upon this question.

The PRESIDENT. The gentleman can only proceed by the unanimous consent of the Convention.

Objection was made.

The question was then put, and the yeas and nays, having been previously ordered, were taken, with the following result:—
